Manuscripts are available mainly in three languages, viz. Sanskrit, Assamese and Tai. The Tai language, having two branches, viz. the Ahom and the Khamti, was used in writing chronicles and religious works. Ahom is no longer a spoken language, but Khamti, still being a spoken language, contains a large number of old manuscripts written on palm leaves with golden coloured borders. The Ahom chronicles and ritualistic scriptures are mostly written on aloe barks like the manuscripts in Sanskrit and Assamese languages. Sanskrit works were also written in the Assamese scripts. It may be incidentally mentioned that the earliest specimens of scripts in Assam are represented by the Khanikar gaon Nagajari inscription of Golaghat and the Umachal inscription of Surendra Varma of the 5th century A.D. The scripts used in the two inscriptions are nearer to the Brahmi scripts and not to the Kutila scripts which emerged in the sixth century. However, the later inscriptions show similarity with the eastern variety of the later Gupta-lipi. The inscriptional script practically attained its modern form in the early part of the thirteenth century incised in the Kanai Barasibowa rock inscription of 1205. The late medieval Assamese scripts as found in the old manuscripts developed into three types of writings, viz. the Gargaya-lipi used in eastern Assam, the Bamuniya-lipi used by Brahmins in writing or copying Sanskrit works and the Kaitheli-lipi used mainly by the Kayasthas in writing records, accounts and books. These three styles of scripts do not fundamentally differ from each other except in minor points. The main distinguishing features of the Bamuniya-lipi is the similarity of a few letters with the Devanagari script. The Kaitheli-lipi is more stylised than the other two and the Gargaya-lipi conforms to the modern Assamese script to a great extent.

The writers and copyists used both sides of each folio for writing, marking the folio number at the second page of each folio. The size of folios depended on the volume of the work. It may vary from a few centimeters to two or three feet in length and the breadth is cut out in conformity with the length. The centre of each leaf or folio is perforated for the fastening string to pass through. Leaves thicker than those used in the texts were used as covers and in many cases two wooden plates placed on the top and at the bottom of the manuscript protected the manuscript. The wooden covers were sometimes painted with pigment of hengu (vermilion) and haital (yellow orpiment) and the covers were called betupat (Sanskrit vrinta patra).

The skill of painters was requisitioned to illustrate some of the important manuscripts. Uptil now nearly forty illustrated manuscripts representing the art of miniature or book-illustration painting in Assam have been recovered. Some of these are in different antiquarian institutions. Two styles of miniature painting illustrating the themes and descriptions of the manuscripts are noticed. One, probably earlier, was cultivated in the Vaishnavite atmosphere of satras. The other, more sophisticated, was influenced by the Mughal-Rajput schools of painting developed in the royal courts. A blending of the two styles is noticed in some manuscripts. Painting of manuscripts is also noticed in some Tai-Ahom manuscripts and this style bears the stamp of the upper Burma tradition. The most remarkable specimen of the satriya style is the Bhagavata Book X, recovered from Bali satra of Nowgong and published by H.N. Datta Barua in 1950. Excellent specimens of the courtly style are Hastividya and Samkhachuda-badha. Besides theme-illustrations, there are some other old manuscripts where floral and creeper-like designs decorate the borders of each folio.

In most of the manuscripts the names of the authors or poets are appended either at the end of each chapter or at the end of the works. Some manuscripts give detailed narration of the ancestry of the poets. The date of composition including the month, the day of the week and even the tithi (lunar day) of the completion of the work are mentioned in some manuscripts. The name of the copyist is generally appended after the concluding colophon of the original poet. The date or the year of completion of the work is generally mentioned not in numerical figures but in a set of words indicating numerical figures. Thus 'Shashi' (moon) means one, 'Sindhu' (ocean) means seven, 'Rudra' means eleven, 'Rasa' indicates six and 'Guna' three. There are few more such words indicating different numbers. Manuscripts usually begin with a salutation either to Ganesha, the remover of obstacles or with an obeisance to Krishna. Words used in manuscripts were written at one stretch without space in between and this presents difficulties to uninitiated readers.

Although nearly ten thousand manuscripts have so far been recovered from private possessions by different institutions, many more old manuscripts are still lying uncared for in individual houses and religious institutions. Traditionally educated families have their own manuscript libraries and traditionally affluent religious institutions like the satras have their own archives. Manuscripts owned by private families and religious institutions have a sanctity of their own and are considered as sacred heirlooms. Therefore, they do not easily agree to the removal of manuscripts for the scientific preservation in recognised antiquarian institutions. This unwillingness on the part of the owners is responsible for the destruction and damage to innumerable manuscripts in Assam. Over and above the unscientific preservation, the havoc caused by frequent floods, earthquakes, fire and the devastations, loot and carnage caused by the three Burmese invasions in the early decades of the nineteenth century caused irreparable loss to the old manuscript of Assam.

The Ahom Kings had a royal archive for the preservation of manuscripts, records, letters and despatches. It was looked after by an official called Gandhiya Barua. There was another officer named Lekhak Barua who supervised the works of clerks and copyists. Unfortunately, the royal archive was destroyed during the unsettled period of internal rebellions and the repeated Burmese invasions during the last fifty years of the Ahom rule.

The value and importance of old manuscripts were first realised by the American Baptist missionaries who established the first printing press at Sibasagar in about 1840. The early missionary preachers headed by N. Brown collected some old manuscripts between 1840-1850. These were later transferred to the library of Kamarupa Anusandhan Samiti. A few works collected by the Mission were also published serially in different issues of their monthly magazine, Arunoday (1846-1880). The collection contained a few works of Shankaradeva and Ramasaraswati, a few Sanskrit works on the Smriti and astrology. The notable chronicle Kamarupar buranji, later edited and published by S.K. Bhuyan, was also collected by the Mission along with a few other chronicles.

Edward Gait instituted in 1895 a regular investigation about the Assamese manuscripts, especially those of historical interest. His efforts have been recorded in his bulletin Progress of Historical Research in Assam published in 1897. The Assamese Language Improvement Society of Calcutta also made a preliminary survey of both published and unpublished books and manuscripts and a booklet incorporating the names of authors and their works numbering two hundred was published in 1898.

A serious attempt to survey and collect manuscripts in Assam was made in 1912 by Archdale Earle, Chief Commissioner of Assam, when he deputed the late Hemchandra Goswami for that purpose. During the short period of six months on deputation, Goswami visited almost all the districts of the Assam valley and also Cooch Behar. He examined not only the manuscripts in possessions of private individuals, but also of the important satras of Assam including those in the river-island of the Brahmaputra. Goswami collected a lot of information about the locations and the owners of manuscripts and collected nearly 250 manuscripts which were deposited in the library of Kamarupa Anusandhan Samiti which had been established in 1912 on the initiative of Goswami, Padmanath Bhattacharya, Kanakalal Barua and a few other enthusiastic gentlemen. The Samiti collected and added more manuscripts to its library.

In 1928, S.K. Bhuyan, then a Professor of English in the Cotton College, took initiative to start a new institution for collecting, preserving and publishing manuscripts and records with the help of the Commissioner of the Assam Valley Division. This institution known as the Department of Historical and Antiquarian Studies, was later taken over by the Government of Assam for the promotion of historical and antiquarian studies in Assam. The department has so far collected nearly three thousand manuscripts and early records. In addition to the Assamese manuscripts, the department has a large number of Sanskrit and Tai-Ahom manuscripts also. Some illustrated manuscripts, including the Hastividya by Sukumar Barkath, Samkhachudabadha by Ramanarayana Kaviraja Chakravarti, Dharma-purana by Kavichandra Dvija and a few others are valuable acquisitions of the department. The department preserves a large number of medieval chronicles and Vamsavalis of royal dynasties some of which have been printed and published by S.K. Bhuyan with critical introduction.

The University of Gauhati established a department for manuscript collection and preservation in 1960. It has so far collected approximately four thousand manuscripts. This is the largest collection in Assam. About forty-five per cent of the collected manuscripts are Sanskrit works on different subjects like smriti, kavya, puranas, tantras, astrology, astronomy, medicine, etc. The collection preserves some of the parvas and kandas of the Sanskrit Mahabharata and Ramayana. About fifty per cent of the total collection are Assamese works in both verse and prose. There are a large number of medieval Vaishnava plays, kavyas, adaptation and translation of the epics and the puranas. There are thirty Tai-Khamti manuscripts of palm leaves painted in golden colour, and a few old Bengali manuscripts written on country-made paper called 'tulapat'. Two complete manuscripts of the Padma-purana of Narayanadeva are preserved here. The manuscripts collected by the Kamarupa Sanjivani Sabha, which were preserved in the library of Nalbari Sanskrit College, have now been transferred to the newly established antiquarian institution named Prachya Bharati. Sanskrit manuscripts form the major part of the collections of the Kamarupa Sanjivani Sabha. The Department of Assamese of Dibrugarh University started a manuscript collection branch a few years back. Traditionally well-known satras, once patronised by the Ahom kings, are known to have many manuscripts which are being preserved unscientifically as sacred legacies.

MANUSCRIPTS (Bengali). Bangiya Sahitya Parishad, founded in 1901, setting down its objectives, emphasised the need for the "collection, acquisition and publication of old Bengali manuscripts". With this objective, the Parishad started to collect Bengali manuscripts from different parts of the country. The total collection now numbers more than seven thousand of which some are most valuable in point of date and literary quality. In this connection, the manuscript of Srikrishna kirtan by Baru Chandidas, Shunya purana by Dwija Ramai, the collection of Vaishnava padavali and other manuscripts of the Mangal kavya, the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, Chaitanya bhagabata and Chaitanya charitamrita may be mentioned. The details of Bengali manuscripts collected by the Parishad were first given in the pages of Bangiya Sahitya Parishad Patrika in 1904 and the process is still continuing. The Parishad began to publish descriptive catalogue of Bengali manuscripts entitled Bangla prachin puthir bibaran in 1930. The first volume was published by Basantaranjan Ray. Subsequent volumes were edited by Tarapasanna Bhattacharya, Abdul Karim Sahitya Visharad, Shibratan Mitra and Chintaharan Chakravarti. The credit for publishing the first descriptive catalogue, however, goes to the University of Calcutta. As soon as the post-graduate Department of Bengali studies came into existence, Calcutta University started the work of collecting manuscripts under the leadership of Acharya Dineshchandra Sen. The help and inspiration from Sir Asutosh Mukherjee were immense. A separate Bengali Manuscript Department was established in 1919. Basantaranjan Ray was appointed as its first Keeper. Calcutta University brought out the Descriptive Catalogue of Bengali Manuscripts Vol. I in 1926, which was edited by Basantaranjan Ray and Basantakumar Chatterjee. The second volume was edited by both of them along with Manindramohan Basu in 1928. The third volume was edited by Manindramohan Basu in 1940. The first volume of A General Catalogue of Bengali Manuscripts was published by the Calcutta University. It was edited by Manindramohan Basu. In it the description of manuscripts up to number 2111 has been detailed. The second volume edited by Manindramohan Basu and Prafullachandra Pal gives the description of those from 2112 to 6927. In the collection of the Calcutta University, the maximum number of manuscripts are of the Ramayana of Kritibas, Chaitanya bhagavata of Brindaban Das, Chaitanya charitamrita of Krishnadas Kaviraj, the Mahabharata by Kashiram Das, Kabindra Sanjay, Srikan Nandy, Nityananda Ghosh, Dwija Abhiram, Daibakinandan Das, Shankar Kabichandra and others. Some of the most notable collections are the Manasa mangal of Narayan Dev (4 mss) and the Padavalis collected by Kshirodchandra Ray.

Visva Bharati University joined this venture. The result was the publication in 1951 of Puthi parichaya Vol. I edited by Panchanan Mandal. In this volume a description of the first five hundred manuscripts (of which 181 manuscripts were almost unknown) has been given. In the second volume another five hundred and in the third volume yet another five hundred manuscripts were included. The second and the third volumes both edited by Panchanan Mandal were published in 1958 and 1963 respectively. The total number of Bengali manuscripts in the Visva Bharati University is more than six thousand.

Nitai Library (after the name of Prabhu Nityananda) was established by Amulyadhan Ray Bhatta at Panichati in 1898. Ray Bhatta collected many manuscripts. The library was ultimately shifted to Barahanagore Path Bari, where the then Acharya Ramdas Babaji gave his consent to re-established the same with renewed vigour from Gauriya Vaishnav Sammelani. It was re-named Sri Sri Gauranga Grantha Mandir. The total number of collected manuscripts in the Gauranga Grantha Mandir is 3306 of which 2185 are in Sanskrit, 1100 in Bengali, 7 in Oriya, 4 in Marathi, 5 in Hindi and 5 in Braja bhasha. A description of all the manuscripts is available in Prachin puthir bibaran o talika (1967) edited by Baishnabcharan—das Panchatirtha.

Vrindavan Research Institute (Vrindavan), collected nearly two thousand Bengali manuscripts which were edited by Tarapada Mukherjee. The most important manuscript is Chaitanya bhagata by Brindaban Das because it contains several additional chapters. The occurrence of the title Sri Chaitanya chandra mangala in the colophon is another feature for which the manuscript is significant.

The Asiatic Society of Bengal has recently published The Catalogus Catalogorum of Bengali Manuscripts (1978). This monumental work has been compiled and edited by Jatindramohan Bhattacharya. With regard to the Bengali manuscripts, this work is undoubtedly the best source of information.

Many manuscripts are there in individual collections. Of those who have collected manuscripts individually, mention needs be made of Jatindramohan Bhattacharya, Sukumar Sen and Panchanan Mandal.

MANUSCRIPTS (Kannada). The manuscripts of literary works in different Indian languages form one of the important sources of Indian literature. The preservation of these age-old manuscripts, their deciphering and editing are a continuous process in the development of Indian literature. As an original source-material for literature, the manuscript-libraries form an integrated part of Research Institutes of language and literature. Such manuscript-libraries are found scattered all over India. In Karnataka, they are found in different forms such as mutts, temples, sections of Research Institutes, parts of institutes of Studies in Kannada language and literature.

In Karnataka, the collection of manuscripts was undertaken by different institutions. The Oriental Research Institute of the Mysore University was the first educational institution to take up the task of manuscript-collection. It collected a large number of manuscripts in Sanskrit, Prakrit, Kannada and other Indian languages written mostly in Kannada characters. Nearly six thousand works in Kannada have been collected and they are now preserved in the manuscript-section of the Institute of Kannada Studies (IKS) of the Mysore University.

The collection of manuscripts in the IKS contains nearly 6000 works which are varied and valuable. Of these, the Ms. (manuscript) of Gunavarma's Pushpadanta-purana is dated 1436. The Ms. of Adipurana written by the great poet, Pampa, who is the first among the Kannada poets in available literature, has been preserved in the form of microfilm in the IKS. The date of this original Ms. is 1379 and the original is available in the Jain Mutt at Sravanabelgola. Another important Ms. available in the IKS is that of the Mahabharata written by Naranappa. It was copied in 1554. The importance of this Ms. lies in the fact that every leaf has holes fixed with silver rings on account of which the thread inserted through them does not cut the leaf while binding all the leaves together. The Ms. of Gadayuddha written by Ranna is said to have been copied in 1342. If this date is accepted, then it will be the oldest Ms. in this entire collection. But the difference between the original writing of the text and the writing of the copied date makes it difficult to accept the date. Thus it leaves some doubt as to the exact date of the Ms.

The collection contains some other Mss. which are important due to their special characteristics. One of them is that of Bhashabhushana written by Nagavarma II. It is written in the Malayalam script, but the language is Sanskrit and the text is in Kannada grammar. This reveals that the copyist knew Sanskrit, Kannada and Malayalam. Similarly, the Bhagavata is also written in Malayalam script. From this it appears that persons knowing Malayalam but ignorant of Kannada script were interested in studying Kannada literature. Mummadi Krishnaraja wrote the Bharata in prose. The palm-leaf used for this work is the largest in this collection. The length of this is $36\frac{1}{3}$ " and the width is $2\frac{1}{8}$ ". This much can be said about the palm-leaf manuscripts.

The invention of writing paper reduced the significance of palm-leaves. As a result, the use of paper for writing books became popular among the writers. The earliest dated paper Ms. is that of Vardhamana-purana of Nagavarma II which was copied in 1567. The original Ms. of this work is preserved in the Jain Mutt at Mudabidre. The microfilm and photostat copies of this Ms. are kept in the IKS.

The IKS has prepared Descriptive Catalogues in nine volumes. Nearly 5000 works have been covered in them. The IKS is making every effort to collect Mss. either in originals or through microfilms from all other sources. The sources of Kannada Mss. are scattered in and out of Karnataka state. In the city of Mysore itself, there are places like Saraswati Bhavan which is housed in the Maharaja's Sanskrit College where we find a large number of Kannada Mss.. A catalogue of nearly 400 Mss.. was published in 1905.

In 1939 at Dharwar, Kannada Research Institute was established to explore the research material in Kannada language and literature. This Institute has published Descriptive Catalogues in ten volumes translated which cover only 650 works. There are nearly 4000 Mss. in this Institute. The Institute of Kannada Studies of the Karnataka University at Dharwar has got a collection of about 4000 Mss. which are concerned mostly with Veerasaiva philosophy. A Descriptive Catalogue of this collection is yet to be published.

The Institute of Kannada Studies of the Bangalore University has also collected nearly 5000 works. This collection is important for the reason that it has some rare Mss. Among the dated Mss. is the one that of Dharma pariksha of Vrittavilasa which was copied in 1403. This is the earliest palm-leaf Ms. in this collection. The Institute has not yet published any catalogue of its collection.

In Bangalore itself there is another institution called Kannada Sahitya Parisat that has collected a large number of Mss. which are not preserved carefully.

In Karnataka, there exist some private institutions such as Jain Mutt at Mudabidre, Karkala, Varanga, Hombuja and Shravanabelgola which possess Mss. of Kannada works written by Jaina writers. Pandit K. Bhujabala Shastri published his Dakshina prantiya tadaptriya tranthasuchi in 1948 wherein are included the names of all available Mss. in the Jain Maths at Mudabidre, Karkal, and Varanga only. This catalogue contains the description of not only Kannada Mss. but also of those in Prakrit and Sanskrit. It mentions about 500 Kannada works.

The Mudabidre collection contains a very rare Ms. of Vardhamana purana written by Nagavarma II. It was found in 1974. It was written down on paper in 1567. Very recently it was added to the collection at Mudabidre. The IKS, Mysore, published it in 1974. The Jain Mutt of Sravanabelgola brought out a Catalogue of all the available Mss. in 1980 which notes down nearly 300 Kannada works. The Mutts at Karkal, Varanga and Hombuja have not yet published their catalogues.

Ananthanathabasadi at Mandya has a collection of nearly 100 Kannada Mss. It is this collection which supplied the Ms. of Vardhamanapurana of Jinasena Deshavratī which was not hitherto known to the Kannada literary world. Besides the Jain Mutt, the Mutt owned by the Virashaivas and Brahmins also have maintained some Mss. of Kannada works belonging to Virashaiva and Brahmin writers.

The movement of manuscript collection did not end with the institutions. It was continued by individuals. This is clear from the findings of the Mss. lying with some scholars in the field of Kannada literature. It is very interesting to note that some individuals such as Pandits, Pujaris, etc. have some Mss. which are preserved as a mark of devotion to religion. They never allow others to touch them, nor even permit to read them. The Mss. in possession of some persons are lying useless. There are some persons in whose houses Mss. are in a state of neglect because they are ignorant of the value of Mss. With great difficulty some of the Mss. lying with such families have been microfilmed and the microfilms are preserved in the IKS of Mysore. Among such collection was found a rare work caled Rajavali kathegalu written by Devachandra. It is in a very good condition.

The places like Chamarajanagar, Maleyuru, Harave in the Mysore district have a good collection of Mss.. The IKS of Mysore University has microfilmed almost all the Mss that are available in the aforesaid places.

There are Kannada Mss. in some institutions outside the State of Karnataka, places like Madras, Kolhapur, Bahubali, Poona, Hyderabad and Agra. Apart from these, there are places like Mehabubnagar in Andhra Pradesh and Karanja in Maharashtra where we find some collections of Kannada Mss.

The Government Oriental Manuscript Library at Madras (Tamil Nadu) has done pioneering work in the collection of Mss. belonging to different languages. The work of Mss. collection was taken up by scholars like Col. Meckenzie, C.P. Brown and others in the early 19th century. In this library, a large number of Kannada Mss. are available. Descriptive Catalogues of these Mss. have been already published. The first volume was brought out in 1934. It has published eight such volumes so far. In addition to this an alphabetical index of Kannada Mss. preserved in the Govt. Manuscripts Library at Madras was published in 1952. It contains nearly 1829 entries.

The collection at this library includes not only important Kannada Mss., but also inscriptions, kavyas, kaifiats, Sthala puranas. Thus the Govt. Oriental Manuscripts Library was a model to all the institutions in Karnataka which followed its system of manuscript collection. The IKS of Mysore has microfilmed almost all the Kannada Mss. of this library. Some of the original Mss. of Kannada works have been handed over to the Mysore and Karnataka Universities. The Adyar Library in Madras has 60 Kannada Mss. which are not so important.

In Kolhapur (Maharashtra), the Lakshmisena Jain Mutt has got a very good collection consisting of 600 Mss.. Some of them are very rare. It is said that a catalogue of these Mss. was long back published, but unfortunately it is not avialable. Near Kolhapur, Bahubali is a Jain holy place where we find a Manuscript Library containing Kannada Mss. Here most of them are Sanskrit and Prakrit Mss. which have Kannada commentary. The Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute (BORI), Poona, also has some Kannada Mss. of which the most important is that of Vikramarjunavijaya of Pampa, who is said to be the earliest great poet of Karnataka.

MANUSCRIPTS-SANSKRIT

The Osmania University Library at Hyderabad possesses some Kannada Mss. a catalogue of which has been published. The Ms. of Shabdamanidarpana by Keshiraja is a rare one having altogether a different version from that of others available elsewhere. In Arra (Bihar), the Jaina Siddhanta Bhavan has got the biggest Manuscript Library consisting of Mss. in different languages of which Kannada is also one. There are about 200 Kannada Mss. in this collection. Some of them are rare and the Ms. of Pampa's Vikramarjunavijaya is available here. The most important Kannada Ms. is that of Durgasimha's Panchatantra which is helpful in determining the date of the author.

It is a matter of great pleasure to note that all the Mss. in different places mentioned above have been microfilmed by the IKS of Mysore. The microfilmed copies of the Mss. may be useful to scholars in future.

The India Office Library in London also has some Kannada Mss. which are of ordinary nature.

B.S.S.

MANUSCRIPTS (Sanskrit). Manuscript preparation has been a regular job in India. They were prepared for personal pleasure, religious obligations and at the bid-dings of religious or political heads. It has been a practice with persons that for sacred purposes manuscripts are preferred to printed books. The Gita, the Bhagavata, the Ramcharitmanasa, the two 'Sahasranamas' (Gopala and Vishnu) and the like were written by hand and included in the objects of daily worship. In the courts of native chiefs there were regular scribes for preparing manuscripts according to the wishes of the chief or the court pandits. In temples, ashramas, upasaras, maths, etc. preparation of manuscripts formed regular part of religious obligations. This resulted in a large number of manuscripts in these religious houses. In the royal houses the manuscripts were well-kept but in other places they could not be looked after properly. In palaces there were separate apartments and in some places there were vaults where the manuscripts could be housed in safety but most of the places where manuscripts were kept did not provide good conditions of security with the result that countless manuscripts were destroyed through the ravages of times, moisture, insects, rats and improper handling. But in spite of all these unfavourable circumstances there are plenty of good manuscripts with private persons, temples and ashramas. The number of Sanskrit manuscripts is the largest for it has been the language of religion in this country.

Many scholars from abroad had an eye on this treasure, while some of them had hatred for this sacred literature and got it burnt, many others understood its value and they succeeded in procuring them as gifts from their Indian friends. Quite a number of manuscripts was purchased at very low price and not a few were looted when certain native states were conquered. In India many institutions came into existence with the purpose of collecting and preserving manuscripts with Government or private funds. Thus there exist several collections of manuscripts in and out of India. Many scholars tried to get an estimate of Sanskrit manuscripts in several parts of the world. They included some foreign scholars, mostly Germans and some Indians.

There are many individuals in India who possess very large number of manuscripts but these collections could not be catalogued for lack of proper information. The L.D. Vidyamandir in Ahmedabad under Punyavijaya collections has a good store of Sanskrit manuscripts of which some catalogues also exist. In part III there is a mention of some ten thousand selected Sanskrit manuscripts besides plenty more in parts II and I. In Baroda the manuscripts are in good condition and the catalogues describe some 16 thousand manuscripts. In Vol. III there are indexes of authors and books. V. Raghavan took a great deal of pains in classifying the manuscripts and preparing the catalogue. The Sanskrit University Library, Varanasi, has more than forty thousand manuscripts including volumes on the Vedas the puranas, stotra, tantra, darshana and astronomy. Most of the manuscripts have been catalogued under scholarly supervision. In Varanasi, the Kashiraja Trust has also a good number of manuscripts very many of which belong to the various puranas. They have utilised some of the manuscripts in bringing out some puranic texts. H.H. the Maharaja of Bikaner has a good library of Sanskrit manuscripts called the Anupa Sanskrit Library. Long back some 1800 manuscripts were classified. There are some good manuscripts on specified subjects. The Bombay branch of the R.A.S. has more than two thousand Sanskrit manuscripts. The Elphinstone College has two lists of Sanskrit manuscripts. The Bombay University has about three thousand manuscripts in Sanskrit with a catalogue of detailed description. The Sanskrit College Library and the Bangiya Sahitya Parishad are two important places in Calcutta where Sanskrit manuscripts are available in large numbers. The National Museum and the National Archives in Delhi have some manuscripts, many of which have been nicely treated in their laboratories. The Mahavira Jain Pustakalaya in Delhi has also some manuscripts in Sanskrit. The V.V.R.I. in Hoshiarpur has done good work in manuscript collection and some ten thousand manuscripts have been duly catalogued with the help of the Central Government. With the help of these manuscripts they have done some good work on Vedic studies. The Jaipur branch of the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute and the palace library of the Maharaja also have a good collection of manuscripts. Some sixteen thousand manuscripts have been catalogued. Jodhpur is the head-quarter of the Rajasthan Oriental Research Institute with several branches all over Rajasthan. In almost all the branches there are separate catalogues of Sanskrit manuscripts. In Jodhpur alone there are about sixty thousand manuscripts, most of which are in Sanskrit. G.C. Sinha and J.P. Sinha worked together to establish the Akhil Bharatiya Sanskrit Parishad with a large number of Sanskrit manuscripts.

In South India, the Adyar Library in Madras has a large number of Sanskrit manuscripts classified under several heads such as Veda, kavya, grammar, nataka, advaita, mimamsa. The other place in Madras where more than fifteen thousand Sanskrit manuscripts are collected is the Government Oriental Manuscript Library. The Mysore Saraswati Bhandaram Library of H.H. the Maharaja of Mysore and the Mysore Government Oriental Library are there in Mysore. Another important place with good manuscript collections is Poona. In the Bhandarkar Oriental Research Institute several thousand manuscripts have been well catalogued with proper descriptions. The Saraswati Mahal Library of Tanjore is very rich and has more than thirty thousands manuscripts. In the palace also there is a library; a classified index of the Sanskrit manuscripts there was prepared by Burnell who listed some twelve thousand manuscripts. In Trivandrum there are the Curator's Office Library and the Oriental Manuscript Library with several thousand Sanskrit manuscripts.

In the North some manuscript collection has been done recently. They are attached to some of the Universities like the Ujjain, Mithila, Udaipur. In Allahabad the Ganganath Institute has good many Sanskrit manuscripts and in Vrindaban we have the Vrindaban Research Institute with about fourteen thousand Sanskrit manuscripts, of which some eleven thousand have been catalogued. Some other institutes like the Vraj Academy have been set up with the object of making collections. The Government has established some Sanskrit Institutes and they devote some of their energy collecting manuscripts. Thus in India in all recognised institutions and education centres, we have Sanskrit manuscripts and the good thing is that now, apart from collection, attempts are being made for preservation and conservation as well. Editing and publication are also in progress.

Outside India also there is a good collection of manuscripts in several Universities and other educational institutions, having interest in Orientology. In the Wien University of Austria, there are several Sanskrit manuscripts which have been edited and published with German or English notes. In Germany there are a number of Indologisches Seminars both in the West and East parts. Most of them have good Sanskrit manuscripts. Aufrecht prepared a Catalogus Catalogorum—an alphabetical register of Sanskrit manuscripts in two parts, and Schubring, Alsdorf, Hacker, Janert in their respective Universities of Hamburg, Munster and Cologne devoted themselves to the collection of Sanskrit manuscripts and working on them. In Berlin (East) and Leipzig also there are a good number of manuscripts related to the Vedas. In Great Britain the School of Oriental and African studies has a good collection of Sanskrit manuscripts. In Oxford we have the famous Bodleian Library with several thousand of Sanskrit manuscripts. In Cambridge also there are some manuscripts. Apart from these France, Italy, Sweden, Japan, U.S.S.R., Tibet also have a collections of Sanskrit manuscripts. America evinced great interest in Indian manuscripts. There are some catalogued and sorted manuscripts from India in the Library of Congress, Main Exhibition hall in U.S.A. In the Free University of Philadelphia and the Brown University of Providence and some other University Libraries there are Sanskrit manuscripts.

Some other countries like Russia may also be mentioned which are interested in Indology and as such they have some Sanskrit manuscripts in their respective sections.

M.L.G.

MANUSCRIPTS (Tamil). Manuscripts that are found in Tamil are of two kinds—one, palm leaf manuscripts and the other, paper manuscripts. Before the advent of printed books, the bulk of Tamil works were written on palm leaves till about the middle of the nineteenth century and even later. Palm leaf manuscripts have their own advantages and disadvantages. Dried leaves cut to size and treated are used for writing. These can be preserved for two to three centuries. A styles pointed pencil of iron, known as ezhuttani (letter-nail) is used for etching on the soft surface of the palm leaf, but care has to be taken that circles are not to be completed and rectangular or square formations of letters are left open at one end, avoiding the risk of portions falling out. A voluminous literature with a continuity of over two thousand years could be preserved for posterity through this method of successive copying and manuscripts of a single work could be traced in different quarters of the Tamil country, which were of great use in bringing out standard editions of the work after comparing the different readings. As in the processes of writing, time and labour are involved, only a few copies could be prepared. And so, this drove certain scholars to get by heart classics running to tens of thousands of lines. There were many walking encyclopaedias. Patrons of learning, scholars, religious centres, institutions of learning, temples, chieftains were the repositories of such palm leaf manuscripts. The indefatigable work of U.V. Swaminataiyar and C.V. Damodaram Pillai deserve special mention. The Madurai Tamil Sangam's collections were considerable and attainable to scholars. as may be seen from the prefaces on printed editions of Tamil works by scholars.

While the practice of writing on palm leaf has been completely given up at present, even the number of persons capable of reading them is fast dwindling. Thousands of such manuscripts, scattered and preserved by private individuals, institutions and libraries all over the world, can be of no use unless they are put to use. Persons have to be trained in this art of reading the manuscripts, deciphering them where necessary. A few hundred copies may be printed so that those can get into the national archives of various countries and continuity is maintained. Microfilming in a number of cases will save the manuscripts from extinction. Valuable material covering a span of over two millennia written on such diverse topics as literature, religion, philosophy, medicine, history, music, dance, art and astrology, are available in these Tamil manuscripts.

Tamil manuscripts prior to the nineteenth century were predominantly on palm leaves. Traders and missionaries from the West might have used paper. For the purpose of the study here, both kinds are taken into account. A major portion of the Tamil manuscripts owe their origin to the soil of the Tamil country, whether in the present day Tamilnadu or in foreign countries. Their number, if assiduously collected and listed from Tamilnadu alone, may run into several thousands. A sizable number of Tamil manuscripts is found in Europe. Besides the private collections which have not yet come to light in Tamilnadu, those that are listed and/or catalogued would provide a fascinating account. Manuscriptology in Tamil is in a fluid stage gaining momentum, a welcome sign.

Among the repositories of Tamil manuscripts in the country, Saraswati Mahal Library in Tanjore deserves mention. A descriptive catalogue of the Tamil manuscripts held here has been published in three volumes, containing all possible information required by a researcher, more than half a century ago in the twenties. The holdings listed and catalogued number 1,264. Each and every entry carries a brief description of the manuscript, extracts from the opening and concluding portions, colophon, besides information regarding the number of leaves and whether printed. The manuscript have been classified under several heads broadly divided under (1) Literature and Grammar and (2) Medicine, accounting for 1,087 and 177 items respectively. The names of the authors and the works have been alphabetically furnished and separately too, indicating important references. This descriptive catalogue can serve as a model for those interested in the field both in India and abroad. There may be many more manuscripts in the library still to be covered.

The doyen of Tamil scholars, Swaminatha Iyer was a pioneer in the collection of palm leaf manuscripts who went in search of every nook and corner of Tamilnadu. His collections are housed in the library named after him under the auspices of the Kalakshetra, Madras. About 2,500 palm leaf manuscripts and just over 700 paper manuscripts are found there. Of these 2,000 have been printed, leaving about a thousand still to see the light of day. Swaminatha Iyer edited about 90 works and the Library has published about 60 manuscripts.

An alphabetical index of Tamil manuscripts in the Government Oriental Manuscripts Library, Madras, has been issued in four volumes. The fourth has listed 5,537 works, some of the most important ones of which are copies of stone inscriptions and copper plate grants. A grammatical work on 'prabhandams' called Prabandha dipikai deserves mention, the author of which is not named. The holdings include treatises on medicine, grammar, folklore, drama, philosophy, religion, etc. Denuded of a substantial portion of Tamil palm leaf manuscripts collected since the early years of the 20th century, Madurai Tamil Sangam's holding at present number 275 palm leaf manuscripts in good condition and 87 damaged ones. These are in different disciplines and a substantial portion can be brought to light by printing and publishing them for public consumption. In Kumaradevar Vira Shaiva Mutt, Turaiyur and Vriddachalam there are about 500 Tamil cadjan leaf manuscripts mostly relating to philosophy, literature, grammar etc. These include the published and the unpublished ones. The International Institute of Tamil Studies, Madras, has collections of palm leaf manuscripts which include 86 complete ones and 120 incomplete ones. The Bhagavadgita by Bhattar, Kolakala arankan charitram and palm leaf manuscript of C.J. Beschi's Chaturakarati are among the valuable collection.

S. Vaiyapuri Pillai's collection of Tamil palm leaf manuscripts is kept in the National Library, Calcutta. 335 manuscripts are listed and catalogued. 77 manuscripts of the Kambaramayanam alone can be seen here. Sangam literature, dictionaries, Tirukkural, devotional literature of the Nayanmars and Alvars can be found in this collection. Jivakachintamani with Naccinarkkiniyar's commentary written in 1611 Nannool (q.v.) commentary in 1982 and Divakaram in 1702 are a few of the valuable collections.

The Andhra University, Waltair, has a collection of 78 manuscripts, predominantly Tamil, in Telugu script mostly relating to the Tamil Divya prabandham.

In the Osmania University, Hyderabad, 140 palm leaf manuscripts relating to Tamil are held in safe custody. These works, although relating to Tamil, are in Telugu script. Harishchandra natakam belongs to the 17th century and folk songs are introduced in appropriate places. The Ramayanam manuscript is 300 years old containing songs of popular appeal. Kerala University Oriental Manuscripts Library holds 3,281 manuscripts mostly published. A few are yet to be published.

A few of the holders of Tamil manuscripts among the hundreds of organisations and individuals are (1) Tiruvamathur Dandapani Swamigal Mutt, (2) Chidambaram Isana Mutt, (3) Kanchipuram Gnanaprakasha Swamigal Mutt, (4) Kanchi Kamakoti Shankaracharya Swamingal Mutt, (5) Tiruvavaduthurai Adhinam, (6) Dharmapuram Adhiram, (7) Tamilnadu Government Department of Archaeology, (8) Tamilnadu Government Archives, Madras, (9) Deivasigamani Gounder's Collections in the Perur College, Coimbatore, etc.

A preliminary investigation of the European sources for Tamil manuscripts by Gregory James is itself a telling account of the wealth of material still mostly unknown to the scholarly world on Tamilology. He has made a study of the Tamil manuscripts lying in the vaults of archives and other sanctuaries. According to a recent survey, twenty-one European countries are having Tamil manuscripts in 88 centres the number of whose holdings range from 1 to 40, in all accounting for just over 300, exclusive of the holdings of the British Library, London and the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. "The major national catalogues, e.g., of France or Germany, or of the great libraries such as the British Library or the Bodleian Library in Oxford, the Leningrad State Library, or the Bibliothèque Nationale in Paris, are for the most part, well executed and accurate in their own description of their Tamil holdings." The major source of reference for Oriental manuscripts in Europe is J. Pearson, but his catalogue is to be used with caution. The term Malabar under which manuscripts are sometime catalogued in European countries, is a misleading one detracting the attention of the scholar to gloss over. Invariably, the reference is to Tamil. A visit to even the most obscure library in Europe is most rewarding to a Tamil scholar where Tamil manuscripts are lying dormant in some centres, uncatalogued and unknown.

MANUSCRIPTS (Urdu). It was around the midnineteenth century that attention began to be paid to compiling catalogues of the manuscripts preserved at innumerable places all over the country. Stuart and Sprenger initiated the move by preparing catalogues of the manuscripts of books stocked by Tipu Sultan in Karnataka and by Nawab-Wazirs of Awadh. Most of the books mentioned in these catalogues are not available anywhere in India. Towards the beginning of the present century, Bloomhart prepared a compilation of the manuscripts collected in India office. Only a few of these are in National Library, Calcutta, and National Archives, New Delhi. In 1929, Abdul Qadir Sarvari prepared a list of 67 manuscripts in the Osmania University Library. Nasirud-Din Hashmi prepared a list of some 159 manuscripts with their details mentioned in his book, Europe men Dakni Maktutat. Mohiud-Din Qadiri 'Zore', a little later, compiled an exhaustive list of Urdu manuscripts running into many volumes. These volumes, which were not available, have been brought out by the Bureau for Promotion of Urdu, Ministry of Education and Culture, Government of India, in five volumes. Najib Asraf Nadwi brought out a book containing details of Urdu, Persian and Arabic manuscripts in the library of Jama Masjid, Bombay. Besides, Nasirud-Din Hashmi prepared a few lists of the manuscripts stocked in the famous libraries of Hyderabad (Deccan).

India International Centre, New Delhi, came into being to get exhaustive lists prepared with a view to bringing the manuscripts to the notice of the scholars and researchers. The project director, H.K. Kaul, prepared a catalogue in respect of Delhi Public Library, Ghalib Academy, Harding Public Library, Indian Council for Cultural Relations, Institute of Islamic Studies, Jamia Millia Islamia Library, National Archives, National Museum, Naziria Public Library, Red Fort Archaeological Museum and Delhi University Library.

Besides Delhi, there are other important places where a good number of Urdu manuscripts is available. Mention may be made of National Library, Calcutta, Khudabakhsh Library (Bankipur, Patna), Shibly Academy Library, Azamgarh Nadwatul-Ulema Library Lucknow, Raza Library Rampur, State Library, Bhopal. The total number of manuscripts may roughly be around four thousand. These libraries are particularly important and are well-managed and adequately financed.

Besides, there are many personal libraries containing quite a large number of rare manuscripts. Masud Hasan "Adib" had as many as 980 manuscripts out of which about 600 manuscripts contain 'Marsias', 'Salams', 'Rubayiats' written by Anis, Dabir and those poets belonging to the first line of marsia writers. His love for the manuscripts stood in the way of their being properly classified and scientifically categorized. Mention may also be made of Thakur Moti Singh Hasrat who was a 'vakil' (lawyer) by profession and a social and political worker. He had quite a big library of his own, containing besides published works, two hundred manuscripts of the works written by poets and writers of Rohilkhand Division.

No attempts seem to have been made at persuading the persons having valuable manuscripts to part with their collections. Personal libraries in Hyderabad, Bhopal, Rampur, Patna, Bareilly, Shahjahanpur, Tonk, and religious places of Sufi saints, etc. continue to be almost terra incognita waiting for a devoted Odyssey launched and financed by State Governments and Government of India.

MANUSMRITI (Sanskrit). Manu appears to have been the highest authority in ancient India on religious and secular law. The name occurs in the Rigveda (i. 80.16, viii. 63.1, etc.). The Taittiriya samhita (II.2. 10.2), the Tandya-mahabrahmana (23.16.17), the Aitareya brahmana (V. 14), the Shatapatha brahmana, the Nirukta (Chap. III), Apastamba-dharmasutra (II. 7.16.1), Mahabharata (XII 21.12), Naradasmriti (prose introduction), etc. also mention Manu. He is variously referred to as 'father', father of Nabhanedishtha, Savarni, Vaivasva-ta, Svayambhuva, Prachetasa, etc. Manu is mentioned inter alia, in the Mrichchhakatika, Jaimini-bhashya of Shabara, Brihaspati-smriti, etc.

The extant Manusmriti is believed by P.V. Kane to have been composed in the period between the 2nd century B.C. and 2nd century A.D. The influence of the Manusmriti spread in many foreign countries, e.g. Burma, Cambodia, Java and Bali. The Dhammathat, which governs the Burmese in modern times, is based on Manu. Some passages of the Rigveda (e.g. i. 112.16) clearly indicate that Manu was a sage. The Manuscript (vii. 42) itself mentions Manu as a king. The Mahabharata (I-XII. 336. 38, 49) states that Svayambhuva Manu promulgated dharma which was propounded by the Supreme Being in one million verses. The Naradasmriti (prose introduction) states that Manu composed 1,00,000 verses in 1080 chapters and 24 prakaranas and imparted the same to Narada who abridged it into 12,000 verses, and taught it to Markandeya who again reduced the verses to 8,000 which were passed on to Sumati Bhargava who compressed the verses to 4,000.

In the Manusmriti (i.32-33, 58-60) we are told that Brahma taught the shastra to Manu who passed it on to ten sages, and he told the sages who approached him that his pupil Bhrigu would impart it to them. The number and names of persons named Manu vary in the Puranas. For example, the Padma refers to fourteen Manus, while the Vishnu speaks of twelve. The above account appears to be mythical. It is impossible to determine the author or compiler of the Manusmriti. It, however, seems probable that the work underwent at least three reductions. That Manu was not the sole author or compiler appears to be indicated by the fact that the name occurs dozens of times in the third person as 'Manurabraid'. etc.

There appears to have been a complete Kalpa tradition of the Manava school. But it does not seem to be proper to identify its author with that of the Manusmriti. Caland shows that some of verses of the Manusmriti, no doubt, tally with the Shraddhakalpa of the Manava school; but the description of funeral rites differs considerably in the two works. Brake points out some parallels; but no definite conclusion is warranted.

The Mahabharata appears (Drona, 7.1) to distinguish Svayambhuva Manu, promulgator of Dharmashastra, from Prachetasa Manu, propounder of Arthashastra.

In the present Manusmriti (i. 62), it is attributed to Svayambhuva Manu and then six other Manus among whom Prachetasa is not included. It contains 12 chapters and 2694 verses. It closely agrees to the views laid down in the Dharmasutras of Gautama, Baudhayana and Apastamba, and some verses of it are found, sometimes with varia lectiones, in the Dharmasutras of Vashishtha and Vishnu as well as in the Mahabharata. Kautilya shows (e.g.i.4, iii. 1.17) striking similarity with the Manusmriti (vii.101, 162; viii. 55. 332).

There are references also to Brihat or Vriddha Manu. P.V. Kane thinks that those verses, which were found in manuscripts of the Manusmriti, were regarded as Vriddha or Brihat-Manu's.

The Manusmriti deals mainly with the following topics: order of creation, source of dharma, duties of castes and stages of life, duties of kings, secular law, reciprocal duties of husband and wife, eulogy of gifts, expiation, the result of good and bad actions, knowledge of Atman.

Manusmriti dwells on the process of creation, life on the earth, varieties of animal and plant life. The text states that the sources of dharma are the Veda and the Smriti promulgated by those who are versed in the Veda. In Manusmriti, there are detailed rules for students. The householder's life is a pivot round which other stages of life revolve. So all stages are supported by the householder.

The performance of 'brahma-yajna' (study and teaching of the Veda), 'pitr-yajna' (offering libation to the manes), 'daiva yajna' (homa) 'bhuta-yajna' (offering food, etc to birds, beasts), 'Nriyajna' (hospitality) are among the duties of householder. These are ordained for expiating the sin arising from the killing of worms and insects at the fireplace, stone-slab for crushing condiments, broom, nestle and mortar, water-pot etc.

The life of brahmins, kshatriyas and vaishyas is a series of sacraments from birth to death. The shudras appear to have been subjected to many disabilities.

Manusmriti mentions seven kinds of 'dasas' (servant or slave). One of these is called 'krita' (purchased); he appears to have been a regular slave while the others might be mere servants.

Towards the so-called low-born people a liberal attitude is, however, noticeable in certain matters. For example, a salutary science can be learnt even from a shudra, and supreme knowledge acquired even from a chandala. Manusmriti also mentions several varieties of sins and modes of expiation. Sin is stated to be wiped out by repentance, confession, austerity and Vedic study. Manu's treatment of secular law does not show any marked difference from that of the Yajnavalkya-smriti.

The Manu-smriti mentions the Vedas, Vedangas, Aranyakas, Yoga, etc. It refers (xii.95) to Smriti opposed to the Veda. Heretics (iv. 30,61) and atheists (iv. 163) have been mentioned.

There is a large number of commentaries on the Manusmriti. Of the commentators, Medhatithi is the oldest (865 and 900 A.D.) Another famous commentator is Govindaraja (1000-1110 A.D.). The most popular commentator is Kullukabhatta (1100-1150 A.D.). His commentary, the Manvartha-muktavali, combines the merits of brevity and lucidity.

A.C.S.

MANVINI BHAVAI (Gujarati) is the fourth novel of Pannalal Patel. Out of the three novels written earlier, two were set against a rural background. His very first novel, Malela jiv (1940), established him as a novelist who could dive deep into the recesses of human heart and depict the inner world as lucidly and as pictorially as the outer world. In Manvinibhavai this art of his is at its best. The incidents of the outer world in the novel are important only so far as they generate tensions and inner conflicts and the writer takes the readers from the outer world to the wider, the deeper inner world. Besides, the novel is an important landmark as a regional novel as it depicts every facet of the land and people of the rural area of the north-eastern regions of Gujarat, and so the characters of the novel, besides being individuals, are the typical representatives of the region. Some critics have called it a regional novel and some others a period novel in the sense that there is a conflict between men and the time. But it is not exactly a period novel as it depicts the conflict between men and nature or the unseen forces which are at work. The time of the novel is the later half of the nineteenth century. Yet, the problems which are presented in the novel are the eternal conflict between the good and the evil and the ultimate victory of the forces of good.

The novel begins with the reminiscences of the central character, Kalu, sitting lonely in his field, away from all his near and dear ones. The readers see the pictures beginning from his birth. In a way the story is told in a flash-back style adopted for the first time in Gujarati. The hero is not merely a mute witness to the pictures of his life which appear and fade out, but he analyses each incident and its repercussion on him and the people of the village and the internal conflict which those incidents raised in him.

Kalu's father, Valo, is the village chief. He is blessed with a son at the fag end of his life. So he is overjoyed. His sister-in-law, Mali, is extremely jealous of him, and when he celebrates the birth of Kalu she curses and abuses them. When Kalu's mother, Rupan, retaliates, Valo tells her not to do so.

This quality of returning good for evil Kalu inherits from his father. In childhood, he is engaged to a girl Raju, a talented girl. Unfortunately Valo dies suddenly, and then, bad days confront Kalu at every step, which in a way is a blessing in disguise, because miseries and tragedy mould him into a man who is superior to others. Ultimately all accept him as their leader, putting unflinching faith in him. Young Kalu and Raju meet each other oft and on. They fall in love with each other. Mali who is vengeance personified, manoeuvres and succeeds in getting their engagement broken. In order to spite Kalu, she tries to get their son Nano married to Raju, but her designs are foiled by a committee of village headmen. It is the same committee which breaks the engagement of Raju and Kalu, and gets both of them married separately. Raju is married to an elderly person, Dyalji, and Kalu to a plain, simple girl, Bhali. Both of them are in a way separated because of marriage, yet, their marriages create new tangles. Raju is married to Bhali's uncle, and thus becomes Kalu's aunt-in-law. He sees the plight of the lady who would have been his wife, and returns home more depressed and heartbroken. Raju faces the adversity bravely. She gets the better of her emotions but their emotional attachment is not at all affected by their marriages. Raju's husband dies of a prolonged illness, and there is talk in the village that Raju is going to be married to Nano (Mali's son). Kalu, on hearing the rumour goes straight to Raju and declares, 'I will kill you, myself and Nano'. Raju pacifies him assuring that she would not do any such act. She also does everything to rehabilitate Kalu by persuading him to have a cordial relationship with his wife, Bhali. Kalu, on Raju's advice, goes to his in-laws, to bring Bhali home. He behaves decently with Bhali, but his attachment to Raju remains as deep as ever.

Then the whole village is engulfed by a severe drought. Kalu goes to Raju's house only to see that she is starving. There is nobody in the village to give her food.

The drought, instead of weakening them, makes them stronger. The ghastly descriptions of drought is one of the most powerful in Gujarati literature. The author depicts how the instinct of survival uproots the ethical values, human consideration for fraternity, culture and the finesse which human society has taken ages to evolve. In the village there is no food and nomads from the outskirts of the village attack the village. They first loot the food and then take away buffaloes and cows. Kalu goes to rescue the animals with a shord in his hand. He climbs the hill-top and sees a ghastly sight. A group of men, women and children is seen biting a buffalo to satisfy their hunger while the poor animal is screaming. Kalu cannot bear the ghastly sight and throws his sword towards them, to cut the animal and save it from the torture. When it becomes impossible to live in the village they migrate to the adjoining district in search of food. Kalu is chosen as their leader. He is worried and he curses God for their present plight.

A rich merchant has been giving doles and free food.

MAQALAT-MARALI MANNIGE

Having seen the long queue, Kalu is unable to endure any longer, so for the poor, hungry people of his clan he loots the food and distributes it equally among them. At the end of the novel clouds gather in the sky. The last scene brings rain, and we see Raju and Kalu in close embrace.

MAQALAT (Kashmiri) is a collection of articles on language, literature, culture and history of Kashmir by M.D. Hajini. The book also includes a review of Tagore's dramatics, and critical analysis of the poems of the Kashmiri mystic poet, Asad Parrey. The book was published in 1967.

Major portions of the book were written during the days of detention of the author in 1965. The articles appeared first in various issues of a local college magazine, Pratap. One essay, 'Mughal invasion of Kashmir', was translated and read before an invited gathering of the college called 'Bazm-i-Adab'.

The essays, basically written for students, are written in a lucid style and have a direct approach. The language is frequently ornamental with a satirical tinge that is akin to Hajini's conversation.

The essay on 'Evolution of Kashmiri languages' owes its inspiration to a line in the work of another Kashmiri writer, A.K. Rehbar. The line in History of Kashmiri Language reads: 'the influence on a language does not mean inclusion of foreign words'. Hajini, while elucidating the philological influences, gives a detailed account of the languages like Dardic, Hebrew, Sanskrit, Persian, Arabic, Urdu, English and Dogri. He also quotes a long list of words that have been added to the word-hoard of Kashmiri since the times of Nagas. Hajini is of the opinion that Pishachi is the origin of Kashmiri, and in support discusses various dialects spoken in different regions of the valley and Kishtwar. Rehbar, in contrast, believes in the greater influence of Sanskrit and Persian only. The essay on 'Kashmiri folk-literature in prose' elaborates how common people in their enthusiasm have made the legendary character of historical personality, King Yusuf Shah Chak (1545-1580), and his queen Habba Khatoon (16th century), the celebrated poetess of Kashmiri. As against its title, the essay gives in detail the stories of Akanadun, Himal Nagiray and Haba Khatoon that have reached us only in verse. The essay is divided into three parts, viz. (a) Meaning and origin of a legend, (b) Legends of the Hindu period in Kashmir and (c) legends during the Muslim rule. Kashri Talmihat (Wit of Kashmir) invites interest of common reader mainly because of the style in which these have been written and explained. Prior to Hajini, Kashmiri wits were recorded by Knowles and Sudarshan Kashkari with English renderings. Hajini classified them under three heads, viz. (1) Imported from India and Iran, (2) Borrowed from folk-tales and major historical events of Kashmir and (3) Brought out through oral traditions.

'Kashri saqafateki kenh tarikhi nishan' (some historical imprints of Kashmiri culture) pertains to some confusions concerning the early settlement of Kashmir before Aryans, that are likely to arise in the mind of a student of History. Nilamata purana, the oldest record of rituals, itself is of a doubtful origin. It is not known as yet whether its contents were the same as preached by Nila Naga, or as related by Vaishampayana to his disciple Janmejaya. Most of the scholars date it only to 7th century. Hajini discusses in details various influences on Kashmiri culture and religious beliefs derived from early settlers like Nagas, Pishachas and Aryans. The author is, however, bewitched by a book Jesus in Heaven on Earth written by Khwaja Nazr Ahmad and published from Lahore (Pakistan) in 1952. Though the contents of this book have faced ruthless criticism from almost all quarters, particularly in the case of burial of Jesus Christ in Srinagar and the meeting of Moses with Khwaja Khizar (a legendary guide) at Mount Nebu in Baramulla district. Hajini quotes a village 'Guzarbal' situated near Mount Nebu as 'Khizar Bal' (an inference that is not accepted by other scholars of Kashmir). The last two essays of the book pertain to the style and writings of the Kashmiri mystic poet, Asad Parrey, and dramatics of the Bengali poet, Rabindranath Tagore. Hajini has successfully tried to explain the style and art of these two classical literatures. The most interesting and epoch making essay in the collection pertains to the Mughal invasion of Kashmir. It is an admitted fact, though not recorded in the Indian History, that it was only through treachery and the breach of contract that Akbar was able to grab Kashmir. Hajini has tried to illucidate the factual situation of the time that brought the centuries-long slavery to the valley as a whole.

The book won the author Sahitya Akademi award in 1970.

MARALI MANNIGE (Kannada), a geneological novel by Shivaram Karanth, is a milestone both in the history of the Kannada novel and in the author's career as a novelist. It tells the story of three generations of a poor family of Kodi, a coastal hamlet. Rama Aithal with his wife Parvati and widowed sister Saraswati eked out a hard living from priesthood and a bit of land. Childless Aithal brings Satyabhama for a second wife. The early bitterness between the two wives yields place to mutual love but the birth of two children, Lachha and Subbi, only adds to the family's hardship. Rama Aithal manages with hopes built on his son who, however, goes astray and nurses a grievance that his father was miserly and partial to his sister. Hoping that marriage might cure him he marries him to Nagaveni but the marriage yields nothing but disease and suffering for the bride and Lachha continues in his own free and fast life. Broken-hearted, Parvati and Rama Aithal pass away. The father's good intentioned bequeathal of his property to Nagaveni only embitters Lachha who cheats his wife and reduces her to destitution besides burdening her with three children of whom only the youngest Rama survives. Nagaveni bears it all with unparalleled patience and waits for the son to complete his education. On the eve of the examination Rama is caught up in the whirl of the Salt Satyagraha; but on release he completes his studies and slaves in a hotel for a pittance. Unemployment takes him to Bombay where he teaches music and learns painting neither of which could feed him. The collapse of a wall during the rains throws up for Nagaveni a small treasure hidden by her father-in-law. This brings Rama back to the village where with his mother he tills the bit of land and succeeds as a teacher in the village school and so brings comfort to his long sorrowing mother.

In the bare summary of the novel which is a miniature epic we miss the entire background of the sea and soil, the bitter struggle against nature's forces, the hundred details that build up the picture of grinding poverty, the scores of other characters that create a sense of throbbing life, the many small bits that accumulate to bring out the patience, the fortitude, the hopes and frustrations of the characters. Here we have a gallery of memorable characters—Parvati, Saraswati, Nagaveni, Rama Aithal. With incomparable patience and forbearance, understanding and hard work, they all face life without bitterness. Parvati identifies her happiness with that of her husband, loves his son in pure unselfishness and cannot survive the misery his misconduct brings. Saraswati literally wears herself out in toiling for her brother's family. A suffering witness to the passing of Parvati and her own brother and to all the mischief that Lachha inflicts, she accepts everything as destined and stands out as a concrete ideal of patience and hard work. Rama Aithal with his childlike simplicity and manly grit achieves the greatness of simple honesty and unembittered acceptance of life. But Nagaveni, the link between the past and the future, becomes the complete victim of her husband's callous irresponsibility. With the patience of her forbears and the understanding of her son, she holds on to hope to complete contrast to her husband. Their son represents the youngest generation with its new forms of struggle and aspiration. Over three generations the characters and the circumstances change but the drama of the human struggle continues.

Though the author's preface to the novel promises no more than a picture of how three generations of a family faced the problems of economic distress, the novel's achievement is far greater than its author's promise. The three generations become representative and the life they lived becomes the life of a whole region. The story becomes almost symbolic of the changes that have overtaken the Indian rural communities during the past century. The earliest generation with its life patterned within the framework of accepted values yields place to the next, which, subject to new impacts, gets caught between the dying past and the emerging future. The youngest generation is pitted against an environment more complex and demanding. In the first generation the clash was between man and the forces of nature, in the second between man and man and in the third between man and his environment. The novel offers a panorama of change in all its aspects of stability and transition and break-up of age-old patterns, of struggle against forces both natural and human, of the inalienable bond between man and his background and, above all, of the unconquerable spirit of man ever fighting and ever trying to build a new life for itself.

MARATHE, H.M. (Marathi) did his M.A. in Marathi and Sanskrit and taught for some time in Rajaram College, Kolhapur. He edited Kirloskar from 1982 to 1986. He is the editor of Lokaprabha weekly of the Express group in Bombay from 1986.

He is well known as a novelist and short story writer. His stories are marked with regional realistic descriptions. Now he concentrates on metropolitan life and its tensions. The tussle in feudal and industrial technological social pulls is very artistically depicted in his famous works like Kaleshar pani (Dark waters), serialized in English translation in the Illustrated Weekly, also translated in Hindi, Gujarati, Tamil, Kannada and Telugu, and Nishprana vrikshavar bhar dupari. His Marathi works have English titles like No Sentiments Please, News-story, Software. His works have received State government awards and are included in many special anthologies, published by Bharatiya Jnanpeeth and Sahitya Akademi. Man versus machine and alienation are his favourite themes.

FURTHER WORKS: Short story collections; Pakshini, Hadda par, Yuddha, Ghoda, Sapeksha, Veej. Novels: Devachi ghanta (God's bells), Itivritta (Narration), Kurukshetra.

MARDHEKARANCHI KAVITA (Marathi) is an anthology of the poems of Bal Sitaram Mardhekar (1909-1956), the pioneer of modernism, and it is one of the most important landmarks in the Marathi poetry. The experiments he made in poetry indicate a radical break through in the traditional paraphernalia of poetic composition. Though his first book of poems Shishiragam (1937) indulges in the conventional romantic musings, his later books of poems Kahi kavita (1947) and Anakhi kahi kavita (1951) bear evidence of complex modernistic tendencies at work. His typical way of juxtaposing the images accompanied by unusual structural jerks, his use of the prosaic, his parody of Sanskrit and English expressions and his bold use of contemporary speech took the Marathi reader by surprise. Aptly labelled as a 'city poet' his poetry shows the first traces of metropolitan sensibility. The wretched metropolitan life in Bombay with its crowded alleys, its inhuman haste and boredom found expression in his poetry. Here we meet the middle-class man helplessly witnessing his human values being crushed under the new economic pressures. His poetry also records the beginning of the process of disintegration of the domestic and the social life.

The modernistic tendency in Mardhekar's poetry is very much apparent in his anti-romantic attitude. Reacting against the decadent romantic poetry he made fun of the romantic conventions. His ironic vision gave a rare force to this reaction. In addition to the complex interaction between the opposites his poetry displayed various dimensions of humour. It was a remarkable experiment in 'nonsense poetry'. Except for a few attempts made by some Saint poets very few tried this genre in Marathi. It was because of Mardhekar's poetry that fun received its dignity and was widely recognized as an acceptable component of serious poetry.

The complexity of Mardhekar's poetic vision lies in a strange combination of leftist inclination and spiritual striving. Mardhekar's poetry records the trauma of the destructive element that the World Wars displayed. But what is striking about his reaction to the phenomenon of war is his protest against capitalism. According to him, taking undue advantage of the war situation capitalists are exploiting the common man. More importantly he holds the capitalists responsible for the exploitation of workers. His spiritual quest was a reaction against the evils of the industrial culture. He, who revived the tradition of Saint-poetry, had realized the limitations of the worldly life which made him search for the unworldly bliss. Again the mode of his worship was in keeping with the tone and tendency of Saint-poetry.

One of the most controversial critics in Marathi, his formalistic pronouncements show a considerable impact on some latter day critics. The experiments he made with the stream-of consciousness novel and the musicals that he called "Sangitika" were not very successful. He is a better artist as a poet than as a novelist or a verse-dramatist.

P.B.D.

MARGA (Kannada), literally means 'path'. This word is used by Sanskrit and Kannada 'alankarikas' (rhetoricians) both in a general and a particular sense. In the general sense, it means, 'the path trodden by a poet or poets in general'. The word 'marga' first occurs in the Natya shastra of Bharata Muni in the context of differentiating 'shastraic' (classical) music/dance (marga sangita/nritya) from 'deshi' (folk) music/dance. But rhetoricians seem to have adopted this word in an altogether different sense.

Dandin (700 A.D.), the author of Kavyadarsha, is the first rhetorician who applied this concept of marga to poetics. The concept of marga has been developed by different rhetoricians with various modifications, in Sanskrit. In Kannada, Kavirajamarga based on the works of Dandin and Bhamaha was the word marga. Many later poets in Kannada have used the word 'marga' in this general sense, and the word gradually came to mean 'the poetic tradition'.

Sri Vijaya, the author of Kavirajamarga, generally follows Dandin in regard to the detailed exposition of the two margas, Vaidarbhi and Gaudi, and the ten gunas which constitute them. But he calls them Dakshinamarga and Uttaramarga, thus very wisely avoiding the geographical names which would be quite irrelevant in the context of a work meant as a guide for poets in the Kannada country. It is noteworthy that the author, while explaining the application of the ten gunas of the two margas, has always the genius of the language in his view.

Nagavarma (1042 A.D.), another major Kannada rhetorician, author of Kavyavalokanam, follows Dandin in his exposition of two margas with their related ten gunas without any deviation in the matter of details. Though he echoes the opinion of Bhamaha that there is no point in differentiating the margas as Vaidarbhi and Gaudi, he concedes that some would welcome such a differentiation.

In course of time, marga (or riti as it was known later) came to be regarded as the classical mould of a mahaprabandha or mahakavya, a work written in the high tradition in accordance with the norms set forth in the works on poetics. A marga kavya also turned out to be synonymous with 'vastuka' or champu kavya (a work written with an admixture of prose and verse) as distinguished from 'varnaka' or 'hadugaba' (meant to be sung) which was predominantly deshi in character. (A deshi kavya forbids the excessive dependence on Sanskrit vocabulary, and avoids the use of Sanskrit metres, and tries to reflect the native cultural ethos in a native style). Pampu, the first mahakavi in Kannada (950 A.D.), states that an ideal poetical work should have a deshi flavour though written in the marga framework. This set the pace for the later marga compositions.

M.V.S.

MARGA (Telugu) and 'deshi', two terms discussed in Indian aesthetics, roughly correspond to 'classical' and 'folk'. 'Marga' and 'deshi' are mentioned first in Brihad-deshi of Matanga. He applies it to the theory of music. He says that 'Samaganam' (Samavedam) is marga, and other common native music is deshi. Again from Nritta ratnavali of Jayaprasenani, and from Sangita sudha of Raghunatha Nayaka, it seems that marga, and deshi forms will be applied to music as well as to dance. In the book Sangita ratnakaram written by Saranga Deva, music is divided into the two divisions called marga and deshi. He says that marga is composed by Brahma and performed by Bharata Muni and his followers in the presence of Lord Shiva, and deshi was composed as the entertainment performance for the common people of a limited region, or a part of the country. In the same book, he defined marga as that which follows strict principles, which will have permanent values and which will entertain all the people of the ages, and of all the regions. At the same time, he has explained that the Vedas belong to marga, because they were sung in the fixed metre (swara) and the Ramayana and the Mahabharata also belong to marga because they are treated as the Vedas. Lava and Kusha, the sons of Rama, sung the Ramayana story in the presence of Rama in marga style. Dhananjaya in his Dasharupaka explained that 'nritya' is the form of marga, and 'nritta' is of deshi form.

In the light of the above discussion, critics divided literature also into marga and deshi. The literature with the message of human values, scholarly in its composition of words, expressed with ideas in its narration, with 'nisarga ganas' in its traditional metre, and an aesthetic element in its composition is considered to be marga sahitya. The work of Valmiki, Vyasa, Bhasa, Kalidasa, Bhavabhuti, Harsha, Banabhatta and other great poets and dramatists can be described as belonging to marga sahitya.

In Telugu literature, Nanne Choda, the Telugu poet, in his Kumarasambhava mentioned marga sahitya and deshi sahitya. He says in his poem (Canto I-23) that when marga sahitya was prominent in the past, Chalukyas patronised deshi sahitya in the form of Telugu. Critics say that Nanne Choda implies that marga sahitya is Sanskrit literature and deshi Sahitya is Telugu literature. This may be true at the time of Nanne Choda. But later, critics asserted that marga sahitya is that which has Sanskrit influence in its content, form and metre. In addition to that, the literature having the traditional structure, in style, narration, composition, and aesthetic approach is marga sahitya. So, even in Telugu literature, marga is that which adopts the principles of Sanskrit literature and which has a permanent place in the literary world by adopting those principles. They are the poets of all ages, of all people. The works of Nannayya, Tikkana and others are considered as marga sahitya and the works of Palkuriki Somana, Palnati vira charitra and the yashaganas are deshi sahitya. The two strands, marga and deshi still continue to enrich Telugu literature.

MARGA AND DESHI (Sanskrit). The term 'marga' is employed first by Dandin to signify the sense of 'style' or 'form of expression'. The more common name given to 'style' is 'riti', which is pointed out as constituting the soul of poetry by Vamana in his Kavyalamkarasutravritti. ('Ritiratma kavyasya vishishta padarachana rithi' I.2.6.7.). The marga of Dandin as also riti of Vamana is brought into being through combination of certain literary excellences technically known as Gunas, which go to embellish the texture of poetry in the same manner the poetic figure borrows the Alamkaras do it. On the concept of riti S.K. De comments: "It should be observed that the term 'riti' is hardly equivalent to the English word 'style', by which it is often rendered but in which there is always or distinct subjective valuation..... The 'riti' consists essentially in the objective beauty of representation (of the intended idea), arising from a proper unification of certain clearly defined excellences, or from an adjustment of sound and sense. It is, no doubt, recognised that appropriate ideas should find appropriate expressions: or in other words, the outward expression should be suitable to the inward sense... But it is merely the outward presentation of its beauty called forth by a harmonious combination of more or less fixed 'literary excellences'. (Sanskrit Poetics, II, p. 115-116).

Dandin in his Kavyadarsha extends recognition to a number of modes of composition (marga), but discusses in detail the special characteristics of the two extreme modes, the Vaidarbha and the Gaudiya. This extends an opportunity to Dandin to give a treatment to the gunas or literary excellences, which are responsible for the genesis of two distinct styles or techniques. All through his discussion Dandin betrays his fondness for Vaidarbha marga or the all-India standard poetic diction, adapted by most of the poets of repute, including Kalidasa, Bharavi and Amar. The salient traits of Vaidarbha marga, Dandin asserts, are represented by the ten qualities, which are as follows: Shlesha or freedom from looseness, Prasad or clarity, Samata or absence of unevenness in syllabic structure, and arrangement of letters, Madhurya or establishment of rasa in expression and content, Sukumarata or absence of harshness due to employment of soft syllables, Arthavyakti or explicitness of sense which consists in the absence of extraneous matter to be brought over for completion of sense, Ojas or superabundance of compound-words, Kanti or appreciation in a wide circle due to the fact that the composition does not transgress the general usage of ordinary possibilities, and Samadhi or transference of the attributes of one thing to another. While these ten excellences constitute the essence of Vaidarbha marga, their opposites could frequently be traced in the Gaudiya marga, which is probably followed by literary artists belonging to Eastern India.

Asryaneko giram margah shukshmaabhedah parasparam/
Tatra Vaidarbhagaudiya varnyete prasphutantarau//
Sheshah prashadah samata madhuryam sukumarata/
Arthavyaktirudarativamojah-kanti-samadhayah//
Iti Vaidarbhhamargasya prana dusha gunah smritah/
Esham viparyayah prayo ddrishyate gauudavartanani
(Kavyadarsha I.40-42)

In his Saraswatikanthabharana Bhoja locates opposites of each of the ten literary excellences pointed out by Dandin, and calls them distinct Doshas or literary blemishes. Dandin, however, speaks of opposites of only some of the Gunas, the others being common to all the Margas. All these may lead to the observation that so far as the ideals of literary composition are concerned the followers of Vaidarbha marga differ from the champions of Gaudiya marga, and that while the former prefer compactness of structure and clarity, the latter betray their fondness for grandeur and verbosity. In drawing a line of demarcation between the Guna supposed to constitute the essential traits of Vaidarbha marga and the Alamkara, Dandin says that while the ten excellences enumerated above are peculiar to Vaidarbha marga, the poetic figures are common to both the Vaidarbha and Gaudiya margas, though he admits the fact that both the elements are instruments of decoration in poetry.

Since marga is a type of composition and since in compositions all types of words are employed to construct the structure, it is necessary to have an idea of the words that are capable of being employed in poetry. Dandin speaks of four types of compositions, the one structured in Sanskrit, the other in Prakrit the third in Apabhramsha and the fourth being one carved out by an admixture of different types of languages. Of the various types of Prakrit, Dandin mentions only Tadbhava, Tatsama and Deshi according to the names of countries. Also he extends recognition to Maharashtri, Sauraseni, Gaudi and Lati types of Prakrit (Kavyadarsha I. 32-33). In sharp contradiction to Tadbhava and Tatsama words, Deshi words are those which are neither derived from Sanskrit nor are similar to those occurring in Sanskrit in points of phonology and morphology. Hemachandra defines Deshi words as words not derived by the rules and regulations enunciated in grammar: even if they are so derived they are not still current in that sense in Sanskrit Dictionaries nor can they be justified by taking recourse to gauni or qualitative type of lakshana.

(je lakkhane na siddha, na pashiddha sakkyahihanesu/
Na ye gauna-lakkhanasatti-sambhava te ihanivaddha//
— Deshinamamata I.3).

The Deshi words are innumerable: they differ from country to country and place to place. It is because of this that Hemachandra has only treated those words that are current in Prakrit through ages from time immemorial. Modern linguists have also been seized with this problem of locating Deshi words as distinct from those derived from Sanskrit. Thus James Beames says: 'Seshajas are those words which cannot be derived from any Sanskrit word and are, therefore, considered to have been borrowed from the aborigines of the country or invented by the Aryans in Post-Sanskrit times (A Comparative Grammar of Modern Aryan Languages in India, Vol.I. page 12). Hoernle also says: 'The term Deshya means that belonging to the country, i.e. provincial or perhaps aboriginal. They designate by this name all those words which they are unable to derive satisfactorily to themselves from some Sanskrit word and therefore consider to have had their origin in the country' (A Comparative Grammar of the Gaudiyan Languages, 1880 P. XXXIX.)

MARI HAKIKAT (Gujarati). Narmad the father of modern Gujarati prose, who ushered a new era in Gujarati literature initiating several genres in Gujarati, also wrote this auto-biography. It is the first autobiography in Gujarati.

On the basis of the autobiography, parts of which were published in Narmad's prose collections Narma Gadya, Part II, his friend Navalram wrote Narmad's biography Kavicharit. The autobiography is from Narmad's birth in 1833 to 1866. i.e. the first thirty three years of his life. It was published in the Narmad centenary year 1933. The book consists of ninetyfour pages divided into ten chapters.

In the beginning of his book Narmad frankly says "The story in the book is incomplete, it is simply a jotting down of notes. Yet in the book I won't write those things which I think are improper. But whatever I write will be nothing but truth as known to me, without being bothered about public opinion and my own interest."

Narmad is true to his word. He has frankly written about his cowardice, his calf love, his attempts to attract women, his dislike of his contemporary poet Dalpatram and their clash, his conflict with his father, how he once arranged a musical concert at his residence under depression and spent fine hundred rupees for it, his financial crisis, betrayal by friends, his clandestine love affairs, etc. From the book one gets a clear picture of Narmad's personality, his egoism, his hypersensitive nature, his generosity, his extravagance, quick change in his moods, etc. There are attempts at self glorification, and attitude of self-righteousness, and at times of self analysis, where he is critical of himself.

Being the first autobiography in Gujarati literature, and Narmad being the father of modern Gujarati prose, his language has a tinge of 'Surti' dialect. Yet his language is forceful and he is able to communicate easily to the readers. His style is fully reflective of his personality.

MARIVALA, CHETAN LEKHRAJ (Sindhi; b. 1916: d.1987) was a writer of historical articles, reminiscences and short stories. He graduated with History and Economics in 1938 from Bombay University and after working for a short spell as a school teacher, joined Dayaram Jethmal Sindh College, Karachi (1940-1948) in the Department of History. He has been a recognised authority on Sindhi history, especially the British period, and has many learned research articles to his credit published in reputed journals such as Sindh Historical Journal. He made his debut as a writer in Sindhi with his Humayun jo khvab (Humayun's dream, 1942) for which he was awarded a prize by the Central Advisory Board for Sindhi Literature. His Tarikhi mazmuna (Historical essays, 1946) also earned him a prize from the same Advisory Board. These essays are of research nature, such as 'Mahen-jodaro' (Mound of the dead), 'Shah ain Sindhvarki' (Shah and Sindhi merchants), etc. His style in these research articles is both concise, to the point and lucid. In his essay 'Karachi' he is poetic, but not pedantic.

His other historical writings include Itihasik chitra (Historical pictures, 1950) and Vichitra varqa (Strange pages, 1951). His research articles on Sindh history, such as 'Jad'ahin tufanu ayo' (when the storm descended) about the first war of Independence in (1857, 'Quit Karachi, quit Sindh', 'Dostano nato' (Friendly relations) and others are published in journals such as Mehran. His two books on reminiscences, Sambhar je darsinia tan (From the mirror of memories, 1960) and Hikre d'inhan ji g'alh (Once upon a time, 1975) are the first of their kind in Sindhi, and are abounding in pen-portraits and personal observations in a fascinating but forceful style.

His other publications are Sindhi jivan kahanyun (Short stories on Sindhi life, 1953) a collection of Sindhi folk-tales, Au kanga kar g'alhi (Come, Oh crow and speak, 1966), Dhiu ja piu de khata (Letters from daughter to father, 1973) and Latifi lati (Poems of Shah Latif, undated) edited with glossary.

D.K.M.

MARIZ (Gujarati; b.1917), is a doyen of Gujarati ghazal-writing poets. Born in the Dawoodi Bohra community, his real name is Abbas A. Vasi. He did not have much of formal education. He was interested in Urdu poetry and stalwarts like his Anees, Meer, Momin here his favourite poets. Initially he worked for a shoe manufacturing company, but later turned to Gujarati journalism and worked in the editorial departments of the Gujarati dailies like Janamabhoomi, Matrubhoomi and Watan, being published from Bombay. For the last few years he has devoted himself entirely to the writing of poetry.

While in Surat, he was inspired and guided by Ameen Azad, another stalwart of Gujarati ghazal. Later he devised and evolved his own style which made him more famous and set him apart from his contemporaries. Totally carefree by nature, he never bothered about publishing the collection of his ghazals, but fortunately some of his fans preserved the manuscripts which enabled the publication of his first-and so far only-collection of ghazals named 'Agaman' (Arrival). It was first published in 1968 and later ran into second edition. Mariz has also written two religious books named Mazloom-e-karbala, a rich tribute to Imam Hussein. The other one is named Hoor. He also edited a religious magazine, namely Insaaf for some time.

Though brought up when traditional ghazal was at its best in Gujarati, he has written many such ghazals which retain the never-ending charm of genuine poetry. His ghazals are a thing of joy for all classes of the lovers of poetry. He is respected by the older and the younger generations alike. Always cornered by financial and social crisis in his life, the philosopher-poet mostly takes a detached, objective view of the world in his ghazals. He expresses the eternal pain, anguish and longing of human life with a pint of satire and philosophy. Often described by critics as 'Ghalib of Gujarat', Mariz, however, has a voice of his own and has developed a style distinct from others. He lends a new sparkle and meaning to ordinary-looking words, frequently crossing the grammatical barriers. Many a time he has uttered the most profound truths of life in simple words, without sermonising. He is a poet of disillusionment. He rarely becomes bitter, but his poetry reveals sardonic humour. In a couplet he compares life with the regal procession of an emperor, which, though pompous, is totally devoid of any importance or significance. His ghazals mainly revolve round subjects like love, social paradoxes and God. Although the impact of Urdu poetry on his ghazals is obvious, he has never blindly imitated any model. His ghazals come straight from his heart. The poet is conscious of the weaknesses of human beings-and more of his own-as well as the meaninglessness of the world. But he is generous and light-hearted towards them. His first target is his own self. Ghazal is essentially a subjective form of poetry, but Mariz many a time strikes an objective note in his ghazals.

MARKANDEYA-MARKANDEYA PRAVASI

He cleverly blends thought and emotions in his ghazals and never upsets the balance between the two.

The poet is aware of his 'reputation' as a good 'consumer' of wine. He never defends his weakness. In a memorable 'Maktaa', he says: You, Mariz, are straining liquor through the same handkerchief to which you had tied a knot while vowing never to touch the liquor again.

Apart from ghazals Mariz has also written a number of 'Nazams' and 'Rubais'. Though they bear the stamp of his art, they do not stand comparison with his ghazals.

He will always be remembered as a ghazal-poet, who gave philosophical base to the form of ghazal in Gujarat without distorting its lyrical texture.

Bh.S.

MARKANDEYA (Hindi, b. 1930) was born at Arai in Jaunpur (U.P.), and showed an inclination towards short story writing from his early youth. His short stories reflect in a realistic way the changing patterns of rural life during the post-Premchand era. He is not obsessed by an unhealthy infatuation for regionalism (anchalikata) and local colour but seems keen to represent the life of the rural folk in its totality. Amongst his remarkable short stories 'Hansa jai akela', 'Gulara ke Baba', 'Bhoodan' 'Naun saurupaye', 'Sabun', 'Adarsh Kukkutgriha', 'Neem ki tahani' and 'Chand ka tukara' need special mention.

Hansa jai akela is a story of faith and fancy born of the vision of 'suraj' (independence). It is a representation of living human sympathies. In 'Gulara Ke Baba' the Baba's is not only a powerful portrait, but it is also a symbol of the historical forces of the day. In stories titled 'Gulara ke Baba', 'Savaraiya', 'Pariphool' 'Sat bachchon ki ma' and 'Dudh aur dawa', Markandeya concentrates on the gentle and subtle strands of emotional human ties and he, as well as his reader, gets merged in the intense upsurge of irrepressible emotion.

Bhoodan is the agonising tale of disillusionment from the much publicized 'Land-gift movement' of our times. It points to a bitter truth of our experience. The faith, infatuation and fancy exuded by 'Hansa jai akela' get completely shattered in short stories like 'Nau sau rupaye' and 'Unt ka dana'. 'Adarsh kukkutgriha' (an ideal poultry farm) is a satire. Markandeya's language and style get moulded according to the sensibilities of the piece. His theme and craft aptly reflect his creative urge. Short story collections of the author. Panphool (1954), Mahue ka per (1955), Patthar aur parchhaiyan (1956), Hansa jai akela (1957), Bhoodan (1961), Beech ke log (1961), Mahi (1962), Semal ke phool (1963).

MARKANDAYA, KAMALA (English; b. 1924), an Indo-Anglian novelist, was born in South India. Her travels in India and Europe interrupted her schooling. On leaving Madras University she worked as a journalist. During the War she worked for the Army in India and later returned to journalism. She is married to an Englishman and now lives in London. Her Nectar in a Sieve (1924), reminiscent of Thomas Hardy's novels, was published in 1954 and made her widely known. It is a restrained as well as a touching account of the life of an Indian peasant woman, Rukmani, and her struggle for survival and her abiding love for her husband, Nathan. Besides this Kamala Markandaya has published eight novels: Some Inner Fury (1955), A Silence of Desire (1960), Possession (1963), A Handful of Rice (1967), The Coffin Dam (1969) The Nowhere Man (1973), Two Virgins (1973), and The Golden Honeycomb (1967).

These nine novels reveal her deep preoccupation with the changing Indian social and political scene, her careful, conscious craftsmanship and her skilful use of the English language for creative purposes. She excels in recording the inner workings of the minds of her characters, their personal perplexities and social confrontations. She endeavours to portray them as individuals growing into themselves, unfolding the delicate process of their being and becoming. In their encounter with an alien political power, the anti-colonial or anti-imperialist attitudes are powerfully expressed and Markandaya's major characters project these viewpoints. However, in The Nowhere Man Markandaya is more concerned with unfolding the sense of alienation of Srinivasa, or the modern man. In this novel political considerations occupy a secondary place, the primary purpose being to highlight the isolation of the individual soul and expose the pathos of the human condition. Kamala Markandaya succeeds in achieving the delicate balance between unfolding the individual's psychological and social predicaments and portraying a wider cultural and political setting which create these crises. This balance is the hallmark of her success as a novelist and it highlights her distinctive art in the choice of her themes and her skilful craftsmanship.

Some Inner Fury presents Mira's inner conflicts as she is divided between her ardent and genuine love for Richard, an Englishman, and the compelling political forces of Indo-British turmoil. These forces pull them apart and her mind, once revelling in romantic love, returns to the harsh realities of life. Some of her novels seem to be autobiographical though she is reticent in talking about herself; they at least present the first person omniscient narrator. Nectar in a Sieve and the Nowhere Man are her finest creations which will ensure her a place among the modern Indo-English novelists of distinction.

district Samastipur (Bihar). After obtaining the degree of M.A. and B.Ed, he served as a teacher at a high school for some time. Then he entered active politics for a while. Finally, he turned to journalism. He joined Aryavarta, a leading Hindi daily of Bihar, and is now one of its senior sub-editors. He is famous for his patriotic themes, well-polished language, and a lucid, forceful style. Primarily a poet, he writes essays, novels, stories and criticism also. He is an expert in writing satire and humour as well. In Mithila-mihir (Weekly, Patna) the column 'Jhamlalak Jhama' and in Mati-pani (Monthly, Patna) the column 'Kahalani Gonu Jha' are the best examples of his satirical writings. He has written two novels Abhiyan and Ham Kalidas, both serialised in Mithila-mihir 1979-1980 and 1982-1983. Atadārtha (1977), a collection of his poems, and Agastyayani (1980), a mahakavya, are a testimony to his poetic genius. Besides these, he has written several navagitas, ghazals and dolas. In order to give a new direction to poetry, he propounded a theory, called 'tadārvhāvada'. His mahakavya Agastyayani is acclaimed as his best work, for which he received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1981. In its ten cantos, he has described the mission of the sage, Agastya, who is said to have united the two important cultures of northern and southern India. Seeing national integrity in danger, the poet finds the ideal character of Agastya for protecting it. The epic poem is thus an inspiring poem of patriotism and cultural and territorial integrity. It is written in a language which is refined and Sanskritised, and in a variety of modern metres interspersed with vivid descriptions.

MARO MAHENJODARO (Telugu) written by N.R. Nandi is an outstanding play in Telugu. It was written in 1964

N.R. Nandi (pen-name for Nandi Nuku Raju) is a prolific writer. He wrote several plays, playlets, novels and scientific fiction. Maro Mahenjodaro is Nandi's best play. In this, he changes the path of social drama to experimentation. He breaks the established conventions of drama and strikes a new path. He understands the root causes for the exploitation of the poor by the rich and exposes the bitter truths in a powerful and realistic way.

Nandi understood the greatness of Indian culture but was not carried away by its richness. He warns that once in the ancient times, a great civilisation flourished in Mahenjodaro and Harappa but those cities are now important historical monuments only. Any civilisation which neglects the primary necessities of the common man is doomed to destruction.

Nandi analyses the present day problems of society. He is convinced that education and industrial advancement are contributing to the development of society. But education without ethics and industrial development without morality are causing much havoc and calamity.

Nandi describes the conflict of class-war. But he scrupulously avoids the traditional beaten track, i.e. he analyses the basic nature of man and attributes the change in his character to the opportunities available.

Nandi introduces eight characters to represent society. A scientist, at the beginning of the play, comes to the stage and introduces the characters. The characters are already on the stage in darkness. When the scientist introduces them, they come forward and act according to their nature.

One mill-owner, by name Koteswaraiah, tries to exploit his workers. A trade-union leader, Bhushanam opposes the factory owner's exploitation and advocates the rights of the workers. A servant Bhikshalu works as a domestic servant in Koteswaraiah's house. Susheela, daughter of Bhikshalu adores Bhushanam. He loves Susheela. A doctor and a lawyer, two other characters in the play, always support the rich man. There is a typical middle-class man by name Parandhamaiah who stoops down to any immoral action that suits his needs. At the end of the play the rich man kills Bhikshalu and rapes Susheela. But he may not be punished. The scientist, i.e., the writer of the play questions the rules of present-day society and warns that if this society were not to be changed, it would surely be another Mahenjodaro.

Though the author adopts a difficult and unfamiliar technique to carry his message to the public, his theme is quite down-to-the-earth and reflects the present-day social milieu.

MARSHMAN, JOSHUA (Bengali; b.1740, d.1837), son of John Marshman, contributed a lot to the type-making of the Bengali language. He came to India as a missionary in 1799 and joined the Baptist Mission of Serampore in West Bengal. On coming to India he started a school in aid of the Mission. He, in course of time, with sustained effort upgraded the school to the level of a college. It is said that his son John Clerk Marshman brought out the first Bengali journal, Digdarshan, as well the first Bengali newspaper Samachardarpan in 1818. But in fact Joshua Marshman was the man behind it. Some of his essays written on the issue of Christianity about which he had a debate with Rammohun Roy, were published in The Friend of India. Joshua Marshman's contribution to Bengal was threefold: cultural, literary and linguistic.

Marshman became the Head of the Mission after William Carey's death in 1834 and remained there discharging his missionary duty till his death.

MARSIA-KASHMIRI

MARSIA (Kashmiri) or elegy means a mourning song or a poem expressing sorrow or lamentation for one who is dead. Under the influence of Persian literature, the marsias now mainly include the poems which describe the miseries of Imam Hussain (the grandson of Prophet Muhammad), who was mercilessly assassinated at Karbala in A.D. 678 along with the members of his family.

In the 14th century, whereas Islam revolutionised the religious life of Kashmir, it left a great impact both on the culture and language of the region. The local language, Kashmiri, came under the immediate impact of Persian. Besides words and phrases, it borrowed many poetic genres from Persian. marsia, masnavi, qitta, rubai and Ghazal are all such poetic genres which has become part of Kashmiri literature.

The local Hindu community had a centuries-old cultural trait of 'wang'. On the death of a near one, the women folk of the family would collect and count the virtues and achievements of the departed soul while mourning his or her death in loud but pathetic and rhythmic words. This custom is yet in vogue in both the communities, the Hindus and the Muslims.

In 1438, the great saint poet of Kashmir, Sheikh Nur-ud-Din, died, leaving behind no near ones but the whole nation to mourn his death. He had a good number of disciples both women and men, literate and illiterate, in the cities, in urban areas and in every community. All his disciples gathered together at Chararisharif where he died. Many of his disciples were poets. One of the women disciples, Sham Bidi (d. 1450), was so shocked that she composed extempore a pathetic poem mourning the death of her master. This poem is in the local 'wazhan' form; every fourth couplet of the poem is a refrain in which the poetess repeats: 'Nundi Sanz gov surgas mato' (the Nund of Sanz tribe has gone to high heaven). This poem is of more than fifty verses and happens to be the first elegy in Kashmiri literature.

In the 16th century, during the rule of the Chak dynasty, the school of Shia theology made its mark in Kashmir. Many pandits were converted to this faith and many Sunni Muslims also came under its influence. One of the important distinctive parts of the Shia religious life is to mourn the martyrdom of Imam Hussain. 'Tazia Daari' (holding of mourning congregations) is one of the fundamentals of the Shia religious life. In these congregations the greatness of Hussain, his surrender to the will of God, his innocence and his love for Islam and many things about his eminence are narrated and at the same time the audience hears the episode of the merciless oppression let loose upon this innocent family by the soldiers of 'Yazid'. The poetry provides more fitting expression to depict such pathetic pictures than the prose. Hence such poems became part of Persian literature and initially these Persian elegies were recited at the 'Tazia' congregations in Kashmir. Only the elite were conversant with Persian and the recitation of such elegies left very little impact upon the common audience. Thus the need for Kashmiri marsia arose.

It was, therefore, during the Chak period (1555-1588) that this special type of elegy was first introduced. In his History of Kashmiri Marsia (1979), Shahid Badgami has attributed samples of two elegies to Mir Syed Hussain and Marhum Ahmad, and records that the former died in 1410 and the latter lived between 1392 and 1455. About the latter, i.e. Marhum Ahmad, Shahid is also of the view that his elegy has diction of the Chak period. His claim about Mir Syed Hussain's marsia is also erroneous. The diction of the samples attributed to him are patently of the Chak period. Accordingly, the history of Hussaini marsia started during the 16th century.

We can specify three periods of such elegies according to time, technique and content. The first period starts from the 16th century, the second starts with the new innovations and techniques introduced by a host of poets from the beginning of the 19th century. The third period starts after the Independence when the elegy writers, besides the narration of the miseries perpetuated upon Hussain and his family, started giving a philosophical interpretation to this great martyrdom. This happened owing to the influence of the poetry of Iqbal on the elegy composers of Kashmir.

During the first period, we have a good number of long, detailed and rich elegies. These are free from the burden of poetic devices. The language is chaste and simple. The flow is like 'Vitasta', the ideas are intelligible and the impact is appropriate. The representative poets of this period are Mir Muhammad Jaffar, Abdul Hakim Sate, Muhammad Hayat, Baba Muhammad Jawad, Khwaja Akbar, Khwaja Hassi Bhat, Syed Abdullah Shah, Khwaja Abbas, Mir Ahmad, Syed Saleh Rizvi, Sharaf-ud-Din Rizvi, Qazi Ahmad Din and Qazi Ahmad Ali. Of these poets the biographical details of only Abdul Hakim Sate are known. He was a great Persian poet. Both his father and son were poets of Persian literature. He died in 1730.

With the beginning of the 19th century, the poets introduced new devices and certain innovations in the elegy, and it thus became, technically a very difficult genre. These innovations were: (1) To write an elegy with a certain title, (2) to have five different stages in a marsia consisting of 'Hamud' (praise of god), 'Naat' (eulogy of Prophet), 'Madah' (praise of Hussain, his parents and family), 'Moujiza' (recitation of miracles of Muhammad, Ali and Hussain) and 'Dard' (pathetic narration), and (3) to specify the metres for marsia. Again the system of metre was further divided into five parts. All these metres are almost the same as those used in classical music. Hence the elegy writing was made strictly musical appropriate for mourning and expression of pathos.

Khwaja Hussain Mir (1780-1860) was one of the pioneers of this innovation. Mullah Hakim Azim (1768-1834), Munshi Shah Muhammad (1775-1884), Munshi Yusuf (1780-1875), Hakim Abidullah (1785-1860), Hakim Abdullah Ansari (1787-1847), Munshi Mustafa Ali (1794-1868), Mirja Abdul Qasim (1800-1868), Munshi Muhammad Ali (1800-1884), Syed Reza (1800-1874), Khwaja Baqir (1800-1845), Munshi Ahsanullah (1811-1898), Syed Taqi (1820-1904), Munshi Ahmad Ali 'Gazi' (1825-1896), and Safdar Mir (1825-1894) are the poets who followed in the footsteps of Khwaja Hussain Mir, but widened the dimensions of marsia.

Hakim Habibullah 'Habib' (1855-1905) was a great poet who contributed to many poetic genres, including qitta, satire, nazm, marsia and rubai. He has pathetically described the devastating effect of the floods which caused great destruction in 1807, in a beautiful poem Sailabnama. He has written the elegy in a scholarly style, but has used many Persian words. His valuable creative work was destroyed when his house was gutted in fire after his death.

Hakim Hassan Ali (1870-1914) is another towering poet among marsia writers. He has introduced another novelty in his long, numerous and lofty marsias. He has used only undotted letters in his elegies which are only 13 out of 31 letters of Kashmiri alphabet. He has performed this difficult task without sacrificing the richness of ideas.

Hakim Ghulam Rasul (1876-1933), Hakim Muhammad Jawad (1879-1944), Mehdi Hussain (1879-1957), Munshi Sadiq (1884-1959), Hakim Syed Muhammad (1887-1925), Syed Hussain of Pallar (1889-1934) and Abli Wani (1899-1962) are other poets who contributed greatly to the stock of marsia.

Agha Syed Ali Safavi (1902-1975), in spite of his too much devotion to active politics, made good contribution, smaller in quantity though, to this genre. His marsia is better in quality. Maulana Shams-ud-Din Hairat Kamili (1890-1968) is the last masnavi writer of eminence and has translated the first volume of Rumi's Persian masnavi. He has written very good poems mourning the death of Hussain. Khamosh Kri (1912-1973) and Tanha Ansari (1914-1969) are other poets of this genre.

The living poets, Hindus or Muslims, Shias or Sunnis, have mourned the martyrdom of Hussain with sincerity and their poems are full of the message which the sacrifice of Hussain delivered to humanity, and which has been summed up by Khwaja Moin-ud-Din 'Ajmeri' in a Persian rubai, "Sar dad wa na dad dast" (Gave the head, but did not compromise with the wrong). Mubarak Shah 'Fitrat' (b. 1898) in his Persianised language, Mirza Ghulam Hassan Beg 'Arif' (b.1910) in mystical diction, Dinanath 'Nadim', in his sonnets and modern poems, Fazil Kashmiri (b.1916), in his rhythmic music, Pitambarnath 'Fani' (b.1919) in effective language, Syed Muhammad Rizvi (b.1921) in traditional form, Ghulam Nabi 'Firaq' (b. 1922) in the pattern of English tragedies, Amin Kamil with his new lyricism, Syed Akbar Hashmi (b.1924) with his devotion and Abdul Rehman 'Rahi' (b.1925) with modern symbolism have all contributed to the rich heritage of marsia.

Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' (b.1930) has melodious voice in which he recites elegies and attracts a good number of people. Gazi Jalal-ud-Din's (b.1929) elegies are recited during the Tazia procession. J.N. Singh 'Dilgir' (b.1937) is the first Sikh who composed his poems in Kashmiri language and has good elegies to his credit. A.R. Nazki (b.1931) has manifested the influence of Iqbal upon his elegies. Premnath 'Shad' (b.1934) has unique popularity. He is the only non-Muslim whose elegies are recited in all mourning houses (Imam Baras) of Shias. Muzaffar 'Azim' (b.1934) again conveys the message of this great sacrifices in beautiful poetic symbols. Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' (b.1934) has also contributed his humble bit. As early as in 1960 and 1961 his elegies were published in Al-Ir-Shad, a journal of Shia community. Nishat Ansari (b.1930) has not only contributed to the elegy literature, but has to his credit many articles on the subject. Manzur Hashmi (b.1937) has also written so many new elegies. Sajud Sailani (b.1936), besides being a playwright, a painter, an artist and a poet of stature, has added greatly to elegy. Margub (b.1937), Rasul Pampur (b.1939), Anis Kazmi (b.1940), Wahid Palri (b.1946), Tariqummar Buch (b.1950), Muhammad Yusuf 'Figar' (b.1950) and Rafiq Raaz (b.1952) are other poets who have greatly contributed to this genre.

All these contemporary poems mourning the death of the martyrs of Karbala do not strictly fall within the ambit of the traditional marsia and are thus called 'Nawha'. However, G.R. Santosh has been attempting at reviving the traditional marsia.

Ghulam Muhammad Shahid Badgami (b.1937), under the influence of his elder brother G.A. Fariq (b.1921), has written a good number of elegies. Fariq has contributed both to the traditional and modern elegies. Shahid has taken much pains to write History of Elegies in Kashmir.

Except one, that of Sham Bibi, all elegies referred to above mourn the sacrifices of the martyrs of Karbala. Hence mention of other elegies is necessary.

Mahmud Gami (1765-1855) is the pioneer of masnavi and lyrics. He has versified the love story of Yusuf and Zulaikha. The hero of the story dies and the heroine mourns his death in a long poem. This poem is one of the best, effective and pathetic, elegies. Maqbul Shah of Kralwari (1802-1877) is one of the few greatest poets of Kashmir. He mourns the death of his young adopted son. This elegy is also very good. Haji Ilyas (1881-1941), in his youth, wrote many masnavis and lyrics, but as his young and promising son died a premature death, the poet was so shocked that except an elegy, mourning the sad demise of his son, he could not write till his old age. It is before his death that he versified the biography of the Prophet in masnavi. His elegy was so pathetic that whenever it was recited many people fainted.

Sham Bibi's elegy is preserved in the manuscript form. Eighteen verses of this elegy were included for the first time in Hajini's Kashir shairi (1960) published by the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

The Hussaini elegies were published in small pamphlets which are out of print now. Hakim Safdar Hamdani, for the first time, edited such elegies in a book form, Osh te aab, which was published in 1951 by the State Information Department with a preface by the great Kashmiri poet, Nur Muhammad 'Roshan'. Kitab-ul-Buka is another compilation in two volumes edited by Hakim Ghulam Hussain 'Makhmur' in 1958 and 1977 respectively. Hakim Ghulam Safdar Hamdani gave brief data of marsia composers in the History of Shias in Kashmir (Urdu). Anis Kazmi, a young poet, published Kashur adab te marsia (1974), Small History of Kashmir Marsia (1975) and Heok te wosh (1976). The Kashmir Cultural Organisation published a book Nazrana in 1975 containing new elegies. Ghulam Muhammad Shahid Badgami published A Comprehensive and Detailed History of Hussaini Marsias in 1979. In spite of its defects, it is even to this day the only historical work on the subject.

The Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages published in 1958 Kulliyat-i-Maqbul, edited by M.Y. Taing, in which Pir Maqbul's elegy was published for the first time. The elegy written by Haji Ilyas was for the first time published (in part) in Achhitar, the literary journal of the Azad Cultural Forum, Chodora, in 1975.

MARSIA (Maithili) is an Arabic word. It originally meant eulogy or praise of some one, but in contemporary Urdu it implies an elegy or a mourning song. Marsia is sung in the sad memory of Hasan and Hussain, the well-known historical characters. For meeting the expenses of Muharram, in which a 'Tazia' (in Maithili, 'Daha') is erected, the managers or Mutabalis of different local Dargahs collect money in groups, moving door-to-door with drums and banners singing marsia in chorus which begins with 'Hai Ho Hai'. Muslims are spread all over India. They speak languages of the region. In Mithila they speak a dialect of Maithili, called 'Jolahi' by Grierson in his Linguistic Survey of India. Maithili marsias are composed in this dialect. Amarnath Jha in his presidential address delivered at a session of the Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Darbhanga, quoted from a number of marsia songs in Maithili which show that Muslims in Mithila speak a dialect of Maithili.

R.J.

MARSIA (Rajasthani) is a long elegiac poem eulogising the valour of a hero or lamenting the object of love or attachment which is no more. In Persian literature it is specially composed and sung in praise of the martyrs of Karbala.

In Rajasthani literature there are countless 'dingal gits' written in commemoration of the heroic acts of dead warriors. In the above sense of the term, all these may be called marsias. All commendable acts of bravery, keeping high ideals and adherence to certain principles, even at the cost of one's life, come in the purview of its definition. There was hardly a hero whose sacrifice was left unsung on his death. The charan poets have never overlooked this aspect. Next comes the poetic expression for those departed souls whose attachments are the main cause of grief for the bereaved. Their lamentations are contained in miscellaneous metres, especially in dohas (duhas) and occasionally in gits. Such dohas are also known as 'Pichola', i.e. sayings after the death of a person. Baghajira doha may be taken as representative of this type. A poet named Ashanand laments over the death of baghaji with whom he had lived in close association. Marsias represent the finest aspect of Rajasthani literature. Durasa Adha, Dwarkadas Dadhawadiya, Pirdan Lalas, Asiya Karamsi, Umedram Palhawati, Sandur Mala, Rathod Prithiraj, Maharaja Mansingh, etc. are some of the poets who have contributed to this genre.

MARSIA (Urdu). The word 'marsia' is derived from the Arabic 'rasa', meaning 'weeping over the dead'. It is said that in Arabia, during the Caliphate of Omar, the second Caliph of Islam, a woman by the name of Khunsa, put so much pathos in the elegy rendered over the dead body of her brother, that the Caliph could not restrain himself and burst into tears. This incident has been recorded by Shibli Naumani. Another incident is that of Mautamim who was given the task of composing a 'marsia' on Caliph Omar's deceased brother. Mautamim could not identify himself with the dead person, hence his verse lost its capacity to move. "Zaid", he later apologised, "was not my brother. How can I infuse in his marsia my genuine feelings?" Emotionally infused with deep personal feelings became the key point of marsia writing.

This personal, and a very domestic ritual, became public and widespread after the martyrdom of Husain, son of Ali, the grandson of prophet Mohammad, at the battle-field of Karbala. Here, the first marsia, as it is now known, was rendered in Arabic by Zainab, the sister of Husain, over the grave of her brother on her return to Karbala, after being released from the captivity of Yazid in 681 A.D. Later, public recitation of marsias was banned by the Umayyads, and the Abbasids, to be taken up again by the Dalamites after the fall of the Abbasid dynasty.

It was during the reign of the Dalamite king Moiz-ud-Daula, that marsias were publicly recited during the month of Moharram. The theme of these verses was the tragedy which had taken place at Karbala on the tenth of Muharram. In 963 A.D., he ordered the hoisting of black flags in public places as a sign of mourning. Having received encouragement here, this ritual migrated to Iran with the Safavid rulers and became very popular among the Persians. The first Persian marsia writer was Shaikh Hamza Toosi, also known as Shaikh Azari, who visited the Deccan during the reign of Ahmad Shah Bahmani in the 15th century. In northern Indian it came with the resoration and return of Humayun in 1555. Marsias continued to be composed and recited in Persian, both in North and South India.

Marsia-writing assumed a prominent place in Urdu poetry in the Deccan from the reign of Qutub Shah down to Abul Hasan Tana Shah who surrendered to Aurangzeb in 1687. The language in which these marsias were composed was changed from Persian to Deccani, though the materials derived for these verses were from the 'maqals'. These maqals were composed by various people, and were written in Arabic.

But, all things considered, marsia writing showed scant literary merit. It was used as a vehicle for expressing grief on the martyrdom of Hussain and paying homage to his memory as a religious obligation.

Marsia writing flourished in Delhi during the reign of Mohammad Shah (1719 to 1748). Those responsible for introducing innovations and experiments in this traditional way of mourning were Miskeen, Hazeen, Mir Taqi Mir, Sauda, Sikandar, Gada, etc. Writing marsia in 'khari boli' and 'rekhta' was a new step. A modification of form and matter under the hands of Sauda and Zameer brought it closer to public understanding, and it gained in popularity. Sauda and Zameer brought the famous 'musaddas' (six line stanza) form in marsia writing. It is in this form that the marsia is recognised today. Zameer altered the structure by dividing marsia into eight parts: Chehra (opening), Sarapa (description), Rukhsat (parting), Aamad (entering the battle-field), Rajaz (description of one's achievements), Jung (battle), Shahadat (martyrdom) and Bain (weeping with words extolling the sense of loss of the martyr). Given such a structure, apart from being a mere religious ritual, it became infused with poetry, and the writers got an opportunity to display their poetic talents leading to an expansion of the descriptive portions.

After the destruction of Delhi in 1761 (third battle of Panipat) most of the writers and poets migrated to Faizabad and Lucknow. The then Nawabs of Lucknow, especially Shuja-ud-Daula and Asif-ud-Daula welcomed these writers. Among them were Sauda, Mir, Zameer, Sikandar Panjabi and Gada. The Nawabs of Oudh were Shias and descendents of the Prophet. For them propagation of the ritual of marsia rendering became almost like a religious obligation. As the majority of the people of Lucknow were Shias, the ten days of Muharram were observed with intense emotional fervour. Long impressive marsias were written to be recited during religious assemblies known as 'majlis'. Buildings were constructed to hold these assemblies and they became known as 'Imam Baras'. This gave a new stability to the form. It gained royal patronage as well as wide public acceptance. More and more writers joined the tradition, such as Chhanu Mal Dilgeer, Fasih, Mir Khaliq, Dabeer, Mir Anees and his brothers Monis and Uns. Dominant amongst them were Mir Anees and Mirza Dabeer, who perfected both the form and content. With fine description and delicate nuances of language, they added depth and feeling, giving it an emotive power through a dramatization of the scenes of battle and of the suffering of women and children. Both these poets are considered the last word in the realm of marsia. In particular, Mir Anees raised marsia to the level of a fine art. His descriptions of nature are unparalleled, and as for the depiction of emotions and sentiments, very few poets equal him. His marsias are replete with highest ethical and moral values, and uphold the dignity of man. His creative yet simple use of language endowed marsia with almost epic dimensions. After Anees and Dabeer, and with the eclipse of the Nawabs of Oudh, one of the later 19th century writers were effective enough and marsia recitation became a mere ritual. No new contributions were made, although Mir Waheed, Mir Ishq, Tashuq Mir Nafees, Doolha Saheb 'Urooj', Pyare Sahan 'Rasheed', etc. continued to write.

The 20th century saw the rise of 'nazam', a new form in Urdu poetry, and with Josh Malihabadi, marsia was renovated and given a new form, and a new cadence. Josh wrote his first 'musaddas' Husain Aur Ingulab, which was a modernization of the theme of Karbala. It was a new way of looking at the incident. Jameel Mazhari has also been responsible for carrying the tradition of marsia forward. He introduced contemporary themes into it, while abiding by the code of marsia writing. Writers influenced by this new style of writing are Safdar Husain, Rais Amrohvi, Ale Raza and Ummid Fazli, all from Pakistan.

With the passing away of 'Shadeed', 'Muhazzab' and Askari 'Jadeed', traditional marsia writing in Lucknow has almost come of an end. In Hyderabad, after the death of Shaheed Yar Jung, Baqar Amanat Khani is the last representative of the genre. Waheed Akhtar (b. 1936) has contributed significantly to keeping the tradition of marsia writing alive. Though he has not altered the form, he has given new dimensions to the content. Contemporary issues and problems find ample expression in his marsias. Many progressive writers have also composed marsias.

MARTANDA VARMA (Malayalam) is a novel by C.V. Raman Pillai. Martanda Varma is the first of a trilogy of historical novels which Raman Pillai wrote on the royal family of the erstwhile state of Travancore. The other two are Dharmaraja (1913) and Ramaraja Bahadur in two parts (1918-1920).

The title of the first work is derived from the name of King Martanda Varma (1706-1758) who was the consolidator of the Travancore State. Dharmaraja was the title of his successor, Rama Varma. Marapala Bahadur was another number of principalities in his time and built up the State of Travancore through strife and war. Originally he was the king of the principality called Venad where his succession to the throne was disputed. Padmanabhan Tampi and Raman Tampi were the contenders. They were sons of the previous king who was Martanda Varma's uncle. Martanda Varma ascended the throne on the sion. According to this system, brothers of the deceased or his sister's son succeeded the throne. But the Tampis apparently disputed this. They were supported by eight powerful families of Nair aristocrats. Martanda Varma finally succeeded in killing the Tampis and destroying the Nair families. In the consolidation and extension of his territories the ruler was aided by an able Brahmin Minister by name Ramayyan.

With this historical and political theme is fused the story of love between Ananta Padmanabhan, a young and loyal royalist, and Parukkutty, the member of an aristocratic family related to him. The young man and the girl had grown up together and were deeply in love. But misfortune separated them in strange circumstances. Ananta Padmanabhan was waylaid and attacked by the enemies of the king and left wounded in a forest. From there he was picked up by a group of Muslim travelling traders headed by an odd chief. The chief gave him shelter and extracted the promise that he would keep his identity a secret till he was allowed to disclose it. In the meantime Ananta Padmanabhan's enemies, not finding his body when they returned to collect it, presumed he was dead and spread the rumour that he had been killed by an evil spirit. Believing the story, Parukkutty lived in untold grief worsened by her mother's attempt to give her in marriage to Padmanabhan Tampi. The young man in the meanwhile, moved about in disguise rendering help to the king and Parukkutty in times of need. He saved the king's life on one occasion. After Martanda Varma brought the political situation under control, the Muslim Chief allowed the youth to lift his veil of secrecy. He married an overjoyed Parukkutty.

The story of Ananta Padmanabhan and Parukkutty is not the only story of love, separation and grief in this novel. Subhadra, a stout-hearted supporter of the king and niece of one of the king's implacable enemies, the Chief of the Kutaman family, is a tragic heroine. Her husband had deserted her as a result of the perfidy of Padmanabhan Tampi and Sundarayyan, his Brahmin dependent and evil adviser. This man lived with the Muslim traders the married as a Muslim girl. This brave woman, apparently taking revenge on society by consorting with more lovers than one, is nevertheless a noble character who saves the endangered life of the king stout-heartedly and is a tower of strength to Parukkutty in her illness and despair. Subhadra dies at the hands of her uncle who is enraged at her service to the king, his enemy. When she lies awaiting her death her husband visits her in penitence and indicates his anguished affection for her.

Raman Pillai weaves his plot around several sub-plots, all of which merge into a unity. His characters are vivid and portrayed in depth. His novel is full of picturesque descriptions. Martanda Varma is alive with several dramatic turns of events, a lot of heroic action, conspiracies and encounters. The novelist has drawn his dominant inspiration from his loyalty to the royal house of Travancore. Some critics have expressed the view that this fact has led him into painting the king's opponents in too much black. They also hold that he has perhaps taken his history from the version of the royalists among whom he was a prominent member. Despite such criticism there is wide-spread agreement that the novel reveals the author's great powers as an artist. But it is also realised that Martanda Varma is not as good a novel as his two later works in the trilogy. In Dharmaraja and Ramaraja Bahadur written several years later, the novelist's creative powers are at their peak.

MARY JOHN THOTTAM (Malayalam; b. 1901, d. 1985). The first Catholic woman to write poetry in Malayalam, Mary John Thottam, who later came to be known as Sister Beninja, was a native of Ernakulam district. After passing the Malayalam Higher examination, she entered the teaching profession and retired (1961) as headmistress of a Malayalam Middle school run by Carmelites, of whom she had voluntarily become a member in her 27th year in spite of several proposals for marriage.

Her first collection of poems Gitavali (1927) was introduced by Ulloor S. Parameswara Iyer. The last 14 poems in this collection have signs of an oncoming mystic change in her life which became a reality when she became a nun in the following year. The next, Kavitaraman (A garden of poems, 1927), consists of 12 poems including the touching 'Lokame yatra' (Farewell, O world). In one of them she appears as a champion of the woman's cause, condemning men's atrocities. The collection as a whole has had a deeper appeal and wider circulation than most other lyrical compositions of the time and this has been attributed to the simplicity of diction and sincerity of her feeling.

Madhumanjari, Kavanamela, Bharata mahalakshmi, Vidhivaibhavam, etc. are her other famous poetical contributions. Her most ambitious and most voluminous work, however, is a mahakavya entitled Marthoma vijayam, based on Christian mythology.

MARZBAN ADI FEROZESH AH (Gujarati; b. 1914. d. 1987) was born in Bombay. After taking his B.A. degree in literature from Bombay University in 1933 he joined Jam-e-Jamshed. He was editor of Gupsup too. From 1947 he worked as a staff producer of Akashvani, Bombay for Gujarati drama. He received a scholarship from the International Theatre Institute. In 1964 he received 'Padmashree' and in 1970 he was recipient of the award for the best director from the Sangeet Natak Akademi, Delhi. He died of cancer in Bombay.

He wrote and directed approximately 55 plays such as Tophani tolaki, Piroja bhawan, Katraiyu gap, Mathe Padela Mafatlal, Bairi ke bala?. For Akashvani, he wrote many radio plays. His T.V. serial, Avo mari sathe, was very popular.

MASCARENHAS, ALOYSINGS IGNATIUS (Konkani; b. 1916) was a journalist and a poet whose zeal and great love for Konkani revived among the Mangaloreans a new interest in the mother tongue during the earlier part of the 20th century. As a student he was keenly interested in natural sciences and languages. He was proficient not only in the English and Konkani languages, but also in French and Marathi, and had a fair knowledge of Latin, Sanskrit and Hindi.

The first Konkani periodical in Kannada script Konkani dirven (Konkani treasure) was started by Mascarenhas along with U. Kannappa. He was editor of the journal for the first five years, and continued his contribution to the same periodical as long as it was in existence. The periodical was closed down after 27 years of its publication.

He is affectionately remembered as a nature poet, who could express deep sentiments in simple but cultured language, as is evident from the collection of his poems in Konkani matecham rudan (Lament of mother Konkani). His poems are considered gems of keen observation and deep thought which he could express in a minimum number of words and within an effortless poetic discipline. He also wrote a few hymns and sacred songs of lasting merit, such as the famous verse collection, Vell-Kall suru zaunchea adin. His poetically composed Biblical drama, Abrahamchem yajnadan, is considered a masterpiece.

He is remembered by the Mangalorean Konkani community as a pioneer poet and a gentleman journalist.

MASHRUVALA, KISHORALAL GHANSHYAMA (Gujarati; b. 1890. d. 1952) was a Gujarati prose writer and a close associate of Mahatma Gandhi. He graduated from the Willson College, Bombay and obtained his LL.B. in 1913. Soon after Mahatma Gandhi returned from South Africa, Mashruvala joined him at his Ahmedabad Ashram and remained a close associate and follower of Gandhi for the rest of his life. He was imprisoned several times during the freedom struggle and worked in various capacities in many of the Gandhian institutions. After 1948, he took over the task of editing Harijan, a periodical founded and edited by Mahatma Gandhi.

His first attempts at writing consisted of biographies of some religious leaders. Of these Rama ane Krishna, Buddha ane Mahavira and Sahajananda Svami were published in 1923 and Ishu Khrista in 1925. In these books he tried to present the lives of religious leaders from a rational point of view and did not hesitate to criticise them or their teachings when he found them wanting in rationality. These books brought him into conflict with the religious leaders having an orthodox and traditional mind.

Education was one of his primary concerns. In Kelavanina paya (1925), Kelavani viveka (1949) and Kelavanivikasa (1950) he set forth his unorthodox views on educational system. No doubt, these books offer valuable thoughts on education, but some of his views, like those on history and creative literature, are, to say the least, controversial.

Jivanasodhuna (1929) is an attempt at understanding the basic values of life in the light of Gandhian ideology and rational thinking. Gitamanthana (1931) offers his views and criticism of Bhagavadgita. His views on man-woman relationship expounded in Stri-purusha-maryada (1937) may seem too conservative and outdated to a modern mind. This is perhaps because he was not able to come out of the overwhelming influence of the traditional religious set-up to which his family belonged.

MASNAVI-KASHMIRI

Samsara ane dharma (1948), Kagatani najare (1947), Gandhiji ane samyavada (1951) and Ahimsavivechana (1942) are his other books related to Gandhian thought. But his most discussed, valuable and controversial work is Samuli kranti (1948). In this book he covered the entire gamut of the social life, religion, economics, politics, education, industries, social and personal relations etc. and presented a programme for the total transformation of both the individual and the social character.

Gandhivicharadohana (1932) is a compendium of the thoughts of Mahatma Gandhi on various topics and issues. He also has to his credit the following translations: Gitadhvani (1933), translation of Bhagavadgita, Satyamaya jivana (1933), a transcreation based on Lord Morle's On Compromise, Vidaya velae (1935), translation of The prophet by Khalil Jibran, Timiramam prabha (1936), translation of The Light Shines in Darkness, a play by Tolstoy, Udhaimam jivana (1940), translation of Life of the White Ant by Morris Maeterlink, and Manavi Khandiye (1946), translation of Who Walk Alone, a novel by Perry Burquess.

D.B.M.

MASNAVI (Kashmiri) is a long continuous poem in which one couplet of each verse is iambic with the other verse and all the verses are in single metre. There is no restriction about the number of the verses to be composed for conveying the thought. This genre is a Persian innovation, though having some resemblance with Arabic genre, 'rajaz'. The masnavis are generally of three kinds: 'razmiya' masnavi in which some war event is depicted and described. The other is 'bazmiya' or love masnavi and the third type contains mystic or philosophical subjects.

The first kind, razmiya, falls strictly within the purview of epic. Love masnavis are to a great extent versified fiction. They usually contain stories of love.

For more than a century masnavi not only dominated literature, but also society as a whole. During the winter season, the local population was forced to remain indoors, sitting idle and having no means of recreation. In such circumstances, the only recreation was the recitation of masnavis. In one or the other house the local people would assemble together; some literate person with melodious voice would recite the chapters loudly but in a sweet voice, the audience would enjoy recitation and after reading a chapter or part, the reader would convey the gist of the story to the listeners. During the last three decades, the new avenues of recreation were introduced and this practice by and large came to an end, though in remote areas of Doda, Rajouri and Punch districts in Jammu and hilly tracts of the valley, the practice is still in vogue. However, in the main areas, masnavi recitation is now out of fashion and this in turn affected further development of this genre.

Islam in the 13th and 14th centuries revolutionised the whole cultural set up in Kashmir. The language of the missionaries, who came to Kashmir from Iran and Central Asia, was Persian. This contact affected the local language and literature. Of the poetic genres of Persian literature masnavi was the first to infiltrate Kashmiri literature and to make considerable contribution to the quality and quantity of the verse. The verse in masnavi form constitutes two-thirds of Kashmiri poetry.

Sheikh Nur-ud-Din (1377-1438), the saint poet of Kashmir, is the first masnavi poet who made initial contribution to this genre. He wrote poems with the purpose of teaching the local new converts the fundamentals of Islam. In Kashmir nami haq or Sado si masail (Hundred and thirty questions), he versified the fundamental principles necessary for observance before or during the prayer. This small masnavi is yet to be published. Till the 18th century, this genre could not make any headway. It was only during 1754-1764 that Prakashram 'Kurigami' wrote Ramavtar charit (Kashmiri Ramayana), which has now been published by the Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages, Srinagar.

Mahmud Gami (1765-1855) is considered to be the founder of Kashmiri masnavi. His famous masnavis are Laila Majnu, Shirin Khusrau, Sheikh Sana, etc., besides his contribution to lyric, 'naat' and satire. Among his numerous masnavis, Yusuf Zulaikha is a masterpiece. This was even translated into German by a scholar, Fredric Berckhard.

A famous folklore of the love of an aryan princess, Himal, with a Nag prince, Nagi Rai, was versified by two poets, Waliullah Mattu (d. 1858) and Saif-ud-Din Tarabali (d. 1874). Mattu used simple, common language in his masnavi, but Tarabali was too much concerned with verbosity and innovation. The latter also versified the love story of Vamiq-Uzra.

The tragic love of a princess of Balkh Zain-ul-Arab with the slave of her brother, Yaktash, received emotional treatment in Abdul Ahad 'Nazim's' (1816-1865) masnavi Zainul-Arab.

The evolution of masnavi reached its zenith with the Gulrez of Maqbul Shah Kralwari (1802-1877). It is equally popular with the masses and the elite. The story is borrowed from an unnoticed Persian masnavi of Zia Nakhshabi, but Maqbul's skill has made the love story of the princess of Baitul Aman a folk-legend of our soil. Its hero, Ajab Malik, and heroine, Noshe Lab, have now become part of the local environment. The sincere expression of human emotions, the nativised description of environments, the abundance of metaphors, originality of similes, the flow of language and artistic blending of plots are unique characteristics of this masnavi. Each verse is a full lyric in itself. The popularity of this masterpiece made many great poets follow the diction of Gulrez. Besides, Maqbul is the king of the domain of satire. His two masnavis, Gri'stnama and Malanama, make sarcastic exposure of the hypocrisies of a peasant and Mullah respectively, but each verse is full of indirect satire upon socio-political set-up in Kashmir of Maqbul's times. His another masnavi, Yusuf Zulaikha, is not traceable and Mansurnama is a mystic poem. Lakhman Bulbul (1812-1884) versified the story of Kalila and Damna in another masnavi.

Khwaja Akram Baqal 'Daidlad' (1840-1885), known as a poet of sweet tongue, is the only poet who neither borrows the story of his masnavi, Mehro Mah, from any foreign literature, nor from local legends, but allegorically tells about his own failure in love and life. Maulvi Sidiqullah Hajini (1833-1900) composed Shimailnama (the word-picture of the Prophet). His another masnavi, Behram Gul Andam, is romantic fiction. Ali Muhammad Ashiq Trali (1842-1908) versified a living love story of his own area. A peasant boy, Nura, loves another village girl, Mal, and becomes mad. This story is artistically elaborated in a living fiction by the author in his masnavi, Noormal. His another masnavi versifying a borrowed story of Zehra and Behram is burdened with too many Persian words.

Abdul Wahab Parrey of Hajin (1845-1914) wrote volumes in various forms of poetry. In epic composition he is called 'Firdausi of Kashmir'. In masnavi, his Naunihal Gul Bedam could not achieve recognition. In the same genre, he composed a long poem Darveshi in which he also gives detailed description of the down-trodden and the oppressed Kashmir during his time. He even describes the devastation caused by frequent floods and earthquakes. Maulvi Ali Shah (b. 1912) is the author of 35 books and made contribution to this genre.

Two great contemporaries of the same name and pen-name Pir Mohi-ud-Din Miskeen and Haji Mohi-ud-Din Miskeen contributed 'Khamsas' (Five masnavis each) in the style of the Persian masters like Nizami, Jami and Khusrau. The latter was also a historian. Pir Miskeen (d. 1917) wrote Zeba Nigar, Sohini Mahival, Laila Majnu, Chander Bedam and Hir Ranjha. All are equally good pieces. Among Haji Miskeen's (1863-1921) masnavis, Vamiq Uzra, Yusuf Zulaikha and Gul Nur are famous. Abdul Ghaffar 'Fariq' (1870-1925), Darwesh Abdul Qadir and Shamus-ud-Din 'Gamgin' (b. 1904) also wrote masnavis of the love story of Yusuf Zulaikha. Pir Abdul Qadir's (d. 1902) Shakar Rez is a poor imitation of Gulrez.

Azizullah Haqani (1854-1928) was the last great poet of masnavi. Among his masnavis are Gulbuni Ishq, Jauhari Ishq, Mahro Gul Andan, Chandar Bedam, Guldasta-i-Benazir. The Qissa-i-Mumtaz-i-Benazir is the translation of the Urdu masnavi, Sihru bayān, of Mir Hassan. Khwaja Assadullah 'Mir' (1877-1928) also wrote Qissa Mumtaz-i-Benazir and this story was even versified by Haji Ilyas (1881-1941). Both these poets could not compete with Haqani's Mumtaz. Haji Ilyas also versified the biography of Muhammad under the title Stratum Nabi, which has not seen the light of the day so far.

Abdul Rahim Aima of Banihal (1884-1930), Pir Ghulam Muhammad Hanafi (1869-1937), Muhammad Ismail Nami (1884-1940) and Lassa Khan (d. 1939) have by their masterly skill kept the flame of masnavi burning at the time when its popularity had started to decline. Aima wrote Gulbadan, Hanafi composed five masnavis whereas Lassa Khan wrote thousands of verses to convey the love story of Gul-i-Bakavali. Mahmud Gami had given poor performance in composing the love story of Shirin-Khusrau. This was set right by Nami who wrote the love story of these Iranian lovers in his masnavi, Shirin-Khusrau, with better skill. Abdul Ahad 'Azad' (1893-1948) is considered to be a poet of humanity and messenger of revolution. In spite of his great stature both as poet and critic, he too was attracted by the popularity of masnavi and started his poetic career by composing two masnavis, Chandar badan and Qamarzaman Badora. Both are traditionally good masnavis. Ghulam Ahmad Bashir (d. 1941) also versified Qamarzaman's love story, and as this work was immediately published, it became popular. Shamus-ud-Din Hairat Kamili (1890-1968) was both a great scholar and master of classical music. Besides writing masnavi about the love story of 'Zeba and Nigar', he translated the first volume of Jalal-ud-Din Rumi's Persian masnavi. Abdul Gani Thokar (b. 1920) composed masnavis like Wazira Mal, Bulbul hazar dastan, Sair-i-jannat and Qissa-i-Ayub Sabir. A great living mystic poet, Abdul Ahad 'Zargar' (b. 1908), has versified Gul-i-Sanobar. Naz Kulagami (b. 1920), now living in occupied Kashmir, has translated the Persian masnavi of Iqbal, Asrar-o-Ramoz. During the centenary celebrations of Iqbal, Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' (b. 1934) translated Iqbal's smaller masnavi Gulshani Razi Jadid. Nilakanth Sharma translated the Bhagvatgita in the same form.

MASNAVI (Sindhi), a long narrative poem, originally a Persain poetic form, was known in the Sindhi literary world during the period of Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752). It is a recorded fact that Shah Abdul Latif's never-failing friends were the books like the Holy Quran in Arabic, Rumi's Masnavi in Persian and Shah Abdul Karim's 'bayts' in Sindhi.

Lekhraj Aziz (1897-1967) evinced great love for this poetic form and wrote two masnavis, Misra ji Rani and Shahrah (both posthumously published in 1970). Before him, only two Sindhi poets had tried their hand, not very successfully, at this form.

Misra ji Rani is a long narrative poem in which earthly love is exalted to mean divine love and gnosticism. Shahrah, again on the same theme, is based on a Hindi short story 'Pagadandi' by Kamalakant Varma, translated into Sindhi by Jagat Advani.

MASNAVI (Urdu). Masnavi is a form of verse in which the two 'misras' of a couplet are rhymed. All the couplets have likewise internal rhyme, but the rhyme keeps on changing with every couplet. Thus, the rhyme composition of the couplets of a masnavi is aa, bb, cc, etc. As the composer has to care about two rhymes only at a time, it is possible to compose any length of poem in this form. Because of this facility, all the long poems in Persian and Urdu are clothed in masnavi form e.g., the great Persian Shah nama of Firdausi. Masnavis of all sizes are found, ranging from two to about 60,000 couplets. In Urdu literature it is common to come across poems in masnavi form, consisting of 10 to 100 lines with all sorts of themes. When we speak of the masnavi in Urdu literature, we generally keep in mind only long masnavis which may consist of say, 200 to 500 lines and the average long masnavis consisting of 1000 to 2000 couplets.

Persian masnavi could be written in one of the seven prescribed metres. Urdu followed suit as far as long masnavis are concerned, with the sole exception of Shah nama-e-Islam of Hafiz Jullunduri which is in a different metre. Even the short masnavis were written in the prescribed metres, but in recent times this rule is not being adhered to. There is no logical reason why masnavi should be confined to any prescribed metres.

Although technically masnavi means a mere form of verse, tradition has limited it to certain themes. The themes of Urdu masnavi are not as variegated as those of the Persian masnavi. Unlike the epic and mystic masnavis in Persian, in Urdu, almost all the long masnavis are love romances. There are hardly any epic or mystic masnavis of the first order in Urdu. Thematically, the most of the Urdu masnavis can be classified into two types.

1. Comparatively shorter masnavis depicting the intensity of love sentiments, the frame-story being very slim, a mere excuse to give expression to all-pervading emotions. Such masnavis consist of some 150 to 500 couplets.

2. Verse 'dastans' detailing the love exploits and amorous escapades of a knightly hero who is always a prince, the heroine being a princess or better still, a fairy princess. These masnavis have supernatural elements like fairy, giant, etc., too. This type of masnavis is more abundant. The main difference in the two types is that the former has a commoner as the hero, who is crushed by the events and adverse forces, and comes to a tragic end. In the latter, the hero is always from the upper class of society, or the royalty, who vanquishes all the adverse forces and is victorious in the end. Thus, these masnavis are always comedies.

The fairy tale masnavis are super-natural fiction in verse. They are evaluated both as poetry as well as fiction. In evaluating a long masnavi, one has to comment on plot, characterisation, depiction of natural scenery, portrayal of sentiments, and depiction of the contemporary culture. All the important dastans of Urdu have been rendered into verse, but very few of them can be termed as good masnavis.

From the 14th to the 18th century, Urdu literature flourished in the Deccan and only after that it grew in north India. The Deccani poetry is overwhelmingly in masnavi form unlike in the North where ghazal was the predominant form. It is difficult to explain the popularity of masnavi in the Deccan. In Persian, masnavi has been a strong form of poetry not secondary to ghazal. Ghazal could not invade the citadels of Urdu poetry (in the Deccan) as long as it was dominated by Hindi diction and literary tradition. Only when Wali consciously brought Urdu poetry under the Persian influence, ghazal could get in with some force. Before Wali, every major Urdu poet of the Deccan was a masnavi writer only.

The number of masnavis produced in the Deccan is very large. Only the important ones will be detailed below. It may be noted that there is some difference of opinion regarding the dates of some masnavis. The more probable dates will be given here.

The most important branch is the fairy tale type. The first masnavi of the Deccan—incidentally the first book of Urdu—is Fakhr Din Nizami's Kadam Rao Padam Rao written between 1421 and 1435. It has been edited and published by Jamil Jalibi in 1973. The others are Wajhi's Qutb Mushtari (1609), Ghawwasi's Maina Satwanti, Saif-ul Muluk-o-Badi-ul-Jamal (1616) and Tuti nama, (1639), Amin and Daulat's Behram-o-Husn Bano, (1640), Malik Khushnud's Jannat Singar (Hasht Bahisht) (1640), Junaidi's Mah Paikar (1653); Ibn-e-Nishati's Phul Ban (1655), Nusrati's Gulshan-e-Ishq (1657); Tabi's Behram-o-Gul Andam (1670), Faiz's Rizwan Shah-o-Roohafza (1682), Muhammad Ali Ajiz's Oissa-e-Malika-e-Misir (1688), Arifuddin Khan Ajiz's Qissa-e-Lalo Gohar; Baqar Agah, Gulzar-e-Ishq 1796; and Qissa-e-Rizvan Shah, Ghulam Qadir Sami's Sarvo Shamshad. Of these, Ibn-e-Nishati's Phul Ban and Nusrati's Gulshan-e-Ishq are the best. Wajhi's Qutb Mushtari, Ghawwasi's Saif-ul-Muluk-o-Badi-ul-Jamal and Tabee's Behram-o-Gul and Tabee's Behram-o-Gul Andam are also good poems.

Closely allied to these are masnavis which lay more emphasis on the portrayal of intense love and the plot in them gets secondary importance. Notable among these are Shekh Ahmed's Yusuf Zulekha (between 1580 and 1588), Laila Majnun (prior to 1611), Mohammad Ajiz's Yusuf Zulekha (1697), Siraj's Boostane Khayal (prior to 1739), Wala Moosvi's Talib-o-Mohni (1757).

This third type is historical and epic by nature. A lot of fiction is mixed with these so-called historical masnavis. Important ones among these masnavis are: Hasan Shauqi's Zafar Nama-e-Nizam Shah (1564), Mezban Nama, (1632), Abdul's Ibrahim Nama (1603), Rustumi's, Khawar Nama (1665), Nusrati's Ali Nama (1667) and Tarikh-e-Iskandari (1672) and Ghulam Ali's Padmavat (1680).

The Deccan can also boast of many good mystical or religious masnavis. They are Ashraf's Nau Sarhar (1503) Firoz Bidari's Prit Nama (between 1533 and 1564), Khub Mohd. Chishti's Khub Tarang (1578), Sanati's Qissa-e-Benazir (1645), Bahri, Man Lagan (1706), Ishrati's Neh Darpan, Wali Vellori's Rozatuo Shohoda.

Of the Deccan poets, Ghawwasi, Ibn-e-Nishati and Nusrati are the best. They match the notable North Indian poets of Urdu. There is no such variety of themes in the North Indian masnavis as the following survey will reveal. There may be more unpublished masnavis in North India than the published ones. Mention is made only of the important ones.

The oldest masnavi in North India is Bikat Kahani by Afzal. Its exact date is not known, but it is supposed to have been written before 1625. The oldest reference to this masnavi is in Akram Rohtaki Qutbi's Terah masa written in 1730-31. According to him, Afzal's name was Gopal and he belonged to Narnaul in Haryana. Bikat Kahani is a 'barahmasa' in which a married dame gives vent to her pangs of separation, with her husband in the background of each of the twelve months of the Hindu calendar. Although this masnavi has many Persian couplets, its general milieu is that of Braj Bhasha poetry. Another old romantic masnavi was written by Fazail Ali Khan Beqaid in 1739 or 1740. This masnavi is lost, but quite many of its lines are found in 'tazkiras'. In this autobiographical poem, the author pines for the separated beloved.

Shah Ayatullah Johari of Bihar composed a long masnavi, Gohar-e-Johari, in 1747. It is a collection of episodes, the last episode containing a long barahmasa in imitation of the Bikat Kahani cited earlier. This masnavi was written in Bihar and is a good barahmasa. The North Indian masnavi confined itself to the description of intense love sentiments before venturing into the realm of versifying supernatural dastans. Sauda and Mir, two great poets, wrote such amorous masnavis. Sauda's masnavi Ishqe Shishagar ba zergar Pizar, spread over 500 couplets was composed between 1774 and 1780. Homosexual love was much in vogue in the 18th century Delhi and this masnavi is about the affair of two young men.

The first important masnavi written in northern India was by the great Urdu poet, Mir Taqi Mir (1722-1810). Although Mir wrote many small masnavis, the more important are his eight love masnavis which are a class by themselves. Mir begins these masnavis with a long eulogy of the lofty emotion of love. This is a specimen of lyric poetry. In the tale itself, a young man falls prey to love at first sight with a damsel, gets killed and later on his beloved, too, dies mysteriously at the site of lover's death. The dead bodies unite after death. In one of the masnavis, the beloved of the hero happens to be a boy, and in another masnavi, the love affair takes place between a queen and a male peacock. But the chief importance of the masnavis of Mir lies in their poetic portrayal of the tender sentiment of intense love which is like a living force moving the universe.

The Deccan masnavi, Chander Badan-o-Mahyar by Muquimi is a precursor of Mir, but the latter was not aware of it. He took this theme from certain Persian masnavis. It became very popular and Mir had many important followers. Mirza Ali Lutf's Nairang-e-Ishq (prior to 1774), Rasikh Azimabadi's six masnavis and Mushafi's Behrul Mohabbat etc., are plain copies of Mir. Rasikh was a disciple of Mir and could copy him to some extent. His diction is not so fluent as that of Mir. Mushafi wrote four masnavis in Mir's style. His Behrul Mohabbat, written before 1810, is another version of Mir's most famous masnavi, Darya-e-Ishq. Qaim Chandpuri's masnavi Jazb-e-ulfat is also in the same pattern. This masnavi has been erroneously included in the works of Sauda. Many lesser known poets also wrote masnavis on the lines of Mir. This shows the popularity of an idealistic, unearthly concept of love.

Allied to the above genre are a few long poems revolving around the theme of intense love. Mir Asar, younger brother of Mir Dard, wrote Khab-o-Khayal. Its language is praiseworthy. Jurat's Husn-o-Ishq or Hasan Bakhshi (1777) is also noteworthy. Then there are several poems about celebrated love couples. Some of these are Asrare Mohabbat (about Sassi Punnu, 1782) by Nawab Mohabbat Khan, Laila Majnun (probably 1798) by Tajalli, Yusuf Zulekha (1797) by Figar and similar other poems by lesser-known poets.

Mention must also be made of some shorter masnavis with fewer than 100 lines, written in the 18th and the early 19th century by Shah Hatim, Faiz, Abru, Sauda, Saz, Mir, Hasrat, Qaim, Mir Hasan, Mushafi, Jurat and Insha.

MASNAVI-URDU

These small masnavis are nearer to earth and life. They deal with the dilapidated house of the poet, 'charpai', mosquitos, flies, quack 'hakims' etc.

While Mir headed the genre of the masnavis of intense feelings, Mir Hasan, the greatest name in the field of masnavi, wrote the fairy tale type of masnavi. His Gulzar-e-Iram (1778) is an autobiographical poem detailing Mir Hasan's migration from Delhi to Faizabad via Lucknow. Its fame lies in its satirizing of Lucknow. The third masnavi Rumoozul Arifin (1774) is didactic, mystic and moral in content. Mir Hasan wrote a few short masnavis, too.

Saadat Yar Khan Rangin wrote numerous long and short masnavis and grouped them in such intricate permutations and combinations as defy comprehension. Only three masnavis from this maze are worthy of mention. Ijad-e-Rangin is a collection of moral episodes like Mir Hasan's Rumoozal Arifin. Faras Nama (1795) is a treatise on the types, habits, diseases, etc. of horses. His masnavi, Dilpazir (1798), is an unpublished and little known poem. It is one of the most pleasant Urdu masnavis in the romantic fairy tale type. Two of its manuscripts in Rampur and London are in the handwriting of the author himself.

Momin, the famous ghazal writer of Delhi, also wrote a few masnavis six of which are accounts of his love-making. They have 360 to 592 couplets each. The frankness with which he relates his amorous ventures is remarkable. For him love is synonymous with carnal desire. A Delhi contemporary of his, Moolchand Munshi, versified a précis of Persian Shahnama and called it Qissa-e-Khusrawan-e-Ajam (1810).

Almost all the poets mentioned above belonged to Delhi. Now the centre of gravity shifts to Lucknow. Mirza Mohd. Taqi Hawas, a disciple of Mushafi, wrote two long masnavis. His Laila Majnun, written in 1797, is well-known and has been printed several times. Not known is his unpublished masnavi, a nice fairy tale, included in two copies of his Diwan. It must have been written between 1827 and 1837 and, like Rangin's Dilpazir, is a very nice romance.

Mir Zamir, Fasih, Rashk and Nasikh wrote several religious masnavis according to the Shia beliefs.

Pandit Daya Shankar Nasim is the unrivalled representative of the Lucknow school of masnavi. His Gulzare Nasim, which versifies the tale of Gul Bakavali, was completed in 1838. His acknowledged source was Nihalchand Lahori's prose work Mazhab-e-Ishq, but he must have seen Khayaban-e-Rehan by Rehan, too. This masnavi is famous for its brevity, rapidity of narration, figures of speech and poetic value. It lacks in the description of natural scenery and contemporary culture. It is perfect in technique and hence saw a host of imitators. While Sehrul Bayan is considered the best masnavi of Delhi, Gulzar-e-Nasim is regarded as the best of Lucknow.

One of his imitators is Aftabuddola Khaja Asad Ali Khan Qalag whose voluminous masnavi, Tilsim-e-Ulfat, having more than 7000 couplets, was completed in the reign of Wajid Ali Shah, perhaps in 1854. This is a fairy tale type romance which is influenced both by Mir Hasan and Nasim. It uses the chaste Lucknow language. If one wants to read the King's Urdu, one should read the masnavis of Wajid Ali Shah. His three supernatural fiction type masnavis are notable. They are Afsane-e-Ishq, Darya-e-Tashshuq and Bahr-e-Ulfat, all written between 1837 and 1842. His Ishq Nama, containing more than 8000 lines, details his love (sex) exploits. He also wrote a religious masnavi, Sabatul Quloob, the two volumes of which contain about 48000 lines. This has not been published. His masnavi, Huzn-e-Akhtar (1818) is his autobiographical account of migrating from Lucknow to Calcutta. His queen, Badshah Mahal Alam's masnavi, Alam is better. This fairy tale is an imitation of the masnavi of Mir Hasan.

Mention should be made of Nawab Mirza Tasadduq Husain Shauq of Lucknow, the author of Fareb-e-Ishq, Bahar-e-Ishq and Zahr-e-Ishq. With the chastity of his language he is one of the best of the Urdu poets. His masnavi, Bahar-e-Ishq, is unrivalled in the whole Urdu literature as far as idiomatic, chaste language is concerned. It is the description of a rape by the poet of a beautiful maiden. His Fareb-e-Ishq is also the tale of his adultery. Zahr-e-Ishq, written in 1860, is a bit serious. Its heroine commits suicide. Her pathetic speech at her parting from her paramour, just before her suicide, is moving. Similar is the wailing and crying of her mother at her death. It was because of the charm of his language that many poets tried to imitate Shauq. Mushir Lucknawi, Safir Bilgrami in his Fitana-e-Ishq (1856), Ahsan in Jazb-e-Ishq, Azal in Sehr-e-Ishqa (1892), etc.

Asir of Lucknow wrote a romantic masnavi, Durratul Taj (1851), and three religious masnavis. Dabir, 'marsia' writer, too, attempted two religious masnavis. Amirullah Taslim wrote several fictional masnavis, the chief being Nala-e-Taslim, (1852), Sham-e-Ghariban (1862), Subh-e-Khandan (1877), Dil-o-Jan and History of Rampur in three versified volumes written in 1879, 1896 and 1894. Subh-e-Khandan is his best work. Munir Shikotabadi wrote a Shia religious masnavi, Merajul Mazamin, (1869) and Hajab-e-Zanan, pleading for retention of 'pardah' for women. Amir Minai wrote a romantic fiction in his unnamed masnavi on the lines of Mir Hasan. This was discovered and published in 1960. His Karnama-e-Ishrat, (1860), describes the festivities of the wedding of a Rampur prince. Amir's other masnavis are small religious tales. Mohsin Kaborvi wrote a few short religious masnavis from 1872 to 1893.

Nawab Mirza Dagh wrote Faryad-e-Dagh in 1882. This describes his love affair with a prostitute, Hijab. This masnavi has got the finest idiomatic language of Delhi and in this, Dagh of Delhi was a successful rival of Shauq of Lucknow. The last important fairy tale type masnavi is Tarana-e-Shauq (1887) by Shauq Qidwai of Lucknow. In plot as well as language and the technique, he tried to copy Gulzar-e-Nasim. Shauq's Alam-e-Khayal is a modern masnavi, depicting the feelings of a wife who waits for her husband to return from some journey. In Lucknow, Nawal Kishore got the Arabian Nights versified. It has about 54000 couplets and is the longest masnavi in Urdu. It was completed in 1875 by Tota Ram Shayan and others. Agha Ali Shams wrote Talatus Shams before 1881. This is a pleasant masnavi about the king Suleman, and his queen Bilqis.

With the coming of the modern era in Urdu poetry after 1857, masnavi writing suffered a set-back. Hali and Azad wrote short masnavis in Lahore, which were about social problems, nature or on patriotism. Hali's Jubbe Watan, Barkha rut and Manajat-e-Bewa, written in 1874 and later, are famous. Manajat-e-Bewa, depicting a child widow's sentiments, is a masterpiece. Only two twentieth century long masnavis are worth mentioning. Jigar Barelvi wrote a Hindu mythological poem, Payam-e-Savitri, in 1930, which was published in 1954. Hafiz Jullundari wrote Shah Nama-e-Islam in four big volumes from 1928 to 1947. And after that masnavi loses its identity. Today long poems are not in vogue and the rhymic form of a poem has lost all importance.

MASNAVI SIHRUL BAYAN (Urdu) is a long narrative poem based on the subject of love. It was written by Mir Hasan in 1785, during the reign of Asif-ud-Daula, the then ruler of Lucknow. Mir Hasan was born in 1727 in Delhi. He received his early education from his father, Mir Zahik, a well-known humorist of his time. Mir Hasan shifted to Faizabad along with his father, when Delhi was in the grip of political turmoil. In 1775, when Asif-ud-Daula ascended the throne, Mir Hasan moved to Lucknow, where he died in 1786.

Sehrul Bayan is a very popular masnavi in Urdu. It is also known as the Qissai Benazir aur Badremunir or the story of Benazir and Badremunir, the two central characters of the poem. The poem has, indeed, immortalized the name of Mir Hasan in Urdu poetry. His other works are: (1) Dewan-i-Gazaliyat, (2) A memoir of Urdu poets, (3) Masnavi Gulzar-Iram, (4) Masnavi Ramooz-ul-Aarifeen.

Sihrl Bayan is a 'masnavi'. Masnavi generally deals with a continuous theme relating to love in short couplets. Each verse comprises two lines having a similar rhyme scheme. Thematically, it usually narrates a love story connected with some royal dynasty.

The main story of Sihrl Bayan is based on the love story of prince Benazir and Badremunir, a princess. Benazir is a handsome, delicate and passionate prince whose birth is prophesied by astrologers to the heirless, dismayed king. In the prime of his youth, a fairy is bewitched by his matchless beauty; she carries him to the abode of the fairies, where he is given a grand place to live in. He is provided with a magical horse to move about on, provided that he daily returns in time. One day, he sees a beautiful princess, Badremunir, the attractive and intelligent Najm-u-Nisa, daughter of the 'Wazir', in a royal garden amidst her maids. He falls in love with her. The feeling of love is reciprocated by Badremunir. Najm-u-Nisa arranges a secret meeting between them. But their exuberant joy is short-lived. The fairy, on hearing of Benazir's attachment to the princess, is aflame with anger, and wreaks vengeance on Benazir by throwing him into a deep and dark well in a vast desert. Badremunir, in consequence, is subjected to the pangs of separation. She is ultimately united with Benazir. She succeeds with the active help of Ferozeshah, the son of the king of jinns, in rescuing Benazir from the well. Thus, the lovers are re-united and their marriage takes place with royal gaiety.

Obviously, it is a simple love story, fabricated by the poet, though some strands of the story, e.g., the king's craving for a heir, the role played by the supernatural characters, etc., are traceable in old fables and stories. From the artistic point of view, the story lacks depth. The characters, by and large, are devoid of individualistic traits. Benazir, the hero, instead of being heroic and steadfast, is feminine in his grace and delicacy. Najm-u-Nisa, however, endowed with a personality, to some extent.

The story, though purely imaginary in character, appears to be realistic in that it, at places, throws adequate light on the social customs and manners of the age, superstitions, dress, ornaments, social events, royal palaces and gardens. The poet gives graphic descriptions of social and regal happenings and celebrations. He possesses an extraordinary power of observation. But, what is significant is that he dwells on the imaginative workings of his mind, which enables him to create a magical world of his own. This world is characterised by fabulous riches, affluence, radiance, beauty and magic.

Masnavi Sihrl Bayan, with its minute observation and lucidity of style, sets a landmark in the development of the genre. It goes without saying that it is the most significant long poem in Urdu poetry.

MASUD HUSAIN KHAN (Urdu, born 1919) belongs to a noted family of the Pathans in Kaimganj, to which also belonged the late Dr. Zakir Husain (former President of

MATE, SRIPAD MAHADEO

India) who was his uncle. Masud Husain received his education at the Aligarh Muslim University, and completed his Ph.D. in 1945. He went abroad to receive training in Linguistics and in 1953 got D. Litt. from the University of Paris. He started his teaching career at Aligarh, and had a stint at the University of California in 1959-60. He became Professor of Urdu at Osmania University in 1962, where he worked for seven years before coming back to Aligarh, where he served from 1968-73 and 1978-80. He became Vice Chancellor of Jamia Millia Islamia in 1973 where he served till 1978. He was for some time General Secretary of the Anjuman Taraqqi-e-Urdu (Hind), and presently is Sheikhu'l Jamia of Jamia-e-Urdu, Aligarh.

Along with S.M. Qadri Zore, and Abdul Qadir Sarwari, Masud Husain belongs to the first generation of linguists in Urdu. Muqaddama-e-tarikh-e-zaban-e-Urdu, his basic work, which discusses the theories of the origin of Urdu, was published in 1949 and A Phonetic and Phonological Study of the Word in Urdu appeared in 1954. During his stay in the Deccan he edited some old Urdu texts, such as Afzal's Bikat Kahani, Prat Nama, Qissa Mehr Afrozo-Dibar, Abraham Nama, Ashoor Nama, etc. He has also published three collections of articles on Urdu language and literature, including some on stylistics. He has one collection of poems, Do-neem, also to his credit. His study, Iqbal ki nazari-o-amali sheriyaat, received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1984.

MATE, SRIPAD MAHADEO (Marathi; b. 1886, d. 1957), a great scholar and a thinker in Marathi, was born at Sripur, Vidarbha. He had to fight with odds to complete his education, as he lost his father at the age of one. He studied at Fergusson College, Pune and did his B.A. in 1912 and M.A. in 1915. He was deeply interested in Sanskrit and English languages and literatures.

He began his career as a teacher at the New English School in 1915 and then joined Nutan Marathi Vidyalaya in 1920. He was appointed lecturer in Marathi at Sir Parasurambhau College, Pune, in 1935 and retired in 1945.

Better known as Bapusaheb Mate, he took keen interest in social work, especially in the upliftment of the untouchables. He founded the institution name 'Samaj Vichar Mandal' for scientific study of social problems which had roots in the caste system of India.

Bapusaheb Mate was also a journalist of great calibre. He started his career as a correspondent of Deshsevak and Kal, renowned weeklies in Marathi. In 1930, he was entrusted with the responsibility of editing a volume titled Kesari-prabodh. It was published in 1931. The volume gives very good account of the work done by Kesari in its first 50 years. He published a volume of one thousand pages entitled Maharashtra-sanvatsarik athawa Marathi varshik jnan sangraha. This volume was edited for the benefit of the social workers, who educated the masses in the villages or small cities through lectures. He edited a book namely Kelkar to commemorate N. C. Kelkar, a great Marathi literary personality. Bapusaheb's evaluation and appreciation of Kelkar as an editor was a great contribution to the volume.

Mate wrote nine short biographies of great persons, some of them being Martin Luther King, Sikandar, etc., which became very popular. His great work Vigyan bodh (1934-35) brought him recognition among his readers. He tried to give up-to-date information of the progress made by various sciences. In the introduction, Mate fervently pleads that development in the new world depends upon adopting a scientific attitude to life and making advancement in various branches of science. He appeals to the intellectuals in Maharashtra to rise to the occasion and compete with scientists in the world. He attacked the traditional Indian philosophical attitude which, according to him, was detrimental to material progress. Some fifteen hundred copies of this great work were destroyed in fire. He could not fulfil his ambition to publish this sort of work every year.

Bapusaheb Mate's book, Asprishyancha prashna, is the outcome of his fifteen years' social service. His another book is Parashuram charita va panchamanav Hindu samaj. He wrote Gita jatva vimarsh and Ramadasanche prapanchijnan in last phase of his life, which bears the testimony to his outstanding scholarship, philosophical bent of mind and original thinking. Bapusaheb Mate was also a creative writer and his collection of short stories, namely, Upekshitanche antarang, is rated high by Marathi critics. Anamika, Manuskicha Gahinvar, Bhavancha Pazar, Bhavanchi Mandavi are some other collections of short stories. He did not care much for the subtleties of form and technique, but his creative writing makes its impact on the reader's mind due to his tremendous and sincere sympathy for the afflicted human beings and his concern for the woes and miseries of the common man. The readers are captivated by his vigorous and spontaneous expression.

Mate's collections of literary and critical essays, namely, Sahitya dhara, Sahitya manjiri, Vichar shalaka, Vichar gumph, Vivek mandan, Sant, Pant and Tant, have established him as a great thinker in Maharashtra. In his thought-provoking long essay, namely, Pasavantichi Janmakatha, Mate points out that the distinguishing feature of the poetry is its rhythmic quality. He was elected as the President of the Maharashtra Sahitya Sammelan in 1944.

Mate is renowned for his scholarly dedication to writing, combined with a sense of social commitment.

MATHUR, GIRIJAKUMAR (Hindi; b.1919) was born at Ashok Nagar, Madhya Pradesh. He took his M.A and LL.B. degrees from Lucknow University. For a short time he practised Law. In 1943 he joined the All India Radio, but left it in 1950 to join the United Nations Organisation as Information Officer. In 1953 he returned to the All India Radio. In 1956 he went to Nepal as a member of a cultural delegation. He visited Russia and Czechoslovakia also as a member of the All India Radio delegation. Later, he shifted to Television from where he retired as Deputy Director General.

Mathur's writings are all influenced by the environment and setting he knew from his very childhood. The old historical background of Malva, the heroic past of Bundelkhand, the delicacy and elegance of Lucknow, and scientific and modern outlook of the west—all have their impact on his writings. He came into prominence as a poet with his inclusion in Tarsaptak in 1943. The Government of Czechoslovakia gave him a prize for his Prithvi kalpa (a short epic) in the year 1960. Besides poems, he has written one-act plays, criticism and operas. An experimentalist, he is a poet and writer of great sensibility and perception.

Some of his better known writings are: Manjir (Poems, 1941); Nash aur nirman (Poems, 1946); Dhup ke dhan (Poems, 1954); Jo bandh nahin saka, Janam quaid (Plays, 1957); Shila pankha chamkili (Poems, 1961) Chhaya mat chhuna man (Poems); Naya kavi (Poems); Bhitari nadi ki yatra (Poems), Radium ki chhaya (Poems); sutub ke khandahar (Poems); Sakshi rahe vartman Adhure git (Poems); Budha (Poems) Kalpantar (Poems), Nai kavita : seemayain aur sambhavnayain (criticism).

He got awards from Sahitya Kala Parishad, New Delhi, Uttar Pradesh Hindi Sansthan, Lucknow and Madhya Pradesh Sahitya Parishad, Bhopal.

At present, he is the Honarary Editor of Gagananchal, a well-known Hindi journal of I.C.C.R., New Delhi.

MATHUR, JAGDISHCHANDRA (Hindi; b.1917, d. 1981). An important dramatist and one-act playwright from Uttar Pradesh, he received his education at the University of Allahabad, and served as an ICS officer in Uttar Pradesh, Bihar, and Delhi. For a number of years, he held high positions as Director-General, All India Radio, and Hindi Adviser to the Government of India.

Mathur had a keen understanding of the theatre and its requirements. A realistic approach to life, visualisation of dramatic situations, a linguistic style conforming to characters and their milieu, and stageability form the basis of his strength as a playwright. Konark, Sharadiya, Pahla Raja and Dashrathnandan are amongst his celebrated plays.

Konark is a major Hindi play. It builds up dramatic conflict in the backdrop of oppressive feudal forces the framework of the story being the building up of the famous Sun temple. The 'Prologue' and the 'Epilogue' are on the pattern of the Greek Plays, while the dramatic devices of 'Vishkambhak' and 'Upkathan' have been borrowed from the Sanskrit tradition. The play thus tries to amalgamate the dramatic tradition of the West with the dramatic and folk traditions of the country. The interplay of situational discrepancies and inherent contradictions of life finds adequate expression in the play. Moreover, its poetic content adds to its artistic richness.

Though not very impressive in number, his one-act plays are qualitatively of a high order. He is a successful Radio playwright. His first one-act play 'Meri Bansuri' was published in 1936. His early collections of one-act plays were Bhor ka tara and Kalinga vijay. A later collection, entitled Mere shreshtha rang-ekanki, tried to piece together some of his best attempts in this genre. The prefaces to these collections represent his views on the art and craft of play-writing.

Bolte Kshana is the first collection of his creative writings. Though these pieces are spread over a period of a quarter of a century (1937-1960), there is no inconsistency in them. Then we have such reminiscences and pen-portraits as Das Tasviren, and Jinhone Jina Jana. The latter contains pen pictures of twelve characters, including litterateurs, public figures, thinkers and artists. The writer strikes here a remarkable personal note. In the portraiture of Bhikkari, Mathur is perhaps the most touching and impressive. Mathur's language has indeed a finesse that comes from meticulous care and precision in expression. Apart from plays and one-act pieces, he has written some criticism also, notably Paramparashil natya and Prachin bhasha natak Sangrah (in collaboration).

MATHURAMANGALA. (Oriya) is a poetical composition of the later part of the medieval period by Bhaktacharana Dasa (1729-1813), a devoted Vaishnavite thinker. No other Oriya poetical work of traditional mould has enjoyed so much of popularity as Mathuramangala. Its popularity rests on its thematic appeal, its rich traditional music, its simplicity of style and the poet's superb craftsmanship.

Bhaktacharana was a great believer in the Vaishnavite worship and the cult of Krishna, and therefore he chose the theme of love of Radha and Krishna. The text of

MATI KI MURTEN—MATIRA MANISHA

Mathuramangala is divided into thirty chhandas (chapters). The story of Mathuramangala is the old story of Krishna's exile in Mathura from Goppur and the destruction of Kamsa. But the chief merit of the work lies in its philosophical and spiritual implications, its real treatment of romantic passion as displayed in the laments of the cowherd women (gopis) of Goppur on the eve of the departure of Krishna., The grief of the gopis becomes more pronounced when Krishna fails to return to them. In treatment of such a commonplace and traditional subject the poet has aptly employed an ornamental style.

Mathuramangala seems to have been written under the influence of Jayadeva's Gitagovinda and other works like Rasa kallola and Bidagadha chintamani of Dinakrishna Dasa and Abhimanyu Samant Sinhar respectively.

Bhaktacharana was a Vaishnavite in the line of the Gaudiya tradition, which proclaims the supremacy of love and devotion over knowledge. Yet he was a great admirer and a staunch devotee of Lord Jagannath in the tradition of Vaishnavism as prevailing in Orissa. There are flashes of poetic descriptions of Jagannath and the holy place, Purushottam, in his Mathuramangala.

Apart from Mathuramangala, Bhaktacharana Dasa is also famous for two of his other widely popular literary works: Manbodha chautisa and Kalal kalevar chautisa, which captivated the hearts of readers for their high philosophical and spiritual message.

The popularity and the merit of Mathuramangala owe much to its melodious music, marvellous language, great craftsmanship and to the sentiments of love and pathos it contains.

MATI KI MURTEN (Hindi) is a collection of pen portraits by Ramvriksh Benipuri. Its composition began in the central Jail of Hazaribagh. As the author himself remarked, "In the loneliness of the prison-house the faces of my village-folk, including that of my grand-mother, suddenly flashed across my eyes and demanded expression with such compulsion that they got embedded in Mati ki murten (Idols of clay)." These were no fictitious characters, but actual human beings, characters in flesh and blood visualized with tremendous intensity. When published, these pen-portraits became immensely popular. Soon they were gathered together and published in a book-form in 1946. In 1953 an enlarged and revised edition appeared. Subsequent editions appeared in 1962 and 1965.

In this collection we have pen-portraits of common men with the odour of the earth. The names of these people are not found in the pages of recorded history, not are they supernatural characters on any count. They hate and love, and do not shy away from things the world considers amoral. Still they have a heart that throbs and makes them human. They are not gods, yet they know how to die for a cause.

The characters, which the writer has taken from his own surroundings, have been nourished by him with his own heart-beat. He claims that true art lies not in concealing life but in laying it bare.

Amongst these characters, there is one Budhiya whose youth once made many men go crazy. Now a mother of four children, her beauty and youth have shrunk but the writer has the ability to see her through her shrivelled form:

"Yes, the rain has gone, the flood is over. Now the river is in its usual form. Flows quietly. No flood, no outcry. No trace of mud or weeds. Quiet, lovely Ganga. Before me is the great motherhood, revered and venerable".

Such a perception is a true perception. The portrait comes live in a language full of the glow and warmth of life. The book, as one reads it, enlarges our sense of being, and shows the potentiality of creative prose which can communicate the ordinariness of life with such feeling and power.

MATI MATA (Oriya), novel by Gopinath Mohanty, received the Jnanpith Award for the year 1973. It is an epic in prose dealing with the life in the obscure villages in Orissa. It is profoundly optimistic and proclaims a march forward to a bright destination ignoring all that are base and vile in life. It describes the physical and spiritual transformation of two villages, Phulashara and Pateli, through the efforts of the villagers who display a rare community spirit. Rabi, a graduate, resists the temptation of a secure Government job and returns to his village to dedicate himself to the task of social reconstruction. What at first seemed a lone struggle in a hostile land becomes a people's movement when others in the village join him. It is a crusade against all forms of exploitation, segregation and casteism. The villagers undertake collective farming, employ advanced methods of agriculture and in all this men and women work together in perfect comradeship. The subtle romantic attachment between Rabi and Chabi adds a kind of emotional poignancy to the plot. The language is as simple and unpretentious as the rural scenerio.

MATIRA MANISHA (Oriya) is an outstanding novel by Kalindicharan Panigrahi. Published in 1930, when the whole of India was swept over by rebellion against the British, its appearance was at once a great literary, social and political event. The story is about a humble and traditional peasant family who lived in the village Padhanapara on the bank of the river Birupa in the district of Cuttack. Shyam Padhan's small family consisted of his wife, his two sons, Biraju and Chakkadi, and their wives.

MATIRAM-MATIYANI, SHAILESH

Shyam Padhan was a simple, God-fearing man, esteemed by all in the village for his uprightness and tolerance. The novel emphasises this aspect of Shyam Padhan's character and when he dies he tells his grandchildren that he is leaving behind to them as legacy, not wealth but his faith in God and his righteousness.

Baraju had four children but Chakkadi was childless. Baraju had all the virtues of his father and he succeeded to his father's place as the most respected man in the village. This small village had such God-fearing men as Baraju but also the wicked people like Hari Misra, the village tout. Hari Misra was a malicious man who envied Baraju and resolved to destroy him.

Baraju had married off his first daughter and was now preparing for the marriage of the second daughter. Chakkadi opened a shop and Misra helped him with funds. His wife, Natramani, hated her sister-in-law. Hari Misra decided to use her as a tool. Natramani, instigated by Hari Misra tried to persuade her husband to ask his brother for the separation of the hearth and the division of the property. Chakkadi, who loved his brother and his brother's children would not listen to her. But Natramani persisted. Chakkadi suffered intense mental agony.

Meanwhile, Baraju's wife would not take things lying down. She would counter the insinuations of her sister-in-law with equally sharp words. Baraju tried to persuade his wife to be more tolerant but failed. He then gave up taking food. This affected a change in his wife who realized that to remain passive like her husband was the best course.

Things came to a head when at the time of the harvest, urged on by his wife and Hari Misra, Chakkadi instructed the servant to divide up the molasses into two halves for the two brothers. When Baraju came to know of it, he instructed the servant not to divide the molasses but to take it all to Chakkadi. He then called his brother and said, "There is no need to partition the house. Everything is yours. I claim nothing. I will leave the house with my children and I will not take anything with me." It was an extremely hard decision but Baraju was firm in his resolve. He left the house.

Chakkadi, who had at heart always loved and respected his brother, was torn in agony. Finally, unable to bear the suffering, he set out in search of his brother. He found him in a friend's house. "Boy, why have you come and where are you going to?" asked Baraju. In tears Chakkadi said, "I am going wherever you are going to."

This is a poignant tale of the rural folks. The last part of the story is influenced by Gandhi's principle of satyagraha and passive resistance. The novelist handles his plot with great skill and his portrayal of characters testifies to his deep understanding of human situation and his profound sympathy. The language is colloquial and intimately rural.

MATIRAM (Hindi; b.1617, d.1716), the younger brother of Bhushan, was the third son of Ratnakar Tripathi. He lived as the 'court poet' of Maharao Bhao Singh of Bundi, whose generosity was proverbial. Matiram lived almost like a prince at his court. He represents the Ritikal school, predominantly concerned with the erotic sentiment. His famous work, Rasraj, deals with the two aspects of union and separation in love, and offers a lucid exposition of 'nayikabheda' i.e., classification of all kinds of heroines. Another work, Lalit lalam, is one of his best works on 'alankars' (figures of speech). This work has been dedicated to Maharao Bhao Singh. It was composed during the period 1659-1681. "The poetry of this work is so fascinating that its study of the alankars is rendered extremely pleasurable. Matiram had rare poetic gifts and if he had not been fettered by the limitations of his own times, his genius would have shown brighter skill." His other famous books are Chhandsara, a book on prosody, dedicated to Maharaj Shambhunath Solanki, Satsai, a collection of 702 couplets, comparable with those of Bihari, and Phulmanjari, written at Agra during the reign of Jahangir at his behest. The first extant copy of Phulmanjari goes back to 1793. In this book each couplet has a dual meaning. These are the four books usually ascribed to him; The others namely, Sahityasar, Lakshan shiringar, Vritta kaumudi and Alankar panchashika, were probably written by some other poet bearing the same name. Matiram is remarkable for the fusion of the two basic characteristics of Ritikal, rhetoric and amorousness. As compared with the other poets of Ritikal, he wrote with great naturalness in chaste Brajbhasha. Mishrabandhus placed Matiram almost on the same pedestal as Dev.

MATIYANI, SHAILESH (Hindi; b. 1931), a modern fiction writer, was born in Barechhone, Almora (Uttar Pradesh). He lost his parents in early childhood. Matiyani studied at a school at Barechhone, receiving education up to high school only. Thereafter he left home, wandered here and there, came to Delhi in search of a job, then left for Bombay, and finally settled down at Allahabad. His life is a record of suffering and struggle against economic compulsions and social injustice. Ideologically non-committal, he is an idealist. In his writings he depicts the life of the poor people living in the suburbs and slums of Bombay, Delhi and Allahabad, and exposed the decadence of the semi-feudal structure of our society. His books include: Collections of short stories: Do dukhon ka ek sukh, Atit tatha anya kahaniyan, Safar par jane se pahale, Mahabhoj, Suhagini tatha anya kahaniyan, Hara huwa, Bhereyn aur gadariye, Cheel, Kohra, Meri tetis kahaniyan, Chidda pahalwanwali gali, Meri priya kahaniyan (an anthology of his select stories). Novels: Haul-dar, Chithhirasen, Borivali se boribander tak, Mukhsarover ke hans, Bhage huway log, Do bund jal, Punarjanam ke bad, Ugte suraj ki kiran, Akash kitna anant hai, Bavan nadiyon ke sagam ka sangam, Gopuli gaphuran, Muthbher. Memoirs, Essays, Articles etc.: Lekhak ki haisiyat se (Memoir). Janta aur sahitya (Essays), Lekhak aur samvedna (Article), Trijya (A miscellaneous collection of memoirs, articles and short stories).

MATKARI RATNAKAR, RAMKRISHNA-MATRICHETA

As a story-writer, he is known as one of the most authentic writers of the 'New Story (Nai kahani) Movement'. 'Cheel' is supposed to be one of his best stories which reflects the sufferings of a little boy and is reminiscent of his own boyhood. 'Pyas', 'Rahamtulla', 'Mitti' and 'Bhavishya' are among his other well-known stories. His novel Mukhsarover ke hans is based on the locale and social condition of the hilly region of Kumaon and its surrounding area. Borivali se boribander tak is a social novel based on the poor life of slum-dwellers and suburban people. Muthbher (1984) is his latest novel written in a descriptive style and deals with the exploitation of poor people. It was given 'Phanishwarnath Renu Award' in Hazaribagh (Bihar) in 1984.

Matiyani is committed in his writings to social justice and freedom of man from economic and social exploitation. He has a staunch belief in man's will which triumphs, ultimately. 'It is not circumstances but the human resolution that counts' is the message that emerges from his writings.

MATRA (Sanskrit) or mora is the shortest unit of the measure of Sanskrit vocalic sounds. The articulation of a 'matra' requires only a fraction of a second, the amount of time taken, for instance, for the wink of an eye. According to grammarians one matra constitutes a short vowel (hrasva svara), two constitute a long vowel (dirgha svara) and three constitute a 'phuta' vowel. In the works on prosody the vowels are classified as light (laghu) and heavy (guru) ones. According to this classification, a short (hrasva) vowel is light (laghu) and a long one is heavy (guru). But, even a short vowel when followed by an 'anusvara', a 'visarga' or a conjunct consonant is heavy (guru). A light vowel comprises one matra whereas a heavy vowel comprises two.

In Sanskrit prosody the metres are classified into two types, viz., 'vritta's and 'jati's. The latter is determined by the total number of matras in each line (one of the four quarters i.e. 'pada's) of a verse. For instance, the 'Arya' jati has twelve matras each in the first and third lines, eighteen in the second and fifteen in the fourth. Here is an example:

dvipadanyasmadapi	(=12)
madhyadapi jalanidhirdisho'
Pyantat	/(=18)
aniya jhatiti ghatayati	(=12)

MATRICHETA (Sanskrit; b. 1 century A.D) was a Sanskrit poet called in Japanese Mashiriseita and translated into Tibetan as 'Ma-khol' (Ma-Matr; khol-cheta). This poet is also referred to as 'Matrchina' and 'Matichitra' having the appellations 'acharya' and 'stha-vira', and is identified confusedly with Asvaghosha and Arya-sura. Matricheta is a Buddhist literary celebrity of Kusumapura (or Rajagriha). Originally an ascetic teacher of Brahminism and a devotee of Maheshvara, and later a convert to Buddhism, Matricheta is said to have been contemporaneous with Nagarjuna and Aryadeva.

Matricheta tells us that he composed some Brahmanistic hymns prior to his conversion. Taranatha informs us that Matricheta composed 101 Buddhist hymns of which the 'shatapanchasatka-stotra' is the finest. The 'Shatapanchasatka-stotra', also known as 'Sardha-shataka', 'Adhyar(d)ha-shataka', 'Prasada-pratibha' and 'Prasada-pratibhodbhava', and wrongly shown as 'Shatapanchasatika-stotra', is a hymn in praise of the Buddha in 150 verses divided topic-wise into 13 sections like Rupa-stava, Karuna-stava, Shasana-stava, etc. The Sanskrit text of this hymn along with its Tibetan translation by the Indian upadhyaya Sri-Sraddhakara-Varman, Chinese translation by I-tsin, and the Tibetan translation by the same Sri-Sraddhakara-Varman and an English translation edited critically by D.R.S. Bailey (Cambridge, 1951) are now available.

Matricheta's 'Varnarha-varna-stotra', also called the 'Chatuh-shataka', is another hymn in 400 verses in praise of the Buddha (ed. D.R.S. Bailey, 1950). Some fragments of this hymn had also been found in eastern Turkestan and edited long ago by A.F.R. Hoernle (1916).

Some fragments of two concluding verses in Sardula-vikridita metre and the colophon to a hitherto unidentified Buddhist hymn of Matricheta in 26 verses have also been unearthed in course of the Royal Prussian Turfan expeditions in Chinese Turkestan and edited by D. Schlingloff.

Matricheta's Maha-raja-Kani (s) ka-lekha, which is available in its Tibetan translation (ed. with an English retranslation by F.W. Thomas, 1903) is a literary epistle in 85 verses addressed to King Kani(s)ka of the Kusa (-Kusana) race. From this epistle we learn that the monarch invited the hymnist monk to come to his court but the latter excused himself with the plea of old age and sickness, and gave the young king advice how to rule.

Besides, the Tibetan translations of Matricheta's remaining ten works, viz i) Tri-ratna-mangala-stotra, ii) Samyak-sambuddha-laksana-stotra, iii) Ekottarika-stava, iv) Sugata-pancha-trimsat-stotra, v) Tri-rathna-stotra, vi) Arya-Tara-devi-stotra-sarvartha-siddhi-stotra-raja, vii) Matrceta-giti, viii) Arya-tara-stotra, xi) Chatur-viparyayakatha and x) Kali-yuga-parikatha, have been printed in different editions.

In his devotional poems Matricheta extols the paramitas (excellences) and qualities of the Buddha in a non-technical, simple and popular style befitting a preacher poet of the transitional period between the late Hinayana and the early Mahayana schools of Buddhism about the beginning of Christian era. The angibhuta rasa, predominant sentiment, is shanta (quietist) which is characterized by the gunas (poetic qualities), madhurya (sweetness) and prasada (perspicuity).

Matricheta's saushabdyā (purity of the wording in classical Sanskrit) has been praised highly by I-tsin who adds that the extremely popular 'Shatapanchasatka-stotra' and the 'Varnarha-varna-stotra' had once been recited in India by the Buddhists, both the Hinayanist and the Mahayanist. Tarana also speaks highly of Matricheta's style.

Some citations from Matricheta's 'Satapanchasatka-stotra' and 'Varnarha-varna stotra' are found in the later literature.

B.B.

MATRIGUPTA (Sanskrit) is an early writer of Sanskrit literature, probably belonging to the beginning of the Christian era or even earlier. In chapter III of his Rajatarangini Kalhana takes great care to give a long account of the creative artist Matrigupta, and his relations with king Vikramaditya Harshavardhana of Kashmir.

It is said that Matrigupta was associated with the royal court of Harshavardhana, who held the title of 'Vikramaditya' as well. Matrigupta is supposed to have been a shy and conservative poet, who is unable to make a parade of his literary craftsmanship in public, and therefore fails to bask in the sunshine of imperial favour. The royal patron knows the rich poetic talents of his court-poet, but does not care to extend basic amenities to him as a result of which he is constrained to pass his time in absolute poverty, without food and clothing, sleep and peace. The poet, however, continues to serve his master with profound sense of attachment and commendable loyalty. As time passes on, a stormy night comes: a strong wind puts off the lamp burning in the inner apartment of the king, and the monarch gets nervous. He asks his guards to light the lamp, but there is no response from guards who are fast asleep. When the alarmed king shouts at the top of his voice, Matrigupta, engaged in his literary pursuits at the dead of night, hears the king's alarm and coming to the chamber lights the lamp. The royal patron feels safe and secure. As the poet returns, the patron wants to know his position and asks as to why of all persons he was awake. The anguish of the poet takes beautiful expression immediately in the following verse which means: 'Tormented by cold, I have drowned myself in the ocean of thoughts like a small quantity of vegetables; basking in the fire of quietude, my lips have become dry; voice has become feeble due to long fast. Sleep has disappeared leaving me alone like an insulted fiancé. Alas! Like earth donated to a proper recipient, the night is not waning.'

(Shitenodghrisitasya mashashimivachchintarnave majjatah Shantagnim sphutitadharasya dhamatah kshutkshama-kantasya me/Nidra kvapyamaniteva daiyita santajya duram gata Satpatrapratipaditeva basudha na kshiyate sarvari//)

Vikramaditya realises the great wrong done to Matrigupta: he becomes repentant and decides to do something for the talented poet.

That time Kashmir had no ruler, and the responsibility of finding out a ruler was vested in Vikramaditya. The king takes a decision to instal Matrigupta on the throne of Kashmir, draws a royal proclamation to this effect and orders the poet to carry the proclamation to Kashmir and hand it over to the ministers, without telling him anything about the contents. Matrigupta carries the royal message to Kashmir and as soon as the ministers get it, they coronate him as the king of the state.

A commentary on Natyashastra is ascribed to Matrigupta. This is evident from a reference by Sundar-amishra's Natyapradipa on Nandi. The reference says that in explaining the definition of Nandi as cited by Bharata, Matrigupta has quoted a verse containing sixteen padas. Matrigupta appears to have combined in him the qualities of a literary artist and a critic. It is because of this that his opinions on dramaturgy, poetics and music have been quoted profusely by Abhinavagupta, Kuntaka and Sharadatanaya, and in literary creations by Kshemendra. One such verse, reported to have emanated from the pen of Matrigupta denies the existence of the shining orb of the moon and establishes the identity of the white massive reputation of the royal patron creating thus a splendid illustration of the poetic figure of 'denial' (Apahnuti). The verse meaning "this is not the moon as soft as the cheeks of the parrot—neither the lotus placed on the face of the lovely night like a swan: but this is veritably the massive fame of the king, as white as the foams of the ocean of milk," runs as follows:

Nayanā nishamukhasaroruharoyahamsah
Kirikapotalakantatanuh shashan kah/
Abhati natha tadidam divi dugdhasindhu-dindirapindaparipandu yashastadiyam//
(Quoted in Auchityavichararcha.)

MATRIKA (Rajasthani) means "pertaining to the Matras." Each of the vowels and consonants of the Devanagari script carries matras, twelve in all. Each such alphabet carrying the prescribed matra appears at the beginning of a line in the poetic composition of 'matrika' genre. Some of the mixed alphabet like ksha, tra and jna are seldom found included in the scheme. The genre is also called 'ekakshari namamala' when used in the field of lexicography. It has two forms when used as a lexicon. The one contains only the alphabet devoid of all matras, while the other one contains all matras for every alphabet. It is this latter variety which is known as matrika. It has been seen on a close observation that there are no synonyms of a given word, as is expected in a lexicon. Instead, it is an independent composition generally of devotional nature. We have ekakashari namamala by Virbhan Ratna and Udayarama of both these kinds respectively (published as Poets of Dingala kosha from Jodhpur in 1978). Apart from the limitation of beginning each stanza with a definite alphabet carrying a specific matra, it has nothing to contribute as a literary genre. It has been much favoured by saint poets and was much popular in the medieval age. It is also called 'Bawani' and 'Kakka'.

Raw.S.

MATTAVILASA (Sanskrit) is an ancient humorous play of the 'prahasana' type. Its author King Mahendravarman was the son of the famous Pallava King Simhavishnuvarman of Kanchi (580-630 A.D.). The Mat- tavilasa, together with another farce called Bhagavadaj-jukiya ('On the saint and the prostitute') ascribed to Bodhayana by a commentator, is referred to in the Mamandur inscription dated 610 A.D. Both these plays have been very popular on the kutiyattam stage in Kerala. After the Prologue, the play begins with Satyasoma, a Shaiva mendicant of the Kapalika sect (who carries a human skull as begging bowl), together with his wife Devasoma, both fully drunk. He praises Shiva who has ordained his devotees to drink liquor, enjoy the company of women and wear natural and charming dress. Devasoma criticises the Buddhist view. When he is offered liquor, he notices that his begging bowl is missing. They go out in search of the skull-bowl. A Buddhist mendicant Nagasena comes, holding his own bowl tucked under his armpit and covered with his upper garment. They suspect him as the thief and challenge him; their suspicion increases when he begins to run away from the drunkards. They want to have another drink, since it will take some time to settle the dispute. The Buddhist is interested, but the rules of his order prevent him from enjoying a drink. Another monk of the Shaiva sect, a Pashupata, more sober than the others, comes on the scene, and is approached by the parties for arbitration. He suggests that they should go to a court of law. Meanwhile a lunatic appears with the lost skull in his hand, which he obtained from a stray dog. 'The story thus ends happily'.

The characters are vigorously drawn, especially the tipsy Kapalin with his unfailing flow of logic and theology and the Buddhist monk with his leanings towards wine and beauty, and his desire to find scriptural warrant for them, while the damsel's shrewish femininity is cleverly sketched, and the poor lunatic babbles and acts with a consequent inconsequence that reminds the reader of Lewis Carroll's work.

The Kapalin and the Pashupata speak Sanskrit, while the Buddhist and Devasoma speak Shaursepi Prakrit. The lunatic uses Magadhi. Nine different metres are used, including Ruchira and Malini.

MATTI MANISHI (Telugu) is a novel written by Vasireddi Sitadevi. In her novels, she makes a deep and precise analysis of her characters and presents before the reader her own views on life.

Since Independence, life in the Telugu land has had a new turn. Many a rural family began to like pleasure seeking urban life and was ultimately ruined. The devastating influence of cinema theatres, nursing homes and other like institutions on Telugu social life is vividly portrayed in this novel.

MATTU, VALIULLAH-MALARUM MALAIYUM

A certain agricultural labourer, Uraboyina Venkaiah, on account of straightened circumstances, migrates from the north to a certain village in coastal Andhra. As a farm labourer and tenant, he earns five acres of land, which passes on to his son after him. The son Sambaiah, the hero of this novel—continues to till his land; he considerably improves upon his patrimony. After giving him a son (Venkatapati) his wife passes away. Sambaiah does not think of a second marriage lest his property should get dissipated by partitioning. At the instigation of Kana-kaiah, a local impostor, Sambaiah buys eighty acres of dry land, which just three years later is converted into wet land. Being found unfit for education, Venkatapati is put to cultivation. At 25, he marries Varudhini, daughter of Balaramaiah, a resident of the same village who is not doing so well now as in his earlier years.

Venkatapati and Varudhini set up their family in the town. At the instance of Varudhini, his daughter-in-law, Sambaiah disposes of his entire landed property. And the amount is used for the construction of a cinema theatre—all with the collaboration of a swindler, by name Ramadhababu. Before long, Ramanadhababu's wife claims the ownership of the theatre as the property deeds are in her name. The court decrees in her favour. Thus defrauded, Varudhini drinks excessively and ends her life.

Forced thus into a destitute condition Venkatapati and his son Ravi return to the village. Sambaiah strains every nerve of his to rehabilitate the family. But the local villain Kanakayya creates all sorts of obstacles in his way. Finally Mattimanishi sinks never to rise again. His incompetent son and pleasure-seeking daughter-in-law, Varudhini, are responsible for his ruin.

Sitadevi's narration has a quality of its own. Her characterisation is no less powerful. Sambaiah, Varudhini and Kanakaiah are the leading characters. They represent three distinct types of psychology. Though having unflinching faith in land, Sambaiah is deprived of it. He is a farmer first and last. "This soil is my slate and my plough is the pencil", proclaims Sambaiah. "I have practised scribbling on the land. Mother earth has taught me letter by letter. My mother, my guru and my God—the Earth is all in all for me." Sambaiah reminisces emotionally. "With the touch of my happy tears, the earth is blushed, not otherwise. The earth, the sky and the air are the property of one who sweats here and of none else!" This, in short, is the message of the novelist.

Observations of Ramadas as expressed before Varudhini, bring out into bold relief the theme of the novel. "Oh Varudhini," he comments, "Can't you see the different ugly faces of this town life? Dandies in cinema theatres, dandies in offices and in flats gathering with the sole purpose of casting glances at the ladies! And again don't you see the strange exodus from our villages? Many well-to-do village families migrate to towns under the pretext of treatment for chronic ailments or for schooling their children in the town. They are ensnared by schemers and rogues and finally find themselves duped beyond redemption!" Ramadas continues: "And how about doctors! Most of them amass thousands at the expense of their gullible patients—Look at this hideous development. For every four nursing homes two theatres are springing up!" Thus the novel exposes the morbid development of towns and the ruination of the villages—particularly in the coastal districts of the Telugu country.

MATTU, VALIULLAH (Kashmiri; approx. d. 1858) was born in Vahangam. The year of his birth is not known.

Matu was the first poet to choose his native language, Kashmiri, for narration in verse the well-known tale of Himal and Nagrai. He also rendered into Kashmiri verse two Persian works of religious nature Chihal Israr and Zaruriyati Din. He also composed some devotional verses.

Descendant of a family of religious instructors, he taught pupils in his own village. He was of a religious bent of mind and passed away at Medina.

Himal, first published by Ghulam Muhammad Nur Muhammad in 1938, is a romantic tale. In spite of his efforts to harmonise romance with sufi-mysticism, the poet narrates the facts naked and in bold language in his poems. Indicating a puritan mystic strain, he introduces a Muslim 'fakir'. This creates some confusion and is at variance with the oral tradition, as the events are attributed to the pre-Christian age.

Mattu occasionally comes forward with moral sermons while comparing a good wife with a bad one. His language is by and large simple, though it has a fair sprinkling of Persian words. Examples of a whole verse in Persian nailed down to a single Kashmiri word are not hard to find.

MALARUM MALAIYUM (Tamil); Desika Vinayagam Pillai (1876-1954), popularly known as 'Kavimani', is the author of Malarum malaiyum, a collection of Tamil poems. This book was first published by S. Vaiyapuri Pillai, a renowned critic, with the help of M. Arunachalam in the year 1938. Originally it was a small volume, but when the fifth edition was published in the year 1954, the collection had as many as 1330 verses.

Kavimani was a poet of compassion and tenderness. He was sympathetic towards the weaker sections of society. He was a lover of Nature and liked the company of children. His affection towards the children and his contribution to the children's literature made him the first children's poet in Tamil.

In Malarum malaiyum there are poems on various subjects. They are divided into fifteen sections, viz: Bhakti manjari (Devotional songs), Ilakkiyam (Literature), Varalarruk kavitai (Historical poems), Malalai Moli (Children's Poems), Iyarkai Inpam (On Nature), Katci Inpam (scenery), Kataippatal (Narrative Poems), Ullamum unarvum (Soul and emotion), Vaiyamum valvum (World and life), Camukam (On Society), Teciyam (On Nationalism), Valttu (Appreciative poems), Charama kavi (Elegiac Poems), Katampam (Miscellaneous) and Muttukkuvaiyal (Heap of Pearls). In all, there are 201 topics dealt with under these 15 sections.

Kavimani was a believer in God and sang many devotional songs. They include those on Sarasvati, Lakshmi, Bhagavati, Muruga and Alakammai of Terur, his native place. Incidentally his first publication Alakammai achiriyai viruttam itself is a book of devotional poetry. Here is a song of Kavimani on Muruga:

"The grass is for the cow;
The herb is for medicine;
The stone is for building temple;
O, Lord Muruga of sentil!
What for I am in the world,
This poor, humble person!"

The poet was a lover of books and he wrote many poems on the richness of Tamil literature and the beauty of Tamil language. Tiruvalluvar, Kamban and Bharati are his favourite poets and he has composed songs on their works.

The life of Mira (1601-1667) attracted him and that resulted in a poem of 34 verses viz. Anpin verri (The triumph of Love). Mira, like Antal, wanted to marry Lord Kannan and hence always worshipped him. She had an idol of Giridhara Gopala which was presented to her by her guru, Ravidas. Bhojaraja, the son of Mewar Maharana, loved her and got her in marriage. But even after coming to her husband's house, Mira worshipped Kannan and her mother-in-law hated her. Mira was always immersed in devotion. Not able to draw Mira towards him, Bhojaraja sent her out of the country. She wandered through the forest. One day Kannan appeared in front of her and reminded her of Bhojaraja. She rejoined her husband and lived with him for ten years. When he died in a battle, his brother tried to kill Mira but in vain. Mira prayed to the Lord to accept her. The idol split into two and accepted her. Kavimani sang the important aspects of Mira's life in beautiful verses in this poem Anpin verri.

Kavimani had his own views on poetry. While writing on the poems of Subramania Bharati, Kavimani says:

"Is it possible for me to say the beauties of the poem!
Can the jar measure the sweetness of the cow's milk?"

Kavimani has translated many poems from English which have been included in this volume. Of them special mention has to be made of William Blake's Tiger, Tiger which was translated under the title Pulikkutu (The cage of a tiger); Aru (River by Goodrich), Kulantai ('Child' by Macdonald) and Malaiyum anilum ('Mountain and the Squirrel' by Emerson) are some of his translations. It is to be remembered that his Achiya Chjyoti (translated from the Light of Asia of Edwin Arnold) and Omar Khayyam Patalkal (translated from Edward Fitzgerald's The Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam) are excellent works. They have given him a prominent place among translators in Tamil.

Again and again his choice of themes and images reminds us of Wordsworth in his Lyrical Ballads, while his exploitation of popular tunes is often as happy as that of Burns. His preference is for low life, for simple tunes, for thoughts not bowed to cunning, for common images and the language of ordinary speech, and his delicate blending of humour and melancholy, conspire to give his poems the appearance of perfect translation from the quintessential English poetry of our imagination. "They strike our finer senses as a sort of attar of English poetry," says K. Swaminathan in his comments on Malarum malaiyum.

The song on the 'Moon' is a beautiful piece. The moon is compared to a silver boat in the midst of the groups of stars, a fading lotus flower, a very small bow, a golden vessel, a ball of butter formed on the Ocean of Milk, a fruit from the Tree of Gold and a dice played by the Goddess Earth.

The autobiography of the Grass is another excellent poem in this collection. This poem in seventy lines depicts the sufferings, patience, growth and the good deeds of the grass. It is tolerant, sympathetic, hardworking, helpful and also a symbol of perseverance.

In the section of 'Society', there are verses on 'The rights of women', 'Health', 'Unity', 'Harijans', 'Untouchables', 'Prohibition', 'The evils of war', 'Unemployment', etc.

Kavimani wanted the people of all religious and castes united in one fold. The poet aspires for a free life in the world as the birds who roam about freely in the sky.

The hallmarks of the poems of Kavimani in this volume of 300 pages, are simplicity of style, straight forwardness of content and sincerity of purpose. The selection of the right words, the judicious use of diction, the blending of rhyme and rhythm, the choice of the content, the ideals which are propounded, the emotions revealed in the poems—all make the volume Malarum malaiyum important in modern Tamil literature.

MAULUDU (Sindhi) is a form of devotional folk-poetry in Sindhi. The Sindhi word 'mauludu' (pl. mauluda) has been borrowed from Arabic 'maulud' which literary means 'the born one' or a newly born babe. In Sindhi folk-poetry, the word refers to the devotional songs sung in the honour of Muhammad, the Prophet, praising particularly the greatness of his birth.

According to the devout poets, with the coming of the Prophet began a new era of hope and happiness for humanity. In due course of time, the subject matter of mauluda acquired width to include other aspect of the Prophet's life and his mission in this world. His journeys, his marriage with lady Khadijah, the Miraj, the Hijra, the importance of his mission and his message to the humanity, the beauty of his person and character, his nearness to God, his virtuous companions and their association with him, etc. became popular topics for the mauluda songs. The other main topics treated were the poet's love and affection for the Prophet, a yearning to perform Hajj and visit Medina, and supplications to the Prophet for his blessings.

As regards the form, most of the mauluda compositions have the same form as that of 'wai' or 'kafi'. However, there are a few mauluda composed in Persian metres, though such compositions possess the necessary characteristics of a song, such as rhythm, melodious arrangement of sounds, burden, etc., required for singing.

The history of mauluda compositions in Sindhi is traced back to the 13th century. According to the available historical references, it was the period when devout singers of Sindh began to sing Sindhi devotional songs in the assemblies of sufi saints of Sindh and Multan. It is possible that some of these songs were in mauluda compositions. Unfortunately no written record of these mauluda has survived. According to the written evidence which has come to light so far, Shah I'nat Rizvi (d. 1725) is the first mystic poet who has used the term 'mauludu' for his one song, praising the glory of Muhammad and supplicating him for help: "Chao shalvata sidiqa sein iu mauludu mudama". (say always this mauludu, a prayer with faith).

As the mauludu composed by Shah I'nat has got highly developed form, it is probable that the beginning of these songs had taken place earlier. The mauluda were composed by many younger contemporaries of Shah I'nat Rizvi, such as Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752), Makhdum Abdul Rauf Bhatti (1683-1753) and Makhdum Ghulam Muhammad Bugai (alive in 1735). In due course of time, this form became more and more popular. A good number of poets are still contributing to this generic variety of Sindhi poetry.

Mauluda are sung on special occasions of religious significance, without the accompaniment of any musical instruments. In fact, the rhythmic recitation with melodious repetition of the burden is a basic technique of maulude singing. In Sindhi, a phrase 'mauludu parhanu' (to recite a mauludu) is in vogue instead of a phrase 'mauludu g'ainu, (to sing a mauludu). There are many techniques for reciting a mauludu. It is recited by a single person or in chorus. When it is recited in chorus, there may be one group or two groups reciting according to a set procedure. The chorus recitation generally accompanies dancing in which the reciters, while dancing, move in a circle. This particular dance is named 'Samah' (Arabic 'Sima'), meaning the sittings of the sufi dervishes in which devotional songs are sung. Through the vigorous singing sessions, the dervishes may fall into a trance and start dancing. There are many professional groups in different parts of Sindh who have preserved the tradition of mauludu recitation and have acquired proficiency in its artistic presentation. Among the mauludu composers of Sindh, Makhdum Abdul Rauf Bhatti is well-known. He is the first Sindhi poet who composed a large number of mauludu poems. Under the project of Sindhi Folklore and Literature, a collection of mauluda songs has been compiled with critical introduction by N.A. Baloch. It is the fourth book in the series and contains mauluda of 174 poets in their chronological order. About eight hundred mauluda are given in the book which have been collected from oral tradition, manuscripts and published works.

The compilation contains seventyseven mauluda of Abdul Rauf Bhatti, the largest number of these poems composed by a single poet.

MAULVI SIDIQULLAH (Kashmiri; b. 1832, d. 1900) was born in a Maulvi family. He went to a local school where he studied Persian and Arabic. He continued to study Persian and Arabic literature and came under the influence of the devotional poets of the two languages. His early lyrics are full of rapture and fervent religious adoration. He looked nostalgically to the early periods of Islamic culture for purity and meaning of life. He was a true lover of Muhammad and in him he found the 'Mard-i-kamil', the perfect man. He devoted his whole life to the singing of the glory of Muhammad, the beauty of his soul and body, and tried to produce his image of the modern world which he felt was promiscuous, aberrant and devoid of all spiritual values. His Maghazi-ul-Nabi

MAUZO, DAMODAR YASHAVANT (Konkani; b. 1944), is a fictioneer. He was born at the village Majorda and went through his schooling in Goa. He graduated in Commerce from the University of Bombay and returned to Goa and engaged himself in the family business. He started his literary activity at the age of 21, and was quick in compiling and publishing his short stories under the title Ganthan (A garland of fish, 1972). He continued to write to bring out the second collection of short stories under the title Zagranam (Sleepless nights, 1975). Living in a village where majority of the population belongs to the Catholic religion, Mauzo has availed of the opportunity of his contacts with the Catholic community to depict local themes and characters in his writings.

Mauzo is known for his simple style and undiluted narration which at times make his stories lengthy, but nevertheless, interesting. His stories are essentially narratives of a well-knit plot or peculiarities of characters around whom the theme is developed. Critics sometimes feel that his lengthy narrations of facts do not quite fit in the technique of a short story.

Not many short stories in Konkani are written on the semi-urbanised villages inhabited by the Catholic population, who are engaged in such diverse occupations as those of sailors, musicians, artisans, etc., and many of whom work in distant lands, leaving behind their families. This gave a new dimension to his writings which were new not only to Konkani but even to the regions around Konkana.

His novelette Sud (Revenge, 1975) was also well-received. Ek ashilo babulo (There was a boy, 1976) and Kani eka khomaschi (Story of a shirt, 1977) are his contributions to children's literature.

Damodar Mauzo has tried his hand at writing a full length play, Nilem nilem savanem (A blue bird), which is yet to be published. Some of his stories have been translated into English, Marathi, and Gujarati. His work, Karmelin (1982) which won him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1983, is considered to be an outstanding contribution to the Konkani literature for its sympathetic handling of emotional conflicts and understanding of human nature, gripping narrative and powerful language.

MAXMULLER, FRIEDRICH (Sanskrit; b. 1823, d. 1900), the great linguist and scholar, was born at Dessau (Germany). His father, Wilhelm Müller was distinguished not only as a scholar, but also as one of the first German lyric poets and was Librarian of the Ducal Library; but he died when Max Müller was young.

Max Muller received the elements of his education at Dessau, and then went to Leipzig, where he studied Greek and Latin under Hermann and Haupt; he took his Doctorate degree at the early age of twenty in 1843.

Max Muller began the study of Sanskrit under Professor H. Brockhaus and he soon chose it as his special pursuit. The first fruits of his labours appeared in a translation of the Hitopadesha published at Leipzig in 1844.

In 1844, Max Müller went to Berlin to study under Bopp and Schelling and to consult Sanskrit manuscripts available there. He repaired to Paris in 1845 where he began, under the inspiration Eugene Burnouf of the College de France, the study of the Rigveda, with a view to eventually publishing that important text in the light of the commentary thereon by Sayana of the 14th century. It was then that he met scholar-mates like Roth and Whitney, each of whom rose to become a founder of Vedic research, each in his own way.

With a view to realising his ambition of editing the Rigveda text and commentary, Max Müller went to England in June 1846 to collate the Veda Manuscripts deposited in the East India House and the Bodleian Library, Oxford. The East India Company commissioned him to edit the Rigveda at their expense in 1847; and this Herculean task he completed in six giant volumes during 1849-1874 (New edition, 1980)

In 1850, Max Müller was appointed deputy Taylorian Professor of Modern Languages at Oxford; in 1854 he succeeded to that professorship. In 1858 he was elected a Fellow of All Souls; and in 1866 was made professor of Comparative Philology.

An elegant translation of Kalidasa's Meghaduta into German was published by Max Müller in 1847. Other publications that followed were: The Languages of the Seat of War in the East (1854); Comparative Mythology (1856); History of Ancient Sanskrit Literature (1859); Lectures on the Science of Language (1861-63) and Introduction to the Science of Religion (1873).

Other works of a miscellaneous nature from the pen of Max Muller are: Chips from a German Workshop (4 vols. 1868-75); The Hibbert Lectures on the Origin and Growth of Religion (1878); Selected Essays (1881); Biographical Essays (1883); Natural Physical, Anthropological and Psychical Religion (Glasgow, Gifford Lectures, 1888-92) and Science of Mythology (2 vols, 1897).

A novel written by Max Müller in German, Deutsche Liebe (1857) went through many editions. Between 1876 and 1900 he edited the impressive and important series of The Sacred Books of the East in fiftyone volumes. Auld Lang Syne (1898-99) and My Autobiography (1901) are his autobiographical fragments. His widow edited his Life and Letters (2 vols, 1902). Before Max Müller passed away in 1900 at Oxford, he was crowned with all honours and awards that any scholar could have aspired to have. He received honorary doctorates from scores of Universities and was looked up to with the highest regard by every Indological scholar in the world. Even a person like Swami Vivekananda who visited him at his Oxford residence could not but be full of the highest praise for his indefatigable industry and massive scholarship.

Max Müller took the challenges boldly and threw himself heart and soul into his work with full assistance of his English wife. He eagerly wanted to visit India, but could not do so. Royal invitations from India extended to him were many; in fact the Indians loved to remember him as 'Moksha-mula Bhattacharya', a Sanskritized form of his name superscribed by him in his editio princeps of the Rigveda text volumes. Max Müller was commissioned to deliver a course of lectures to all prospective administrators of India taking up the I.C.S. examination. The lectures have been since published independently under the title India, What can it teach us? (1883). The surging love of Indian literature and culture, the sparkling style throughout and the warmth of feeling coupled with insight into Indian thought and religion, make these lectures eminently readable even today.

MAYA DARPAN (Hindi) is the third collection of Shrikant Verma's poems, published in 1967. It contains some sixty-nine poems, including some of his best-known pieces, such as 'Maya darpan' (Magic mirror), 'Dinar-ambh' (Day dawns), 'Bukhar mein kavita' (A poem in fever), 'Dincharya' (Routine) and 'Dupahar ka snan' (Afternoon bath).

The volume shows Shrikant Verma as a poet who ignored both the pastoral and romantic poetry of the Chhayavadi poets and the reformist idiom of the Pragativadis in order to establish that poetry could be rooted in something more empirical and much harder than mere political dogma.

The poems in this volume are haunted by a sense of doom. A poem like 'Dincharya' which describes impressionistically the dull and crushing routine of urban life in our times, or one like 'Jivan bima' (Life insurance) which digs through its staccato rhythms into the debris of a decadent society, creates a rhyme pattern as unnervingly inconsequential as the life it describes.

Man-woman relationship in poems like 'Maya darpan', 'Ek din' or 'Matsya bedh' also show the same feverish anxieties and uncertainties of life. And yet the real strength of these poems lies in their understatement. Also, there is a still, small voice whispering in the background that there might be some necessary connection somewhere that one may have missed.

What eventually comes out most poignantly in all these poems is a sensitive man's inability to be lifted by the rhythms of the middle-class life in India. The dark icy language of the poems deserves a special mention here. With the help of the religious and historical allusions, the contemporary tone of the poems acquires a larger dimension of meaning. The horror, the disgust and the pain felt by the poet, thus, result in a kind of surrealistic verse whose kaleidoscopic images mirror his own whirling emotions. Everything in these poems is personal and confessional, and yet the controlled treatment of the situation lifts the individual experience to the realm of the universal.

MAYAN BHATT OR MAYAN BAMBH (Rajasthani). Nothing definite is known about the life of Mayan Bhatt. The critics and historians of Gujarati literature have referred to his compositions as Mayana chhand or Mayana ras and have fixed his date between 1450-1500. About forty of his amorous 'Kavittas' have been traced out in various Rajasthani and Gujarati manuscripts. Two collections of his poems are available under the title of Mayana kutuhal. Muni Lavanya Samaya, a celebrated Jain saint, and Shyamal, a wellknown Gujarati poet of 18th century, were also attracted to quote his verses in their works. One Ganapati Kayastha, a Rajasthani poet of the 16th century and author of Madhavanal Kamkandala has also mentioned about Mayana Purana and ascribed it to Mayan Bhatt. It is mentioned in Ranadhawal ri vat that Ranadhawal, the king of Dharanagari, was displeased with Mayan Bhatt for his imprudence and took a vow not to see the face of any Bhatt in future. But Mayana could appease his wrath by his ready wit and capacity for quick composition. His kavittas are rich with description of the amorous feelings, physical beauty and gesture of the elegant style. On the basis of this Vat Agarchand Nahata treated him as a resident of Rajasthan.

MAZE VIDYAPEETH (Marathi.) is the second collection of poems by Narayan Survey, published in 1966. Entitled after a long poem included in the book, Maze Vidyapeeth has been translated into Hindi and English. This collection has always been regarded as a significant achievement because it uses an inornate, simple poetic idiom rooted in common speech, absorbs colloquial rhythm into poetic texture, employs a finely controlled first person narration tone and offers a rich variety of portraits related to the workers' life in the city. The title poem itself is an extended meditative soliloquy describing the poet's reaction to the squalor and sordidness of life on the pavements, his soul-searching in relation to objective social events such as war and communal riots. In this as well in many others poems, Survey employs a combination of the dramatic and the poetic to bring out the essential humanity of the working-classes trapped in the exploitative world of industrial squalor. He brings to bear upon this life of the exploited class a poetic sensibility which assimilates Marxism without falling into rigid, dogmatic patterns. Poems in Maze Vidyapeeth are characterized by a sense of social reality which is deeply meditative. They also show a sense of hope which is not facile but is firmly rooted in Survey's faith in the tremendous potential of the common man to find for himself, through action, an authentic place in history.

MAZHAMANGALAM NAMBUTHIRI (Malayalam b. 1525, d. 1595). There were three poets of merit, Sankaran, Narayanan and Parameswaran belonging to the family of Mazhamangalam in Trichur. Of them Narayanan the son of Sankaran, was the most famous, and he later came to be known in the literary field as Mazhamangalam. At the end of his renowned Sanskrit work Mazhamangalam bhanam, the poet refers to the king Raja Raja. This is the famous Veera Kerala Verma Raja who ruled Cochin from 1537 to 1565. Rajaratnavaliyam champu of Mazhamangalam was written in praise of the King Rama Varma Raja who reigned in Cochin from 1565 to 1601. It is from these evidences that the period of the poet is deduced.

Mazhamangalam was a profound Sanskrit scholar. He had deep knowledge in Astronomy also which he learnt from his father. He was endowed with rich poetic talent. Though he was born in a family without any Vedic background, he studied the three Vedas and six shastras and acquired mastery over them. His Smartta prayashchitta vimashini (Ethical expiation—a critique) bears ample evidence of this. This is a great work divided into five parts dealing with the provisions for expiation required in the 'yajanas'. There is no other work on the subject in Kerala to equal its authenticity. Kodungalloor Bhattan Godavarman Thampuram has brought out an annotated edition of this. There was not a single consolidated and comprehensive book in Kerala on the basic laws for handling civil and criminal cases and it was under these circumstances that Mazhamangalam wrote Vyavaharamala (Series of cases), urged, perhaps, by one of his patrons, the King of Cochin. The poet has moulded his work after the two ancient Sanskrit works on the subject, Parasaramadhaveeyam and Vyavahara nirnayam. The book is divided into nineteen sections. It deals thoroughly with all sorts of possible cases. All the Sanskrit masters on the subject available then also have been referred to by the poet. Vyavaharamala has been translated into Malayalam both in poetry and prose. Since it was written, this book had been an authentic law book in Kerala for centuries. Mazhamangalam bhanam is yet another of his great Sanskrit works. As was the usual practice, Mazhamangalam did not give any particular title to his early works, but it is considered to be second to none in the particular genre.

Rasakrida kavyam and Uttara Ramayana champu are his two other Sanskrit works. His Malayalam works are; Bhasha Naishadham, Rajaratnavaliyam, Kotiyaviraham, Banayuddham, Rasakrida, Vishnumaya, charitam, Tirunrittam, Daraka vadham Parvati Stuti and Saraswati Stuti. The first four are champus and the rest are 'brahmani songs' which are supposed to have been written for his wife. Exact dates of composition of these works are not available. In the absence of clear evidences, based on some internal facts, Ulloor concludes that the four champus are of the same author and adds that Bhasha Naishadham may be the earliest. Bhasha Naishadham is divided into two parts. Authors of champus used freely either to quote or translate from Sanskrit champu quatrains to suit their contexts. But that Mazhamangalam has not done this in his Bhasha Naishadham is something which demands special notice. As it was wont to the Nambuthiri poets then, Mazhamangalam also was very keen on making use of all occasions to be humorous. His unrivalled ability to give expression to any idea in grand poetry and his unique mastery over language can be seen in other champus also. He wrote some memorable Brahmani songs as well meant to be sung in the temples in a musical rhythm resembling the chanting of the Vedas.

Pattathil Padmanabha Menon edited and published an edition of Bhasha Naishadham champu (1934).

MAZHAR JAN-E-JANAN, MIRZA (Urdu; b.1701, d.1781), alias Shamsuddin Habibullah, was the son of Mirza Jan, a highly placed officer under Aurangzeb. Mazhar Jan-e-Janani was born at Agra, and he lived through the period following Aurangzeb's death when anarchy reigned over the Mughal Darbar and moral degradation had overtaken the Delhi society.

Urdu poetry was also in decadence with its emphasis on ornate language, play on words, vagueness of expression and complexity of meaning.

Mazhar Jan-e-Janani is credited with reform in poetry and return to sublimity of ideas and simplicity of expression.

He was a pious person and became a renowned 'sufi' at a young age under the influence of Syed Nur Mohammed Badayuni, Hazrat Hafiz Saadullah and Hazrat Sheikh Mohammed Abid Sanami.

MAZI JANMATHEP

In Urdu poetry, he is said to have sought advice and guidance from Ghulam Nabi Bilgrami and Bedil. But no collection of his Urdu poems exists.

He was a merited Persian Poet, and a collection of his Persian poetry is available.

In spite of leading a life of seclusion, he was well aware of the political developments and he wrote about them in his letters addressed to various people.

Among his disciples in poetry were such poets as Inamullah Khan Yaqeen, Khwaja Ahsanullah Bayan, Mohammed Baqar Hazeen, Habibullah Khan Hasrat, Mohammed Faqih Dardmand, Shah Qudratullah Qudrat, Sangamlal Izzat, Kishenchand Majrooh and Basavan Rai Bedad.

Among his works are Kharita-e-Jawahir, a collection of selected verses of classical Persian masters (Kanpur, 1847) and Diwan-e-Mazhar, a collection of his Persian poems (Kanpur, 1855). Three collections of his letters also exist.

MAZI JANMATHEP (Marathi:), by V.D. Savarkar (1927), is an autobiographical fragment, covering the decade from 1911 to 1921, during which Savarkar was transported to the Andamans. The hardships he endured could have broken the spirits of a lesser man, but Savarkar was made of sterner stuff. His account of his incarceration, the most gruelling and trying period of his life, besides being a triumph of his iron will over the most adverse circumstances, is representative of the revolutionary ardour of a section of Indian youth whom he led. An unusual book in many ways, it is the only one in Marathi giving a first hand account of the Andaman jail and its horrors, written by a very sensitive and committed person—a hero, very much conscious of his heroism. The book appeared serially first in Tilak's Kesari in 1925-26, and later in the periodical Shraddhanand and finally in a book form in 1927. Proscribed in 1934, the ban was lifted only in 1946 by the popular Congress ministry. The book has been translated into English and several Indian languages.

The book is in two parts. The first part gives the incidents and happenings that befell this unusual prisoner, known reverently to his fellow-prisoners and petty jail officials as 'Ballister babu'. The second part deals with theoretical and organizational issues wherein he deals with how he successfully made his fellow prisoners discover their identity, how he 'purified' and converted many of them to Hinduism and built up a library of 2000 volumes and how after becoming a 'foreman' (he puns on the word and declares ironically his superiority over jailors and fellowprisoners who were merely 'men' while he was their 'foreman', leader and superior) he helped alleviate the grievances of others. He was also instrumental in making Devnagari the official script and Hindi a medium of official correspondence.

Throughout the narrative runs the thread of how heroically his genius triumphed over his adversities and made virtue of a grim necessity. The absence of writing material was compensated for by turning the prison walls into paper and a thorn into a pen. He memorised his poems and writings of other authors including Mill and Spencer, inscribed on the walls and later had them transferred on paper, after his release. Among these is the khandakavya Kamala, a high watermark of his romantic idealism.

Savarkar modestly expresses his hesitation to reveal the story of his transportation, though he welcomes the empathy it would arouse. He shies away from the type of exhibitionism, for people may think that his political activities were superfluous. He would however be brief, objective and free from self-praise in giving the history of his thoughts, passions and emotions. The detached yet intense depiction of his emotions is a major attraction of his book. He avoids maudlin sentiment when his young wife, hardly out of her teens, visits him for the first time in prison. He is silent over intimacies they might have exchanged, but details his admonition to her, the gist of which is: they too like crows and sparrows have built their nest, but unlike these birds they destroyed it to serve mankind. Who knows, the devastation of their homestead might help construct the hearths and homes of their lesser fortunate countrymen? A more detailed depiction of feelings is given when he meets his elder brother in the Andamans also sentenced to transportation, and earlier the younger brother in Bombay prison. There are agonising moments when fellow revolutionaries like Nanigopal, Ulhaskar Dutta or Harilal Varma were tortured, driven insane or hanged. There are moments of triumph when he succeeds in uniting prisoners against the tyranny of jail officials. A drama of light and shade is enacted when time and again the news of his release comes and which turns out to be only a rumour. Thoughts of suicide and renunciation of the path of action recur from time to time, partly as a result of the tragic monotony of jail life and partly from reading of the Vedic and religious texts advocating renunciation. Vastness of astronomical and geological phenomena too brings home the triviality of human endeavour and yet the ideal of freedom keeps him to the path of action.

The long drawn conflict between Savarkar and the Irish jailor Barrie, a brutal tyrant, adds to the dramatic element. The idealistic, selfless heroism of Savarkar subdues his coarse adversary, but in his assessment,

MEBAR PATAN-MEDHI, KALIRAM

Savarkar is very fair to him, attributes his brutality to the nature of his duties and expresses great admiration for his God-loving wife and affectionate daughter.

Another striking feature is the humour which, under the shadow of death, is often grim and sardonic. His detached self-analysis, free from self-pity, enables him to observe his fellow prisoners in good humour and relieves his own tension.

MEBAR PATAN (Bengali) by Dwijendralal Ray is the last of his series of plays based on the annals and antiquities of Rajasthan. As far as its theme is concerned it is complementary to the author's earlier drama Pratap Simha (1905) and strictly speaking cannot be said to be of an absolutely independent character. The dramatist in the midst of the Swadeshi Movement of Bengal was preaching his own ideas of patriotism, nationality and universal love through his writings. In Mebar patan (the fall of Mewar, 1908) the same ideas persist and lead to a conclusion. The theme of the drama is as follows:

Amar Simha, the son of Pratap Simha was the Rana of Mewar. His capital was at Udaipur because Chitore, the earlier capital of Mewar, had already fallen to the Mughals. This time the Mughal army again attacked Mewar under the command of Hadayet Ali Khan but was defeated. Then Parbhez, the son of the Emperor, headed a big Mughal army and attacked Mewar with renewed vigour. Sagar Simha, the Rajput, who had taken shelter with the Mughals, came along with Parbhez, the son of the Emperor. Sagar Simha was the elder brother of Pratap Simha and the father of Mahabat Khan, a Muslim convert. The Mughal army was defeated again. At last Mahabat Khan attacked Mewar with a bigger Mughal army and inflicted a crushing defeat on the Rajput army. Thus Mewar was annexed to the Mughal Empire and the fort of Udaipur was occupied by Mahabat Khan.

As a matter of fact the theme of this play started with the drama Pratap Simha. Rana Pratap Simha struggled to recover the lost territories from the Mughals, but his unworthy son Amar lost them. The dramatist shows that it was due to the treachery of Mahabat Khan who had forsaken his own country and religion for the favour of the Mughals that the Rajputs, his own people, were ultimately defeated and lost their country, and exhorts one to sacrifice the narrowness of religious ideas and practices which are at the root of all evils, social and political. Universal love is the way to supreme success in national development. These are the sermons which are preached by the characters of the drama not by their action as it is desirable but by oral preachings only. This is the main defect of the drama.

Though there are some characters as vehicles of certain ideas of the author in the drama and they have weakened the plot, still there are some characters which have not been altogether unsuccessful. One of them is Amar Simha, who has been made mainly responsible for the tragedy of the fall of Mewar.

The author had some lessons to give to his audience. He said that the Rajputs lost their independence for their own fault, and they had to regain it by their own atonement for that sin. During the age of the Swadeshi Movement loss of independence of the Rajputs to the Mughals meant the loss of the independence of India at the hands of the British people.

MEDHI, KALIRAM (Assamese; b.1878, d.1954), a reputed name in the field of Assamese language, literature and culture, was born at Ramdia, a remote village in the district of Kamrup. His father, Bhukali Medhi belonged to the famous Medhi family (religious agent of a Vaishnavite institution) of Bagaribari where Kaliram spent his early life.

Kaliram's formal education began at his village school. He passed the entrance examination from Cotton Collegiate School in Gauhati in 1897, securing the highest marks in Sanskrit. Thereafter he proceeded to Calcutta for higher studies and got admitted into the City College. He completed his formal education in 1903 with a Master's degree in Physics from the Presidency College.

In 1904 Kaliram Medhi joined the Assam Civil Service. His literary career began through Alochani and Asam bandhava, two Assamese journals published from Dibrugarh. Later he contributed regularly to various journals and periodicals, such as Banhi, Chetana, Jayanti, Journal of the Assam Research Society, Awahan and Ramdheni, both in Assamese and English. Kaliram Medhi's study included diverse areas of Assamese literature and culture, such as Vaishnava religion and philosophy, Assamese language and the antiquities of Assam. In all these fields, he set some new trends in scholarship. Three examples of his remarkable works are, Prahlad charitra of Homasaraswati (probably belonging to the 14th century), Ankavali (Part I), a collection of twenty-one Ankiya nat written by Shankaradeva, Madhavadeva and other medieval writers, critically edited from old manuscripts, and Asamiya byakaran aru bhashatattva (1936). In the first two works published in 1913 and 1950 respectively, Medhi applied modern method in editing old texts, whereas in his later work he discussed exhaustively the origin of the Assamese language using the historical method of approach. In a sense, he is a pioneer scholar in introducing scientific method of textual criticism in Assamese and the first man to prepare an exhaustive and analytical grammar following the historical method. Another of his scholastic work, Shankaradevar bani (Messages of Shankaradeva) was published in 1948. Besides these, some of his unpublished works are Asamiya bhashar mul, Asamiya prathamik bignan and Ankavali (Part-II). It must be remembered that Kaliram Medhi was also a linguist. Though well-versed in English, Assamese and Sanskrit, he also knew the Garo language of the Tibeto-Burman origin.

Kaliram was a prominent member of the Kamarupa Anusandhan Samiti and also worked for sometime as the President of the Asam State Museum. He was also elected President of the 3rd Annual Session of Asam Sahitya Sabha (1919). In 1943 the British Government awarded him the title of Raibahadur in recognition of his meritorious services both as a scholar and civil servant.

MEENAKSHIAMMAI PILLAITTAMIL (Tamil), written by Kumaraguruparat, belongs to the category of pillai-Tamil poems. 'Pillai-Tamil' (Tamil poem on childhood) is one of the types of minor poems grouped under the common name of 'prabandha' (well-composed). It is usually in 100 long 'viruttam' verses in different metres, divided into ten sections of ten verses each. The beginning of this type of poem can be seen in the devotional verses of Periyalvar, but the distinct genre takes its form from Kulottunga Cholan Pillai-Tamil of Ottakkuttar (12th century).

A poem of this genre depicts the Divine Being as a child. Each section of the poem deals with a phase in the child's growth from its third month onwards, in odd months, to the 21st month. The first section called 'kappu' (protection) invokes the protection of the various deities to the three-month old baby. Section 2 calls forth the sweet lisping ('senkirai') of the child; section 3 is a lullaby; section 4 asks the baby to clap its hands ('sappani') and section 5 asks for a kiss. Section 6 is an invitation to the baby to come into the projected hands of the singer and section 7 calls on the moon to come down and play with the baby as this will be of benefit to the moon itself. The last 3 sections are different for the male child and for the female. For the female child, section 8 entreats the child to come forth and play the ammanai game with cowries; section 9 calls her to appear and have a cool bath and the last asks her to rock in the swing.

Kumaragurupara composed two pillai-Tamil poems, the first of them on Devi Meenakshi, the goddess enshrined at Madurai in the days of the ruler Tirumalai Nayak (1623-59). It is considered to be one of the sweetest poems in the language. All the metrical and poetic devices are employed here by the poet in a charmingly simple language with a cadence and diction which raise it to the heights of finest lyric poetry. Kumaraguruparar has the rare gift of coining meaningful expressions and these have since become the common stock of all poets of the later days. Many of the verses have a mechanical rhythm or lilt. The subject of the poem is Shakti Meenakshi. She is considered to be the mother of all the universe. Thus this poem has a unique theme. Meenakshi Pillai-Tamil provides an archetype for a pillai-Tamil poem. Each section of the poem employs two metres, where each verse is a long quatrain in which each line is a double line with more than six feet to each half line. The second half of the fourth line employs a refrain which is repeated verbatim in all the verses of the section.

A legend says that when the author sang the poem in the Court of Nayak, Devi Meenakshi assumed the form of a daughter of the temple priest (a girl of six years) and seated herself on the lap of the king, and when the poet sang the ninth verse of the sixth section inviting the child Meenakshi to come into the outstretched arms, the girl removed a pearl necklace from the shoulders of the ruler, placed it round the neck of Guruparar and disappeared. Naturally the assemblage was amazed. They understood that the poet was a favourite with the Devi Herself. The poetry and the music of the verse are untranslatable but the substance is given below.

O Goddess, —

Thou art the cream of all classical divine poetry.

Thou art the essence dripping from the sweet Tamil songs full of honey.

Thou art the flame kindled in the hearts of Thy servants who have scooped out the very roots of the ego.

Thou art the tender young girl-elephant playing on the Himalyan slopes.

Thou art the live portrait painted in His heart by Siva, Who is beyond the world's girl with the charging waves.

O tender Creeper, carrying on thy locks flowers with bees! Come into my arms, of Subramania Bharati and a doctorate (Madras University, 1966) for his scholarly work on the contribution of European scholars to Tamil. After serving the Annamalai University as a lecturer for seven years, he entered the Tamilnadu Educational Service in 1957 and served in various capacities such as Professor of Tamil and Principal of several Government Colleges till 1981, when he became the Joint Director of Collegiate Education in Tamilnadu. His administrative abilities and professional integrity earned him the award for the best Principal for the year 1979-80. He also served the International Institute of Tamil Studies in Madras from its very inception as its first Deputy Director-cum-Chief Administrative Officer from 1971 to 1974. He was an active member of the Syndicate of the University of Madras from 1976-1981, was the Chairman, Advisory Council for Tamil for Bharatiya Jnanapith Award for 1972-1975, Chairman, Madras University Committee for medium of Instruction in Colleges; Member of the Regional and Central Advisory Councils, Sahitya Akademi and Member, Tamil Nadu Government Language Development Council. In spite of his administrative responsibilities he continues to be interested in research activities. A scholar of mature critical sensibilities, he was invited to deliver Endowment Lectures in Tamil in Madras (1971) and Annamalai (1977) Universities. He has been the Chief Editor of the Journal of Tamil Studies (1972-1974), a biennial publication of the International Institute of Tamil Studies. He has been contributing to various research and professional journals such as Journal of Tamil Studies, Bulletin of the Institute of Traditional Culture of Madras, Journal of Traditional Culture, Madras, Kalaikkattir-Coimbatore and so on. His important published works characterized by original thinking include A Study of the Poetical Works of Subramania Bharati (Madras, Pari Nilayam, 1964) which won him a Shield from the Madras Bharati Sangam, Panmaiyl orumai (Coimbatore: Velan Patippakam, 1969), Bharati Panilai (Palani, Ilango Publications, 1972), Chilampil tunaippattirankal (Palani, Ilango Publications, 1973), The Contribution of European Scholars to Tamil (Madras, University of Madras, 1974), Akaratikku appal (Madras, Mangai Nulakam, 1977), and Maharishi Devendranath Tagore (New Delhi: Sahitya Akademi, 1980).

O great glory begotten by Malayadvaja Pandiya, come into my arms.

A.A.M.

MEENAKSHISUNDARAM PILLAI, MAHAVIDWAN (Tamil; b. 1815, d. 1876) was born in Adavatoor, near Tiruchirappalli. His father was F.Chidambaram Pillai and mother, M.Annathachi. Pillai attended his father's school from his fifth year. He began to compose verses very early and give expositions. Pillai got valuable instruction in many classics from Velayudha Munivar at the Mownaswami Mutt. Pillai then visited some sacred shrines in the company of other young friends who studied with him.

People in charge of temples requested him to compose a set of poems in praise of the deities worshipped there and he readily obliged them. His first acquaintance with the Tiruvavaduthurai Mutt occurred very early in his life, and this connection he kept up till the last day of his life.

In Madras, Pillai met giants like Kanchipuram Sabapathy Mudaliyar, Tiruvengada Mudaliyar of Egmore, and Mazhavai Mahalingaiyar.

Discourses on Peria puranam (Lives of the Shaivite saints) were given by Pillai which attracted a large number of devotees, scholars and pupils. By now, his fame began to spread far and wide. During this period, the great Thyagaraja Chettiar, Swaminaatha Kavirayar, and Arumugatha Pillai of Patteshwaram became his ardent disciples.

In Bangalore, Pillai composed his famous Woriyur puranam and edited Devaraja Pillai's works, Kuchela upakhyana and Suta samhita. He took lessons in grammar from Keezhveloor Subramaniya Desikar. He spent all his time listening to lessons from scholars and teaching many pupils. He received the title, Vidwan, when he expounded his Woriyur puranam to an enlightened audience at the Mutt.

On his way to Mayuram, he composed at Seerkazhi the Seerkazhi kovai; he settled for a while at Mayuram. He was 45. While there, he was invited by the head of the Tiruvavaduthurai Mutt and made a court poet. He composed a 'kalambakam' on Ambalavaana Deshikar, the head of the Mutt, for which he was bestowed with the title of Mahavidwan.

His energy to learn and teach was inexhaustible. To a Muslim scholar from Nagore, Ghulam Khaadar Navalar, he taught Seerappuranam, which dealt with the life of the Prophet and the Savaraayulu Nayakar, a Christian scholar, he taught Thembavani and other Christian religious works. Vedanayagam Pillai, a devoted scholar, became his disciple, and in his honour Pillai composed Kutatoor kovai.

Pillai gave a number of discourses at every place he visited, and these were listened to with rapt attention by hundreds of listeners. He was endearingly called 'Pillai' and was known as such more than by his usual name, Meenakshisundaram Pillai.

In all he wrote 16 puranas, 9 Pillai-Tamils, 11 antadis, 2 kalambakams, 4 malais, 1 kovai, 1 lilai, 1 venba, 1 kalippu, and Kashi rahasiyam. Of these 48 works, Thirunakai karohana puranam is a typical specimen of a puranam, containing 61 padalams and 2506 viruttams. His outstanding disciples were Thyagaraja Chettiar and U.V. Swaminatha Aiyar. An illuminating biography of this great literary prodigy was written by U.V. Swaminatha Iyer, and this has been acclaimed as a model for future biography writers in the native language. He was fittingly called the 'poets' poet', who not only enriched the Tamil language with works of his own of varied and imperishable beauty, but was a cause of great awakening in our land. wherever poetry is studied and enjoyed today, we may take it that the seeds of such pleasure and such recognition were sown by this great writer.

S.Sr.

MEENAKSHISUNDARANAR, T.P. (Tamil; b. 1901, d. 1980), savant and scholar, had his school and collegiate education in Madras. His flair for Tamil was due to his family environment inspired by his father and brother. He acquired post-graduate degree in History, bachelor's degree in Law and the Vidvan title for securing the first rank in the University. His association with Tiru V. Kalyanasundara Mudaliyar, an eminent exponent of Gandhi and Marx, was a fruitful one. He was instrumental in founding the Chennai-t-Tamil-c-sangam. He learnt a number of languages—Sanskrit, Telugu, Malayalam, Kannada, Hindi, French and German, and was known among the people as Panmoli-p-pulavar (scholar in many languages). His Master of Oriental Learning thesis was on the Tamil sounds under the guidance of Jules Bloch of the French Indological Institute. He was closely connected with the Dravidian Linguistics Association. He was Professor of Tamil and Linguistics in the Annamalai University and for some time the Chief Professor of Tamil in the Presidency College, Madras. He was the Vice Chancellor of the Madurai University from 1966 to 1971. He was conferred the fellowship of the Sahitya Akademi in 1975. He was a city father and educationist and courted imprisonment for two years for his involvement in the Individual Satyagraha in 1941. He actively participated in the movement of transcendental meditation during the last years of his life.

Meenakshisundaranar came into contact with great scholars one of whom, K. Vadivelu Chettiyar, was mainly responsible for revealing to him the depth of scholarship possible not only in philosophy but also in the Tamil language and literature. A book on Psychology came from his pen defining the same as the 'Science of the Nature of the Mind'. His book on Valluvarum makalirum (Valluvar on women), spotlights the teachings of the seer that domestic life is nothing but virtue. He pronounces that a woman is a lofty being. Speaking about the Tirukkural and its author Tiruvalluvar, Minakshisundaranar observes that the Tirukkural is, as it were, the Bible of the Tamilians. Tiruvalluvar does not expound any sectarian view or any particular school of thought. It is clear that he refuses to be labelled. Every evaluation of the contribution of an author has to be based on a comparison with any existing theme. While not forcing the Sanskrit theories on the study of Tiruvalluvar, Minakshisundaranar expresses the view that contributions of Tiruvalluvar become clearer and more significant against the pan-Indian framework as the same is itself a product of the intellectual world of India spreading from the Himalayas to Cape Comorin. Therefore, there is no question of any borrowing, because it is a common heritage. Meenakshisundaran's philosophic writings include dissertations of differing systems such as lectures on Shaiva Siddhanta (1965) and Advaita in Tamil (1974). Though an adherent to the Shaiva Siddhanta philosophy, Vedanta attracted him. He is not apologetic about his view given in an introduction to an Advaitic commentary on Shivajnana bodham by his teacher, Vadivelu Chettiyar, that this smallest book in the world ought to have been the greatest but for the sectarian shelf which it adorns. In his thirty or more publications, a variety of disciplines such as literature and linguistics, history and grammar, folklore and art, religion and philosophy, receive an artistic embellishment at his hands. On the musical compositions of 'kanalvari', he has written an exhaustive criticism. Not susceptible to a dogmatic approach, Minakshisundaranar's writings on Tamilology in Tamil and English are refreshingly elevating in content and scholarly in treatment.

FURTHER WORKS: Sulamani vachanam, (1944); Narrinai nata-kankal (1954); Mullai-p-pattu-The Idyll of Jasmine (1958); Kulashekarar Tiruvalluvar (1961); The Pageant of Tamil Literature (1965); Philosophy of Tiruvalluvar (1969); Valum kalai (1975); Moli vilaiyattukkal (1977); Tenippu (1978); Annita natakam (1980).

MEGHADUTA (Sanskrit) is one of the great works of Kalidasa. It is a short poem containing some 115 verses uniformly in one metre called mandakranta, which is applauded by critics as the most suitable to the theme of the poem. Meghaduta (The cloud messenger) is divided into two almost equal books called Purvamegha (The earlier cloud) and Uttaramegha (The later cloud) respectively. From the Western point of view the poem may be called a lyric. According to traditional Indian criticism it is technically called a 'khandakavya', i.e., a poem which partially embodies the characteristics of an epic. In four verses in the beginning, the poet introduces the situation and the hero of the poem. The rest of the verses constitute a speech of the hero addressed to a cloud on the very first day of the rainy season. The hero is a young newly-wed employee of Kuṇḍera banished from Alaka for one year and thus separated from his young and beautiful wife for whom he pitifully pines. From Ramagiri, the place of exile, the hero wants to send a message to his love-lorn wife, requests the cloud to carry the message, and describes the path to be taken by the messenger, and the city of Alaka and also the residence to be visited and his wife who is suffering from pangs of separation. The heroine is now emaciated, but yet she is matchless in beauty:

"She is slim and young; her teeth are closely knit and pointed; her lower lip is (as red and sweet as) a ripe 'bimba' fruit; she has a slender waist; her eyes are like those of a frightened fawn; her navel is deep; she walks slowly due to the weight of her buttocks; her person is slightly drooping due to the (plump) breasts; she is, as it were, the very first creation of the Creator so far as young damsels are concerned."

The gist of the message is that there is a change of fortune for each and every one. Accordingly, the present pining couple also would reunite in course of another four months. The heroine should somehow keep herself cheerful during this intervening time.

The hero anticipates that once reunited, with their desire rendered more intense by separation, they would fully enjoy the nights endowed with abundant autumnal moon-light. (Uttara, 49).

It is suggested by Mallinatha, the commentator, that Kalidasa derived the idea of sending a message to the distant beloved from the Ramayana where Rama sent a message through Hanuman to Sita while she was a captive in the realm of Ravana. Kalidasa himself leaves a hint to this effect when the messenger cloud is told that the heroine would eagerly look forward for the cloud like Sita looking forward for Hanuman.

Meghaduta is a love poem. It is believed that the rainy season makes human beings and other creatures desperately desirous for conjugal love. Hence it is natural that the first appearance of the cloud makes the exiled hero more concerned about the love-lorn heroine and that is why he sends the message of consolation to his beloved. This poem describes love in union so far as the personified cloud and the personified rivers and other persons are concerned. This, through contrast, augments the effect of love in separation that pertains to the hero and the heroine.

Meghaduta is characterised by (a) appealing descriptions of the flora and fauna of the region stretching from Ramagiri to Alaka, and of other natural objects like hills and rivers, cities and the countryside, (b) accurate description of the aspirations of separated lovers, (c) personification of objects of nature like hills and rivers, (d) allusions to puranic episodes, (e) delineation of ten states of love pertaining to both love in union and love in separation respectively, (f) successful delineation of figures like upama, rupaka, samasokti and arthantaranyasa, (g) large number of pithy sayings presenting mainly as the concluding part of arthantaranyasas, (h) a faithful geographical account of the places between Ramagiri in Central India and Alaka in the Himalayas, and (i) the moral that love should not make the lovers forget their obligations to society.

Meghaduta (also called Meghasandesha) was a trend-setter. Scores of poems were composed later on in imitation of the theme and style of the Meghaduta, and all such works form a genre called 'dutakavya' or 'sandeshakavya'. For instance, Bhatta Vamana (15th century) wrote Hamsasandesha with the same theme as that of the Meghaduta; Dhoi (12th century) wrote Pavanaduta in the same style. Jinasena used a line or two of the successive verses of Meghaduta in each of the stanzas of his Parshvabhhyudaya, dealing with the life of the Jaina saint, Parshvanatha, applying the technique called 'samasyapurana' (filling up the gap).

Meghaduta became extremely popular as evidenced by the popular saying 'meghe maghe gatam vayah' (We have passed our life reading the Meghaduta and the Maghakavya). A.B. Keith, a modern authority, observes that Indian criticism has ranked the Meghaduta as the "highest among Kalidasa's poems for brevity of expression, richness of content, and power to elicit sentiment, and the praise is not undeserved."

MEGHANADABADH KABYA (Bengali; b. 1861) is a Bengali epic in nine Cantos written by Michael Madhusudan Dutta. This is the work of a literary rebel who challenged the age-old poetic conventions and created a new model for epic poetry in Bengali. The story of this epic is taken from the Ramayana but the old story acquires a new meaning and dimension partly because of the way the poem is constructed which is radically different from the Indian epic tradition and partly because of the remoulding of the traditional characters. Michael wrote to a friend, "It is my ambition to engraft the exquisite graces of the Greek mythology on our own". But he claimed that he was not an imitator. He wrote, "I shall not borrow Greek stories but write, rather try to write as the Greeks would have done". Indian exponents of poetics recommended that episodes in an epic must observe the rules of propriety and condemned unnecessary digression into other details. But none of them said that epic must be constructed on dramatic principles, and that, as Aristotle ruled, it should have for its subject a single action, whole and complete. Michael constructed his poem on the principles laid down by Aristototele. He concentrated on a single action, the death of Meghanada, the valiant son of Ravana. The action is whole and complete. If the Ramayana and the Mahabharata could be said to illustrate the kind of poem that the Iliad might have been, had it taken the whole war of Troy as its subject, then the Meghanadabadh kabya is a possible illustration of what the Ramayana could have been had it been constructed according to the rules of the Aristotelean poetics.

MEGHANI, JHAVERACHANDA KALIDASA

Madhusudan was fascinated by the Homeric model because of its affiliation to dramatic principles. The invocation of the Muse, for example, with which this epic begins is an innovation in Indian poetry. Michael was attracted to this Western poetic convention because of its dramatic possibility. In the Indian epic tradition the development of the story follows the unfolding of the sequence of events in a chronological order. Meghanadabadh kavya is a striking contrast to this practice. The poem opens in the middle of the battle between Rama and Ravana and only later does it return to events to explain the origin of the battle. The first Canto starts with the fall of Virbahu, a son of Ravana, and narrates the incidents leading to the consecration of Meghanada as the chief of Ravana's army. The next four Cantos are devoted to the incidents of the following night and the action of the last four Cantos extends over two more days. The action of the epic, thus, covers barely three days, yet Michael succeeds in creating a sense of vastness both in terms of time and space. Cantos II to V describe incidents which are chronologically ordered but are occurring in four different places simultaneously. Aristotle mentions the advantage that an epic has over a tragedy in respect of the possibility of the presentation of events taking place simultaneously and how in this way an epic acquires mass and dignity. The places of action in the Cantos just referred to are the heaven, the battle-ground, the place where Sita is imprisoned and the palace of Ravana respectively. In Canto IV, which is marked by a tenderness of spirit and style, Sita tells the story of her life which flashes back to the actual beginning of the hostilities between Rama and Ravana. Without being diffuse Michael relates the past. Similarly in Canto VIII, Rama's journey to the land of the dead, which follows closely on Aeneas's journey to the underworld, serves the same purpose, and the story acquires magnitude and dignity. The story of the Ramayana is told but in a new manner: the unessential part remains in the background and out of the suppression of detail and concentration on a single action is born a new poem.

According to Indian poetics, a serious change in the aesthetic value stabilised through ages not only violates the rules of aesthetic propriety but it also hurts the collective feeling of a society. The character of Rama, for example, has been stabilised. Any radical change in this character may deprive it of the halo associated with this character. Michael did not want to project Rama in his old glory. He presented him as a saintly prince no doubt but his heart is with Ravana, the king of the rakshasas. In one of his letters Michael wrote, "I despise Rama and his rabbles. The idea of Ravana elevates me". He changed the centre of attraction from Rama to Ravana and this is the most radical change that Michael brought about in the framework of the Ramayana theme. Many critics found resemblances between the Satan of the Paradise Lost and Michael's Ravana. The similarity, however, though not accidental, is not very deep. Ravana does not challenge, like the Satan of Milton, the divine authority and the very scheme of things. Nonetheless, the nineteenth century Bengali reader found in him a hero challenging the tradition. The emphasis in the Ramayana is on the ultimate victory of good over evil, Rama being the symbol of good and dharma and Ravana of adharma. This moral overtone is missing in the Meghnadabadh. Here Ravana is more like a hero of the Greek epics struggling against his fate and like a Greek hero again he suffers gloriously. There are characters, however, who are quick to point out that all his sufferings arise out of his misdeeds, his own karma. But Michael does neither emphasize the inevitability of karma or of retribution. His emphasis is on the suffering itself. The death of Meghanada which is the central theme of the epic overpowers the readers with a sense of tragic waste.

This epic is not without its defects. In fact, it has many defects. The second and the eighth Cantos are particularly laboured, imitative and crude. The diction of Michael is often artificial and pompous. His vocabulary is extremely limited. Though his blank verse is smooth and flowing, his syntax is often clumsy and involved. Yet Meghanadabadh kavya is an outstanding work of art, distinguished by a boldness of execution and grand conception and imagination. It has a robustness of expression with an under-current of tender lyricism, and this has given this epic its uniqueness in the history of Bengali poetry.

MEGHANI, JHAVERACHANDA KALIDASA (Gujarati; b. 1896, d. 1947) was a folklorist and litterateur. He studied at different places and graduated in 1916. Due to some family problems, he had to give up his studies and take up a job with an industrial concern in Calcutta. His stay in Calcutta for more than two years provided him with an opportunity to come into close contact with the Bengali language and literature, and especially the works of Rabindranath Tagore. This had a lasting influence on his writing which was to be published subsequently. But Meghani loved the land, people, life and folk literature of Saurashtra so much that he constantly yearned to return to his native place. Ultimately, he gave up his lucrative job and returned to Saurashtra, though at that time, he faced uncertain future. In 1922 he joined the editorial board of Saurashtra, a Gujarati newspaper, and devoted the rest of his life to journalism. It was at this time that he wrote small pamphlets on political events like 'Misavano muktisangrama', 'Hangerino taranahara', 'Salagatum' and 'Ayavpenda'. Subsequently he was associated with some other newspapers like Phulachaba and Janmabhumi. He was the first recipient of the Ramajithama Suvarnachandraka in 1928. He was invited by the Bombay University in 1943 to deliver lectures under the 'Thakkara Vasanaji Madhavaji Vyakhyanamala.' These lectures were subsequently published under the title Lokasahityanum samalochana. During his not so long life span of 51 years, Meghani wrote 88 books. These include poetry, short stories, novels, travelogues, biographies, autobiographical works, translations and adaptations. But his most lasting contribution has been to the field of folk literature. He had a discerning eye and a sharp ear for folk literature. He was always touring towns and villages of Saurashtra in order to collect and record in writing the poems, stories, tales, biographies, ballads etc. that were on the tip of the tongue of the men and women, young and old. For him folk literature was not a hobby or a pastime, but a lifelong passion and a never ending mission.

He has given us 16 collections of folk tales, 10 of folk songs and 5 works on the criticism and interpretation of the folk literature of Saurashtra. Saurashtra rasadhara, Vols. 1-5 (1923-1927) is a collection of about 100 folk tales, whereas Sorathi baharavatiya, Vols. 1-3 (1927-1929) retell the stories related to the outlaws of Kathiawar. Kankavati, Vols. 1-2 (1927-1928) collect stories and episodes related to various religious festivals and ceremonies. Radhiyati rata (1925-1942) is a collection of folk songs and ballads. Chundadi, Vol. 1-2 (1928-1929), Halaratam (1928), Ritugito (1929), Sorathi santavani (1947) and Sorathiya duha (1947) are his other collections of folk-songs. The following works are devoted to criticism and interpretation of folk literature: Lokasahitya, dharatinum dhavana, Vol. 1-2 (1939-1944), Charano ane charani sahitya (1943) and Lokasahityanum samalochana (1946). All these works are valuable contribution to the study of and research on the folk literature of Saurashtra. These works have been extremely popular and most of them have been reprinted several times.

Meghani's own writings are also heavily coloured by his love for folk literature. Mahatma Gandhi, Karl Marx, and Rabindranath Tagore also influenced his writings to a great extent. Most of his poems have been collected in Yugavandana (1935). This also includes his poems collected in his earlier works like Veninam phula (1923), Killola (1930) and Sindhudo. The poems included in Yugavandana deal with human love, divine love and the love for one's country. Some of the poems also display a marked Marxist influence. It was Chello Kataro, a poem written and presented to Mahatma Gandhi when he was about to board a ship for London to participate in the Round Table Conference, that earned for him the title of 'Rashtriya Shair' from Gandhiji. Ekataro (1940) and Ravindravina (1944) are his other collections of poems. The latter consists of poems that are not mere translations but transcreation of some of Tagore's poems. The diction, rhythms, images, melodies and expressions of these poems are so much akin to that of Gujarati folk-songs that a common reader may not even suspect that these poems are based on Tagore's works.

He has written more than 100 short stories which have been collected into Meghanini navalikao, Vol. 1-3 (1931-1946), Jela ophisani bari (1934), Pratimao (1934) and Palakara (1935). Some of these stories are transcreations based on the stories of some Western writers. He has also written 13 novels 4 of which are transcreations. Niranjana (1936) deals with the conflict between the rural and the urban ways of life. Soratha tarām vahetam pani (1937), Vevisala (1939) and Tulasikyaro (1940) depict the rural life of Saurashtra. Prabhu Pandharya (1943) has life in Burma as its background while Samarangana (1938), Ra Gangajaliyo (1939) and Gujaratano jaya Vol. 1-2 (1939-1942) are his historical novels. Satyani sodhamam (1932), Aparadhi (1938), Bidetam dvara (1939) and Kalachakra (1947) are his other novels. Gujarati novel before Meghani was primarily concerned with the urban middle class society. Meghani for the first time introduced in Gujarati fiction the rural life, characters, events and idioms. His contribution to changing the canvas of Gujarati fiction is significant.

Manasaina diva (1945) is a unique combination of fact and fiction. It is based on the experiences of Ravishankar Maharaja, a Gandhian social worker. It deals with the life of the so-called criminal tribes of Gujarat. It aims at showing that underneath the rough and dare-devil exterior of these people, a tiny but steady lamp of humane compassion is constantly giving its light. An English translation of this work, entitled The Earthen Lamp has been published by the Sahitya Akademi.

Parakamma (1946) and Chellum prayana (1947) consist of his essays and articles. Li snehadhina Jhaverachandra (1948) is a posthumous publication of the author's letters. Saurashtrana khanderomam (1928), Sirathane tire tire (1933), Veranamam (1939), Puribhramana Vols. 1-3 (1944-1947) and Sambelana sura (1944) are his other publications. He also has to his credit translations of some plays by Dwijendralal Roy and Rabindranath Tagore.

MEGHRAJ, MUKUL (Rajasthani; b. 1923) was born at Rajgad, district Churu (Rajasthan). He has been a poet of eminence, especially of the stage. It was in 1943 that he recited his first poem 'Sainani' (Momento) in a literary gathering at Dinajpur in Bengal. Endowed with the natural gift of a melodious voice, he earned countrywide fame through his recitals of versified stories of the old feudal life and its moral values and chivalry. This period also happened to be the time of renaissance of modern Rajasthani literature. His compositions, therefore, created a fertile ground for the seeds of new trends in literature to sprout. This sympathetic understanding of Rajasthani literature among the masses goes to the credit of Mukul. This particular period in the history of modern literature has, therefore, been rightly named by scholars as the 'Sainani period'. His Rajasthani poems first appeared in his miscellaneous collection named Umang, mainly containing Hindi poems, published in 1954. The book contains 44 Hindi and 12 Rajasthani poems in all. Later, he wrote more Rajasthani poems, but so far no compilation of his Rajasthani poems has been brought out. Widely acknowledged for his literary calibre and delivery on the stage, he has won much respect in the concerned fields. He has been a member of the Rajasthani Advisory Board in the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi, and has often been associated with the Academies in Rajasthan, both as an Officer of the State Education Department and in his own capacity of a litterateur. He has also earned honours from a number of institutions throughout his career. He has recently retired from his post of Deputy Secretary in the State Government.

MEHAI MAHIMA (Rajasthani), meaning the glory of the deity, Mehai, is a work by Hingalajdan Kaviya written in the early 20th century. This work, containing 144 stanzas in assorted metres, is related to the battle between Rao Jaitasi, grandson of Rao Bika, the founder of the erstwhile state of Bikaner, and Mirza Kamaran, king of Kabul and son of Babar. The small contingent under Rao Jaitasi was no match for the mighty army of Kamaran in this battle fought during the year 1534. Rao Jaitasi, therefore, approached Shri Karaniji, a saintly Charan of eminence, for help and guidance. Shri Karaniji, who was believed to be the incarnation of goddess Durga, and has been worshipped as a folk-deity since then, was alive at that time. The deity is also known as 'Mehai', being the daughter of Charan Mehai. The book named Mehai mahima actually describes the glory of Shri Karaniji i.e., Mehai. It is believed that Shri Karaniji advised the Rao to launch a night-attack on Kamaran, while she herself manifested her godly powers to crush the enemy.

Doha, chappaya, arya, trotak and motidam are the metres used, but most of the descriptive part of the actual scene of battle has been done in motidam. The poetic beauty of this work combined with powerful expression of the rasa and metaphoric elements is worth appreciating. Written in classical Dingal style and rich with standard vocabulary, the work is replete with musical effects of appropriate sounds and contains an easy and natural flow.

The poet's description of the elephants, horses and camels is rather unsurpassable. Minute observation, use of choicest vocabulary suitable to express the sentiments in all sincerity and sobriety, brevity and use of sound effects are the main characteristics of this classical work.

MEHARBAN, SODHI (Punjabi; b. 1558, d. 1618), original name Manohardass, son of Prithichand, the elder brother of Guru Arjan Dev (the fifth Guru of the Sikhs), wrote poetry as well as prose, but his prominent work is Janamsakhi Guru Nanak Dev (Story of the nativity of Guru Nanak, the first Guru of the Sikhs). It is said in Bansabalinama by Kesar Singh Chibbar, (published by the Sikh History Department, Khalsa College, Amritsar, 1962), that under the very pseudonym of 'Nanak', he composed and made available his poetry as Mahila-7 (the seventh hierarchical position of the Guru). Sodhi Hariji, his son, also employed prose and poetry as a vehicle of his thought, under the pen-name of Mahila-8. Both of them borrowed their diction and imagery from the great 'Gurbani' (verses of the great Sikh Masters). They were the forerunners of the sect 'Meharbania' (followers of Meharban). Apart from Janamsakhi, Meharban has authored Var piran ki (Epic of the apostles), Sukhmani sansharnama (Ways of the ecstatic pleasures) and Ramkali Onkar vada (The big Ramkali Onkar). A manuscript of the Janamsakhi of a very big size is extant in the Sikh History Research Department, Khalsa College, Amritsar (MS. No. 427). The work has been recently published by it. The reading of the Janamsakhi text makes it very clear that the original text was an anthology of six books and it contained 575 'Goshtian' (The argumentative dialogues), but now only 288 have come down to us. In the hand-written manuscript No. 3510, Sikh Reference Library, Amritsar, entitled Goshtian Shri Meharbanji kian (The dialogues of Shri Meharban), Hariji, the author tries to raise Sodhi Meharban to the heights of an apostle. In all, this Janamsakhi is a valuable specimen of the seventeenth century prose.

MEHARUNNISA PARVEZ (Hindi; b. 1944) was born at Pratapganj in Madhya Pradesh. She studied upto the B.A. level only but is a fiction writer of great talent. The major area of her concern is feminine sensibility and the modern woman's response to the issues of life today. She depicts the Indian woman as a 'burning twig' in her story 'Sulagati tahani'. She portrays reality in its base essentials. She adopts some of the features of reportage and memoir in her stories, but offers no intrusive commentary or sentimental reporting of a social reality. She rather allows the story to unfold itself through semantic contexts, allusions, symbols and images. Her collections of stories are: Aadam aur Aauva, Gulata purush, Tahnaiyon par dhoop, Phalguni and Antim chadayi.

Parvez's world of fiction is wide enough. She has authored novels like Aankhan ki dehaliz, Usaka ghar, Koraza (1977) and Akela palash (1981) and in all of them she has used the technique of the stream of consciousness. The theme of all these novels is the ruined world of the expectations of the middle class, but the gamut of experience is wide and extensive. In her fiction there is less of artistic acrobatics and more of meaningful experience revealing itself in a flash, at it were, in a language rich and vibrant.

Parvez, in the seventh decade of the 20th century, presents a new idiom for story writing in Hindi. She belongs to the movement of 'Sachetan kahani' and is famous for writing such bold satires as 'Panchar kabra'. The special issue of the Anima magazine and a decade of fiction in the Dharmayug journal gave a special identity to Parvez as a woman story writer.

MEHER, GANGADHARA (Oriya; b. 1862, d. 1924), an eminent poet, was born in a family of weavers. He studied up to the fifth class and served the zemindar of Barapali as a judicial clerk. He was one of the main architects of the Oriya renaissance which had begun around 1876 with the publication of Radhanatha Ray's Kavitavali. He has been described as a 'swabhaba kavi' or natural poet. Poetry came very naturally to him. He is also regarded as one of the greatest poets of nature in modern Oriya.

Meher did not publish his first work, Rasaratnakara (The ocean of rasa), because of what he considered to be its outdated style. It was a narrative poem depicting the story of two mythological characters, Usha and Aniruddha, written during 1885-92. Indumati (1894), his first published work, is a narrative poem or kavya dealing with a character from Kalidasa's Raghuvamsam. His style, with its rhetorical flourish reminiscent of Upendra Bhanja and the Sanskrit poets is old-fashioned. But its success, from the poet's point of view, lay in its approval by Radhanatha Ray. It is noted for its psychological probing of character. The chief inspiration of Utkal Lakshmi is patriotic. The poem is a fantasy. On a full-moon night goddess Prajna escorts the poet to a temple where he meets the moon-god and Rohini who, he learns, have been born in the world as Majaraja Puranachandra of Mayurabhanj and the genius of Utkala respectively. A little later the poet sees the Spirit of Utkala in the form of a beautiful woman being worshipped by the rivers and mountains, the woods and lakes of Orissa. Through this poem Meher paid his respects to the Maharaja who was a great patron of art and literature and also to the genius of Radhanatha Ray. Kichaka badha (The killing of Kichaka, 1905) and Ayodhya drishya (1910) are again narrative poems dealing with an episode from Sarala Dasa's Mahabharata and with the story of the Ramayana respectively. Kichaka badha celebrates the triumph of good over evil through the death of its protagonist, who is presented as the very embodiment of lust. Ayodhya drishya has Kausholya as its protagonist instead of Rama and depicts her motherly sentiments rather in a haphazard manner. Padmini (1910) narrates the story of a brave Rajput woman of Indian history. The two subsequent kavyas, Pranayaballari (The creeper of love, 1914) and Tapaswini (The female ascetic, 1914), however, are the supreme examples of his narrative art and his moral and spiritual vision. The former is based on Kalidasa's Abhijnana Shakuntalam and portrays Shakuntala as the very embodiment of ideal love. Kalidasa's heroine can exchange angry words with Dushyanta when he ill-treats her but not Meher's Shakuntala who is all simplicity, tenderness and tolerance. Tapaswini is entirely about Sita and her suffering when she is banished by Rama. Its subject-matter is drawn from Valmiki's Ramayana, Kalidasa's Raghuvamsam and Bhavabhuti's Uttararamacharita. Towards the end of this poem of eleven Cantos, Sita sends her sons to the Ashwamedha yagna of their father, and a vision gives her an insight into her happy future. Fortitude is the keynote of her character. The process of her coming to terms with her sufferings and her final surrender to God's will have been described in an intensely dramatic manner. Besides its religious theme, Tapaswani is noted for its perfect structural organisation. The poem is an epic of human endurance.

Meher's lyrical work has been published in two collections entitled Kavita kallola (1912) and Arghyathali (The plate of offerings, 1918). The five poems of the first volume are chiefly patriotic whereas those in the second are cast in an ironic mould focussing on human follies and foibles. Some of them like "Garba" "Tanku madhya bolithanti dharma avatara" and "Andhakarakara atmaphrasada" are bitterly satirical. Arghyathali also contains poems like 'Bhakti', which is an impassioned expression of the poet's religious feelings, and 'Madhumaya', a celebration of the beauty of the world. "Bharati bhabana" (1923) is a song of protest against the oppressive rule of the British. The other poems Meher wrote after 1918 have been published in his collected works under two titles, Kavita mala and Krishaka sangita. The latter consists of poems on agriculture most of which are in a humorous vein. Meher's lyrical poems are noted for its wide range of feelings. He also has written half a dozen essays in autobiography, biography and literary criticism of indifferent merit.

MEHMUD WAZU (Kashmiri; b. 1834, d. 1924) has composed many 'ghazals' and 'vatsuns' in his own individualistic style. His verse has come down to us mostly through oral tradition, maintained and preserved by professional amateur singers generally, who happened to be his devotees. Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture, and Languages has paid due attention to the preservation and printing of the mystic and other variegated Kashmiri poetic treasure from its very inception in 1958. Mehmud's mastery over prosody is evident from his poetic compositions which include vatsuns in particular and ghazals in general. He explored new areas of poetic contents and that may be the reason why the popularity of his songs still continues. His poem, 'Come, I will sing thee a lullaby', obviously points to the loss of the most dear and young one to the poet, maybe his own self, resulting in an elegy 'vatsun', which has undoubtedly become the most popular song. His verbal felicity and spontaneity are refreshing. His poetry has an overtone of earthy love, though at places it suggests the mystic treatment of his inner experience.

MEHTA, BABALBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1910, d. 1981) was born in Halvad in Saurashtra. He was highly impressed by the works of Swami Vivekananda and Swami Ramtirthha and the nationalist movement started by Gandhiji. He was a regular reader of Navjivan, a Gujarati weekly edited by Gandhiji and he decided to make reconstruction of villages the goal of his life. After passing the matriculation examination, he joined Gujarat Vidyapith Nationalist University started by Gandhiji and took up the cause of reconstruction of villages. He joined all the nationalist movements from 1930 to 1942, and was sent to jail five times.

He took up the reconstruction of village Masra in Kheda district of Gujarat, and after all sorts of experiences made it an ideal village. His experiences in the village about how he won the affection of the entire village, have been related in his book Marun gawdun (My village) published in 1937. After Gandhiji's death, he joined Vinoba Bhave's 'Bhoodan Movement'.

He wrote 27 books, which include his autobiography, Mari jivan katha (My life story, 1982), Russianun ghadtar (reconstruction of Russia, 1935), Biography of Ravishankar Maharaj, a Gandhian Social Worker (1948), Bhudan gito (Songs of Bhudan) 1952, Bhint patro divora lok shikshan (Mass education through wall papers, 1944), Shil sanchaya (Pen portraits, 1969), Bapune pratape (Influence of Bapu, 1969).

Babalbhai's literary output is based on his long practical work-experience in village reconstruction. His works have a high literary value. His pen portraits depict his keen sense of observation; retain his charm till the end.

MEHTA, CHANDRAVADAN CHIMANLAL (Gujarati; b. 1901), known by the pseudonym 'Chandamama' was born at Surat. He graduated from the Elphinstone College, Bombay, in 1924. He worked in the All India Radio as a Station Director in Bombay and Ahmedabad. After retirement he worked as a professor in the department of drama of M. S. University. He was an editor of the Congress Bulletin. He travelled in different countries to study drama. He was the President of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad during 1978 and 1979. He is the recipient of the Sahitya Akademi Award (1971) on his travelogue Natya Gathariyan and also the Sangeet Natak akademi Award.

He has written poems, drama, autobiography, travelogue, criticism, etc. He is a dramatist of high rank. He deals with the brother-sister relationship in his collection of poems, Ila kavyo (1933) and in a verse tale, Ratan (1937). Yamal (1926), Chandarnan (1935) Chado re shikher Raja Ramana (1975) are his other collections of poems. As a dramatist he leans heavily on farce and satire and aims at stageability. His prestigious dramatic works are Akho (1927), Aaggadi (1933), Hoholika (1957) and Dharagurjari (1968). In Aaggadi he has evoked the world of railways and in Hoholika he has exploited Bhavai, the medieval folk-drama form. From his autobiographical work, Gatharia (1954-1976), in more than nine parts, he emerges as a master prose writer. Lyric ane lagaric (1962) and Natyang (1973) are the principal collections of his critical writings.

MEHTA, DIGISH NANUBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1934) is a Professor of English in the School of Languages of Gujarat University. He was born at Patan in North Gujarat. He had his primary and secondary education at Siddhapur. He graduated in 1953 with English and Psychology. He took his M.A. degree from the University of Leeds (U.K.) in 1968. He was awarded a Ph.D. by Gujarat University for his thesis on T.S. Eliot's poetry.

His experimental short novel, Apano ghadi sang was published in 1962. Following the tradition of Max Beer-bohm, it spins out in a light vein the caricature of the central character, Professor Dhurjati, through devices of wit, irony and satire. He charges, at the same time, his humour with a subtlety of emotions.

He has made his name, however, with Doorna-e-Soor (1970), a collection of personal essays. His intimate tone is highly loaded with allusions from western writers such as Shakespeare, Tennyson, Eliot, Robert Frost and Stephen Spender. He creates inner-scapes. The memory of and nostalgia for his homeland mark his creative prose. Paridhi (1973) is a collection of his critical writings. In collaboration with Harshad Desai, he has written Pashchatya navalkatha which contains the history of the novels of different European languages as well as the appreciative articles on the major western works.

He has published a short biography, Shrimad Rajchandra (1980) in English. His Stephen Spender: a Bibliography: 1928 to 1955 gives the well-known British poet, a proper perspective.

MEHTA, DURGARAM (DAVE, DURGARAM MAMCHHARAM), (Gujarati; b. 1809, d. 1876) was an essayist, social reformer and teacher. After studying at Bombay for some time, he started a school at Surat in 1826 and started teaching. It was here that 'Pustak Prasarak Mandali' was founded. He also founded 'Manavdharmasabha' along with some friends in 1844, and started a printing press. He used to jot down all his ideas and experiences in connection with the field of education and such activities in a sort of diary regularly. Out of this, however, only particulars upto 1.1.1845 are available, on the basis of which Mahipatram prepared Mehtaji Durgaram Manchharamnun jivancharitra. It has been considered as the first available autobiography in Gujarati, though not written as an autobiography. It gives glimpses of the prose-writing of Mehtaji Durgaram.

He had served, for a brief period, at Olpad, and then at Rajkot. In Rajkot, he started 'Gun Grahak Mandali' in 1856, and later on started organisations like 'Vidya-Nivardhak Mandali'. It was under the auspices of this organisation and also the goodwill of Colonel Lang that 'Kathiawar General Library' came into existence which was accommodated in the Bungalow of Colonel Lang, and later on which came to be known as 'Lang Library'. In this manner, Mehtaji Durgaram had accomplished the great task of creating a well-arranged library through meticulous care and deep sense of understanding. From his account-books, Minute-books and explanatory notes on the essays read by him, we get exact information about many facts, all of which are written in his own handwriting.

All these particulars speak of him as a great social reformer. Also he was an accomplished teacher of Mathematics and a profound scholar in subjects like Science and Astronomy. His diaries, reports and autobiographical writings have created for him an important place among the contemporary prose-writers and social reformers.

B.J.

MEHTA, GAGANVIHARI LALLUBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1900) has been an essayist. He passed his B.A. examination from Elphinstone College, Bombay. He went to England and studied under the world famous scholar, Professor Laski. He was the Assistant Editor of the Bombay Chronicle for two years from 1923. He joined the Scindia Steam Navigation Company as Manager in 1926. After 1947 he was appointed High Commissioner in U.S.A. by the Government of India.

His prose-writings like essays and articles are collectively published in volumes like Aakashna pushpo (1923), (2nd Ed. 1961), and Avail gana (1971). In Einstein, vignanno sadhu (1968), he has portrayed the character of Einstein very effectively. Likewise, he has explained with perfect ease the contemplative concept of Thoreau, the world-famous thinker and philosopher, in 'Thoreauni chintan-srishti' (1960). In collaboration with Shri Vadilal Dagli, he has also prepared and published a booklet, titled 'Elchini kamgirir' (1960).

MEHTA, HANSABAHEN JIVRAJBHAI-MEHTA, N. TULAJASHANKAR

MEHTA, HANSABAHEN JIVRAJBHAI (Gujarati; b. 1897), is a translator and dramatist. She passed her B.A. examination in 1918. She was also awarded the degree of D. Litt. She was always deeply interested in educational and administrative works. She served for many years as the Vice Chancellor of Maharaj Sayajirao University of Baroda.

Her great mastery and skill as a translator are reflected in her verse for verse translations of Bal-kand, Ayodhya-kand, Aranya-kand, Kishkindha-kand, Yuddha-kand and Sunder-kand of the Valmikiya Ramayana; and likewise, in her translations of plays such as Hamlet (2nd ed. 1955) and Moliere-na be natako. Tran natako and Himalya-swaroop ane beeja natako are also among her notable works which deserve our special attention.

Golibarni musafari Part 1 and 2, is the Gujarati version of the well-known book of Jonathan Swift, and Baviana parakramo (1929) is a similar book translated into Gujarati by her.

Her books bear testimony to her sense of understanding and her narrative skill. In collaboration with Sitanashu Yashchandra and C.C. Mehta, she edited the Ketlak dekho (1979). Among the books she edited are Dahapani dookan and Aathmi koonchi.

She had a mastery over the 'anushtup' metre. Her capacity to recreate the original sentiment in the translation and the lucidity of her prose are the outstanding characteristics of her creative abilities. For these reasons she holds a prominent position among the women writers in Gujarati.

MEHTA, LAJJARAM SHARMA (Hindi; b. 1863, d. 1931) was born at Bundi in Rajasthan. It is said he was born after a phenomenal period of 18 months in his mother's womb, as recorded by Menaria in his Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya. This may have caused him life-long ailments like piles, chronic cough and heart trouble. He hardly received any formal education, but acquired a workable knowledge of English, Sanskrit, Hindi, Marathi and Gujarati as a result of his own personal effort. He first served at a cloth-dealer's establishment then as a teacher at a school, and later served on the editorial staff of Venkateswara Samachar, Bombay. Nothing kept him long, and he returned to Bundi in 1903 to enter the service of Maharaj Raja Raghuvir Singh.

Lajja Ram Sharma was a staunch follower of the Sanatan Dharm and, in keeping with the character of the age, an idealist to the core. Amongst his creative works, two novels viz., Swatantra Rambha aur partantra Lakshmi and Dhurta Rasiklal earned him a name. According to the author himself, Dhurta Rasiklal was an extremely instructive social novel, a 'warning against self seekers' who ditch people to serve their own ends. It is a curious phenomenon for the age that the title of the novel should revolve round the character of a villain. Swatantra Rambha aur partantra Lakshmi is a contrastive study of two women that grow in two different cultures. Rambha, brought up in the permissive social setup of the West presents a study in contrast with her sister Lakshmi, brought up in the culture and tradition of India. Though rated highly because of their historical importance, these novels are, in fact, commonplace compositions, and Ramchandra Shukla summed them up rightly when he remarked that their author "was more of a newsman than a novelist."

His total tally is 23 works out of which 13 are novels. Prominent amongst them, besides the two already mentioned, are Chhut charitra, Sharabi ki kharabi, Vichitra stree charitra, Birbal Vinod, Hindu Grihastha, Adarsh dampati, and Adarsh Hindu.

MEHTA, MOHANLAL TULSIDAS (Gujarati; b. 1910, d. 1985) was a Gujarati journalist and writer better known by his pseudonym 'Sopan'. He studied only up to seventh class. He could not study further because he joined the freedom struggle. He was sent to jail thrice. He started writing during imprisonment. Antarini Vato (1935) is his first book. He was married to Labhuben (1939), daughter of the veteran nationalist and journalist Amrit Lal Sheth. Initially he worked in some commercial firms and subsequently started his own business. He worked for the Janamabhoomi group of newspapers for 22 years. He edited a monthly magazine Akhandanand and then established a publishing house called 'Bharati Sahitya Sangh'. He was associated with the journals Urmi and Navarachna. Later on after leaving them, he started his own organization called 'Jeevan Sahitya Mandir', and started the Pratima, a monthly and the Pravasi, a weekly. Later he started two periodicals called the Sukani and the Abhinav Bharati. He has written more than fifty books that include novels, collections of short stories, essays, book reviews, articles on politics, etc.

MEHTA, NANDASHANKAR TULAJASHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1835, d. 1905) has been a harbinger of Gujarati novel. Nandashankar had studied upto matriculation. Starting his career as a school teacher, he became the principal of a teachers' training college. Later, he was absorbed in the civil services, and he served in several princely states of Gujarat in various capacities, rising to become Dewan of Kutch. After retirement from active service, he settled down in Surat.

Surat was the first town in western India to come in a close contact with the Britishers. Education on Western pattern and a movement for social reform took roots quite early in Surat. Nandashankar benefitted from this. He had the privilege of studying English literature under some excellent British teachers and read Shakespeare, Macauley, Dickens, Thackeray, Walter Scott and Bulwer Lytton.

Nandashankar was also attracted towards the movement for social reforms led by the poet Narmdashankar Dave, Durgaram Mehtaji, Karasandas Mulaji, Mahipatram Nilakanth and others. However, Nandashankar, unlike some of his friends, was a moderate.

Nandashankar's literary reputation was built on his only work Karana Ghelo.

When he wrote Karana Ghelo at the age of 30, Nandashankar was working in the education department. The impact of Russell, prompted Nandashankar to write a novel in Gujarati on the western model, particularly with a view to prescribe it as a much needed text in the schools.

Nandashankar was deeply influenced by the novelists Scott and Bulwer and by the prose style of Macauley. He has also borrowed heavily from Rasa Mala a history of Gujarat originally written in English by Alexander Kinloch Forbes. He has also incorporated some contemporary incidents into the historic fabric and has displayed his zeal for social reforms.

MEHTA, NARASINGH (Gujarati; b. 1408, d. 1475) was born in Talaja, in Bhavnagar district, in a family of Nagar Brahmins. He has himself sung of some of the events of his life, the most crucial being that of leaving home on being taunted by the elder brother's wife as 'good-for-nothing'. He went to the forest for penance and propitiated Lord Shiva, who, transporting him to Dwarka, showed him Rasalila, the sportful dance of Krishna with the Gopis (cowherd women) in Vrindavan. Returning home, he thanked the brother's wife for being instrumental in his inner enrichment and started to live on his own. But he soon shifted to Junagadh, a better centre for religious pursuits, situated at the foot of Girnar. A god-drunk man always surrounded by kindred souls, Narasingh could not properly attend to his worldly duties. The Nagar community ridiculed him and even spurned him when he not only honoured an invitation from the so-called untouchables for a night of devotional songs, but also capped it with the sharing of 'prasada', eatables offered to the Lord. He is said to have spent the evening of his life at the nearby port, Mangrol.

The earliest manuscript containing his work belongs to 1612. Only one of his autobiographical works Harshamenang pado, (Songs of the garland-time), gives 1512 as the date of the event. Narasingh not only uses phrases from Jayadeva, but also bases his 'Chaturio' on the Gitagovinda. He refers to Namdev (1270-1350) and Kabir (b. 1399). There however is no reference to Vallabhacharya (1478-1530) or his work, even though he sings of the soul's devotion for God in terms of sublimated man-woman relationship of love, which is the core of Vallabha's teaching. It would be safer to conclude that Narasingh flourished during the first three quarters of the 15th century.

Narasingh is both a poet of erotic mysticism as well as a poet of knowledge par excellence. His predecessors, Namdev and Kabir, poets of knowledge, do not indulge in erotic mysticism. Narasingh seems to have tapped some pre-Vallabha source for his devotional poetry that is suffused with erotic love, maybe, some tradition then extant in Western India. Maybe, he himself evolved a devotional idiom under the influence of Jayadeva on the one hand and of Srimad Bhagvata on the other, the former accounting for the sensual overtones and the latter for the ardent sublimated love in his work. Narasingh refers to Rukmini in Vivaha as Krishna's consort, which is in tune with the tradition in Marathi and languages of the South, but soon Radha becomes the central figure in Chaturio and the love lyrics as in Jayadeva's Gitagovinda.

There are about sixteen hundred padas known as those of Narasingh. They fall into four sections: Autobiographical narratives, other narratives, lyrics inspired by Krishna, the lover and the child, and meditative lyrics.

Much of Narasingh's work remains to be critically edited. The language of songs preserved orally went on changing from time to time. The manuscripts give the genitive affix ca, co, ce, which, according to Narasimharao Divatia, Gujarati seems to share with Marathi till the 16th century. Some Marathi phrases found in Harshamenang pado show that he was conversant with the language, maybe, through devotee's songs.

The main autobiographical narratives are Vivaha (Marriage of his son Shamalsha), Mamerung (The celebration of the first child-bearing of his daughter Kungvarbai), Hungdi ('The draft' issued to pilgrims by a merchant in Dwarka) and Harshamenang pado (The songs of the garland-time). The sovereign influence on the spiritual shaping of Narasingh has been that of the vision of Krishna's Rasalila, which is picturesquely described in the first eight padas of Vivaha. 'Is it true or a dream?'—he asks himself. Maybe, during the three months, he was absent from home, he might have moved with religious groups and seeing some performance of Rasalila, got the overwhelming vision which was to metamorphose his life in two ways. In experiencing the ecstasy of the Rasalila, 'the awareness of being a male disappeared. I began singing along with the Gopis as one of them'. Then on Narasingh was to lead the life of the spirit. Had not Krishna introduced him to queen Rukmini as 'one like me?' The other change was, 'then awoke my primordial speech, which was asleep'. His soul started pouring forth song after song.

It is likely that financial help might have come to Narasingh from some well-to-do devotees of Krishna in the hour of difficulty. The poet likes to project, with the aid of symbols, the abounding grace of the Lord, never in any way detrimental to his self-respect. In fact, in Vivaha, those endowed with divine sight, see Vishnu in Narasingh and Lakshmi in his wife Manekbai. In Mamerung and Hungdi, however, the Lord appears in human form as a merchant. The touch of the miracle is unavoidable in Harshamenang pado. The king of Junagadh held up Narasingh on a night refusing to take him as anything but a fraud and a rake unless the Lord's image garlanded him. Narasingh went on imploring Krishna passionately, sometimes chidingly, in song after song, till he was garlanded before daybreak. On another night of devotional songs, when he was served by a lady with drinking water, he had a vision of Vishnu in the garb of Mohini (the enchantress who went round with the pot of nectar acquired during the churning of the ocean) and burst out into a few charming songs addressed to her.

His two songs about the visit to the houses of untouchables, houses are extremely touching in their forthrightness. As the Nagar Brahmins condemned him for his action, Narasingh defiantly sang, 'We are such, indeed, we are such, as you say we are'. He refers to the untouchables as Harijan (Men of God), a term popularised by Mahatma Gandhi after 1932.

Of the other narratives, Sudama charitra is a well-structured piece in nine padas with the play of irony on the frequently used term 'mitra' (friend). The diction has a directness and serenity. Chaturio gives in 25 padas, in the first ten a la Jayadeva, the sports of Krishna and Gopis in Vrindavan. Danlila presents a vivid picture of the boy Krishna and his companions, taking out the cows for grazing and the appearance of Radha as a cosmic phenomenon. On being asked by Krishna to pay duty on her curds, she does not yield and rather coaxes him into playing on the flute. The language is so simple and limpid and the rhythm so captivating, that even illiterate village-people know it by heart and love to recite it.

Songs inspired by the love for Krishna mark out Narasingh as a master lyricist. The human soul is the Gopi, who dedicates beauty, love and all in an ecstatic union with the Lord. Narasingh sings uninhibitedly of this dedication and union. 'Due to what merit am I born a woman? To have Hari as a poor supplicant before me! One cannot get even a moment's glimpse of Hari by performing sacrifices or through yoga, meditation, penance, or physical suffering. That Hari one can see with the eye of love.' The Gopi is aware of the price of such a love: 'One who is in love with you, loses memory of all loves'. She is equally aware of the reward: 'On seeing Hari, we become like Hari. Narasingh's song about the cowherd woman taking around Krishna in her head-pot 'for sale' is a gem of mystic utterance inviting as it does all fellow-beings to taste the essence of the whole universe, the divine spirit. The poet captures a variety of moods of the yearning soul and projects them in a Gopi-Krishna context.

Songs about the child Krishna deal with popular themes: 'O mother, give me that moon to play with.' Nagdaman, the subjugation of the great serpent', has been popular because of the dexterity in taking the consecutive shots of the whole scene described with colloquial language, dramatic climax, surging rhythm and implicit irony. Variants of this song are available in other dialects and languages.

It is the Prabhatiyang (The morning hymns) that has made Narasingh's name a household word. Barring a few devotional hymns, they are affirmations of the one Ultimate Reality, which he, of course, names as Krishna. 'O Hari, you are one alone in the whole universe; you appear numberless through different forms.' He has no doubt that 'all spiritual pursuit is false if one does not realize the truth, that is the self'. It is suggested that Narasingh switched over to the song of the One, after migrating in his old age to Mangrol, maybe, under the influence of Sufism. For all one knows, he presents the nondualistic ideas of the Upanishads through the medium of Krishna: 'Just look, who is going round whirling in the cosmic expanse, uttering the sound, 'That I am', 'That I am'! In a sublime image the poet articulates the vision of the Ultimate Reality as child-Krishna, 'playing joyfully and swinging in a cradle of gold', by presenting before our eyes the picture of the sun, bright with the lustre of a million, appearing on the horizon, the very embodiment Sat-Chit-Anand (Being-Consciousness-Bliss), that pervades all space, but 'is caught hold of by saints in the subtle mesh of love'. He affirms the one reality: 'On waking up, I look around, the world does not appear. In sleep there appeared queer objects of enjoyment. The play of the mind is nothing but pure consciousness'. The poet describes the grand spectacle in a very original disarming manner: 'It is only Brahma dancing before Brahma.'

Narasingh has a few didactic poems, which are no less popular. The one on old age describes how 'the threshold is turned into a hill, the village outskirts a foreign land'. Vaishnava jana to tene re kahie (Him we may very well call a Vaishnav), popularised by Mahatma Gandhi throughout India is more than a listing up of moral qualities because of a spiritual fervour in the tone.

Narasingh is a supreme singer of lyrics of love. His ample resourcefulness in language, rhythm and image and intimacy of love lend his lyrics a unique charm. Rarely has a poet sung of such a variety of the shades of feminine feelings with such delicacy and ardour in a colloquial idiom which defies translation. His poetic creativity reaches the peak in the lyrics of knowledge through love. The feeling of oneness with the divine is articulated in this group of poems with a serenity and sublimity all its own.

Narasingh is called the 'adi-kavi' (first poet) of Gujarati. Though not the first, Gujarati having already started its career by Hemachandracharya's time in the twelfth century, he is undoubtedly the first major poet. One is amazed at the ease and confidence with which he explored the potentialities of his mother tongue. After he used it, his native language became a powerful medium of expression.

Narasingh Mehta belongs to that small band of immortal singers, who as both promoters as well as mouthpieces of the phenomenal Bhakti movement in medieval India, have enriched their own tongues beyond measure and produced some work, which would be a part of world's devotional literature.

MEHTA NARESH (Hindi; b.1922), a poet, dramatist and novelist, was born at Shajapur in Malwa (M.P.). His original name was Purnashankar Shukla. He did his M.A. from Banaras Hindu University, Varanasi, and worked for sometime at the All India Radio. He edited the magazines, Kriti and Sahityakar. His name is associated with 'Nai Kavita' and he came to light as a poet of Dusra Saptak.

Naresh Mehta has exploited the classical diction, style, and expression of Sanskrit to express new sensibility. His concern for reality is blended happily with his romantic sensibility, reflected in such poems as 'Vana pakhi suno', 'Samaya ka bhikshu', 'Punah bhikshu'. He has responded to the disorganized aspects of social life also.

His poems 'Sanshaya ki raat' and 'Mahaprasthan' are based on primordial myths. While 'Sanshiya ki raat' expresses the inner conflict in Ram, 'Mahaprasthan' reveals the desire for the liberation of mankind.

His novel Dubata mastool is remarkable for its thematic and stylistic aspects. It depicts in detail the atrocities committed on a woman. In another novel Yah path bandha tha we find a powerful interaction between an individual and his environment. The changing patterns of human relationship, politico-social institutions, hollowness of economic systems, all of them are exposed vehemently through individuals. In Dhumketu:ek shruti, the formative influences shaping the personality of the child, Udayan, have been analysed.

Among his plays Khandit yatraren is, perhaps, the most remarkable, where all the characters are incomplete entities and all journeys of life, especially of the bourgeois class, are broken off.

His Aranya, a collection of thirty-three poems, won him the Sahitya Akademi award for 1989. The book opens a new vista of experience for the reader. The theme here is poetry itself, and the poems included have a depth which is both intellectual and emotional.

Mehta has published over thirty books till now, including seven novels, two plays, three collections of short stories, two books on criticism, and some thirteen collections of poems.

MEHTA, NARMADASHANKAR DEVSHANKAR (Gujarati; b. 1871, d. 1939) was an eminent writer and historian of philosophy, and a very able administrator.

He was born in Ahmedabad. He graduated from the Bombay University in 1894, standing first in Sanskrit, and winning the coveted 'Bhau Daji' prize and the 'Dakshina' fellowship. He, however, did not pursue academic studies further and joined government service as a clerk. His extraordinary ability and love for study enabled him to rise to the position of Commissioner of the Bombay Municipal Corporation, a post usually reserved for senior I.C.S. officers. In 1931, the title of Diwan Bahadur was conferred on him by the then government for his distinguished work. After retirement from government service he was appointed the Diwan of Khambat for about two years. In 1934, he suffered a paralytic stroke which caused his death five years later.

His Hind tattvagnanno itihas (History of Indian Philosophy) is a monumental work which preceded the work in this field of Dasgupta and Radhakrishnan. Upanishad vicharana (Thoughts on the Upanishads) and Shakta sampradaya (The Shakta cult), are his other noteworthy contributions.

Besides these and other books, he contributed about a hundred scholarly articles to various magazines. He wrote both in English and Sanskrit.

MEHTA, RAMA (English, b. 1923, d. 1978) was born at Nainital. After having graduated from Lucknow University she took her M.A. degree in Philosophy from the University of Delhi. She also studied Psychology and Sociology in American Universities. She joined the Indian Foreign Service in 1949 but resigned in 1951 and went to live with her husband abroad who had gone there on a foreign assignment. Rama Mehta was widely travelled and received academic honours from various institutions for her valuable contributions to many Indian and foreign journals on her special subjects of study. She also lectured in foreign Universities. Among the Indian English writers she is known mainly as a novelist. Though her works in the genre are only three novels, such as, Ramu, Life of Keshav and Inside the Haveli, the quality of her writing makes her out as a distinguished writer. Inside the Haveli which earned for her the Sahitya Akademi award in 1979 deals with the traditional Indian life with a rare insight and a fine sense of character and environment. She used a style of writing which was both vivid and evocative.

MEHTA, RANJITRAM VAVABHAI-MEHTA, SITANSHU YASHASCHANDRA

MEHTA, RANJITRAM VAVABHAI (Gujarati; b. 1871, d. 1917) was the founder of two major literary institutions in Gujarat. He was a great lover of literature. After graduation, he worked for some time as the headmaster of a school in Umaretha, Gujarat. He died at the age of 46, when he was tragically drowned in the sea off the Juhu beach in Bombay. The well known political thinker Ashok Mehta was his son.

In 1898, along with some other friends, Ranjitram founded 'Social and Literary Associations' in Ahmedabad. As the name suggests, the institution was engaged in social and literary activities. After some time the word 'Social' was dropped both from its name and activities, and in 1904 the Association was renamed as 'Gujarati Sahitya Sabha'. Over the years, Gujarat Sahitya Sabha has blossomed into a busy centre of literary activity of Gujarat.

Under the auspices of this institution, Ranjitram convened the first conference of Gujarati literature in 1905. This was the first session of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. It was presided over by Govardhanram Madhavram Tripathi one of the foremost men of letters of Gujarat. Holding of such sessions became an annual affair and after some years the Parishad delinked itself from the parent body and came into its own.

Ranjitram was a first-rate orator and a keen student of history, literature and folk traditions of Gujarat. The collections of his essays, short stories and other writings were published posthumously.

Since 1925, Gujarat Sahitya Sabha has instituted Ranjitram Suvarna Karandak in his memory.

MEHTA, SHARDA SUMANT (Gujarati; b. 1882, d. 1970) was a translator and essayist. She passed her B.A. examination in 1901 and then joined her elder sister, Vidyabahen, in her social service.

Among her translation works, mention may be made of Sudhasasini (1907), a translation of the novel The Lake of Palms written by Romesh Chandra Dutt, in which she collaborated with Vidyabahen; and translation of another novel, Varnane Kanthe, written by Sathe Annabhau. Both these novels bear ample testimony to her skill and ability as a translator. She has also portrayed the life of the world-famous Florence Nightingale in Florence Nightingalenun jivancharitra (1906). In Jivan-Sambharna (1938), she has described the reminiscences of the fiftyfive years of her own life with a vivid picture of contemporary social, political and historical forces and particulars regarding awakening of women, and therefore, it is of a unique significance. Sambharna, Pt. 1,2 (1955-1956) is a volume which she has prepared in collaboration with Pushkar Chandawarker.

Puranoni bal-bodhak vartao ane balakonun gruh-shikshan (1905) is a book aiming at shaping and moulding the life of children through the stories. Likewise, 'Hindustanna samajik jivanman streenun sthan' (1911), her book with Vidyabahen is on social service activities for women.

MEHTA, SITANSHU YASHASCHANDRA (Gujarati, b. 1941) is a poet of the sixties with extra-ordinarily high creative faculty. He is the pioneer and in fact the doyen of the surrealist style in Gujarati and has introduced a rich and new vein of creativity. He explores the sub-conscious in the true surrealist fashion. The depths of the mind are laid bare in his poems in a totally new light, almost at a magical level. But he does not accept a total submission to mental promptings—a fact which is clear from his anthology entitled Odysseus-nu-Halesu. Writers on rhetoric are fond of contrasting the two cults, Apollo and Dionysus symbolising the logos and the mythos. If one were to adopt this dichotomy one could say that Sitanshu invokes both of them.

In his poems, theme does not become the slave of language. It remains the master, like the master equestrian controlling his steed. Effective expression is achieved without sacrificing the basic unity. Though flirtation with chance is central to his themes, his poems have the imprint of grace of style and felicity of expression. He accomplishes his poetic task by conscious strategies and sub-conscious mechanism. He is a clever technician, both of the phrase and syntax. Form and substance operate together in unison to enable him, and along with him, the reader to reach the intended destination. His collection of poems entitled 'Odysseus-un-Halesu' received two prestigious awards, the Nanalal Award and the Gujarat State Award, and is now on the syllabus for M.A. classes in two universities of Gujarat. His anthology Bomaby is a surrealist reportage of an investigation of urban existence. A significant poem emerges from a traumatic urban experience and expands at various levels. In the cluster of poems on the Magan, one can discern tough irony and black humour.

But this first phase of mainly surrealist poetry is soon followed by a richer and more luxuriant phase which is illustrated by his most ambitious long poem 'Mohenjo daro' (Sanskriti, August 1979) now available in cassette.

MEHTA, SUMANT BATUKRAM-MEMON, MUHAMMAD SIDIQ

Its structure is complex, almost labyrinth-like; with the aid of appropriate syntactic, semantic and phonetic effects, he creates a vivid picture of modern world and urban consciousness almost like a kaleidoscope. The poem, as it were takes possession of our minds with its verbal foliage. The disorientation of subjects, distortion of events and condensation of dream create so many small replicas of the modern urban world.

Having exhausted the landscape of surrealism, his ebullient imagination encompasses newer pastures. In the second phase of his poetry, there are no supra-normal structures and all are purely internal models. In 'Jatayu', his second major poem (Sangna, July 1976), he offers a refreshingly new interpretation of the character from the Ramayana. Keeping the tragedy of Rama in the background, he puts Jatayu in the forefront and much like a stage technician employing visual effects to magnify what needs to be magnified, he makes this subsidiary character occupy the front of the stage.

Sitanshu has made drama and dramatics his own. Amongst the younger scholars of Gujarati, he is perhaps the most learned in the subject of dramatics. He has given lectures on the drama from ancient India and Greece to the present day at different places. He is the author of three very popular plays in Gujarati, namely, Aa manas Madrasi lage chhe, Kem Makanji kyan chalya and Grahan.

His adaptations in Gujarati from Thomas Hardy's novel and Peter Shaffer's drama are extraordinarily brilliant. Literary criticism has not been alien to him either. His first collection of essays in literary criticism is Simankan ane Simollanghan. Aesthetics has especially appealed to him. He has presented papers on aesthetics and on the theory of literature at various conferences in India and abroad. The insight shown by him in his works on aesthetics and literary criticism is penetrating. His work on the theory of literature Ramaniyata-no vag vikalpa was recently (1980) awarded the Ramprasad Bakshi Award of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad as the most outstanding work of literary criticism.

He holds a Doctorate in comparative literature from Indiana University (U.S.A.) and a Doctorate in Aesthetics from the University of Bombay and his collection of poems Jatayu was chosen for the Sahitya Akademi Award of 1987.

MEHTA, SUMANT BATUKRAM (Gujarati; b. 1877, d. 1968) was born at Surat and had his school education at Vadodara. He received his training in health education in London. During 1903 and 1921, he was in Health Department of the Baroda state. In 1914 he left his medical practice and as a social worker involved himself in economic, political and social problems of Gujarat. He was an editor of the monthly Ugdharma.

His numerous articles edited by Ranna Prabhudas Patwari are collected and arranged in four parts in Samajdarpan (1964). They are live notes on persons, places and problems. His Atmakatha (1971) is the autobiography of a person who along with his life story offers his contribution to the Indian history in general and history of modern Gujarat in particular. It also contains the cultural history of the past three generations.

C.T.

MEHTA, YASHODHAR (Gujarati; b. 1909), has written thirtyfive books which include novels, short stories, travelogues, dramas and philosophical essays in lighter vein. His first novel Sarijati reti (Slippery sand) in early fifties brought him to limelight. It was a highly controversial novel because of depiction of uninhibited eroticism. It was banned. But when the second part of the novel was published people were surprised to see that mundane characters presented in the first part of the novel reach the supreme height of spiritual regeneration. His other novel Maharatri (Great night) deals with mysteries of yoga. Like Maugham's Razor's edge, it depicts the link between this life and the life beyond. For his historical novels like Tungnath, Mohamad Gazni and Vahijati Jhila, he has chosen history of Kashmir as the background, showing good knowledge of history as there is realistic portrayal of native people, command over depiction of conflicts and freshness of dialogues. In his short stories in Prem Ganga (Ganges of love), he has selected love episodes from mythology and history, and in Rasananda (sentimental pleasure) he has for the first time in Gujarati short stories drawn on the sources of para-psychology. In his four dramatic works: Ranchhodlal ane bijan natako (Ranchhodlal and other plays), Ghelo Babal (Mad Babal), Mambo jambo and Samarpn (Offering), the first one won the first prize in All India Radio dramatic competition, the second and third are social plays dealing with human weakness for sex, etc., while the fourth one deals with an episode in Moghul history. His travelogues Nadio ane nagaro (Rivers and cities), and Chumalis ratrio (Fortyfour nights) describe historical background, landscapes, land and people in a lighter vein, which provide interesting reading. His philosophical essays which have been compiled in three volumes Agam nigam (Mysteries), Anand dhara (Stream of happiness), and Sakshatkarne raste (On the way to realisation) indicate his insight into spiritual experience. He has written two books on astrology also.

MEMON, MUHAMMAD SIDIQ (Sindhi; b. 1890, d. 1958) was a Sindhi educationist and prose-writer. He was an eminent Muslim scholar who devoted his life to the uplift of the Sindhi Muslims and the development of Sindhi literature. Memon was the Principal of Training College for Men and the Secretary of Sindh Muslim Adabi Society (established by him in 1931) in Hyderabad Sindh. Under the auspices of the society, he published many standard works in Sindhi on literature, history and Muslim religion. Besides, he took keen interest in the spread of modern education among Muslim women of Sindh. Memon has written about twenty books in Sindhi among which Sindhu ji adabi tarikha (History of Sindhi literature, in two volumes, the first published in 1937 and the second one in 1951 from Hyderabad Sindh) is an important contribution to the Sindhi literature. In the first volume the author has described the development of Sindhi language and literature from early times upto the conquest of Sindh by the British. The second volume deals with the growth of literature mainly during the last century (1843-1900). Memon, being the Principal of the Training College, was fortunate enough to have access to various manuscripts and early publications of Sindhi and other languages preserved in private collections and government libraries. Thus, he has given basic information regarding the development of the Sindhi literature which has proved to be of great help to all succeeding writers on the subject. Of course, the work being a pioneering effort of its kind in Sindhi, lacks in scientific analysis of the collected data and mainly concentrates upon enlisting individual writers and their works. Memon wrote many books for academic purposes which include works on history and geography of Sindh and essays on moral instructions to children and women. He wrote some poems on national and Islamic subjects, but they hardly left any imprint on the literature. In the field of literary criticism, his editions of Risalo Shah Latif (1951) and Diwan Sangi (1952), both published from Hyderabad Sindh, are worth mentioning. No doubt, it is mainly due to his history of Sindhi literature that Memon acquired a prominent place in Sindhi literature.

MENARIYA, MOTILAL (Rajasthani; b. 1905, d. 1979) was born at Udaipur, Rajasthan, and obtained his M.A., Ph.D. and Sahitya Vachaspati degrees. While acting as the Superintendent of the famous 'Saraswati Bhandar Library', he prepared a catalogue of the manuscripts available in the Bhandar. He was the pioneer among the scholars who devoted themselves to the cause of Rajasthani language and literature. He has about half a dozen research works to his credit, besides some others of general character. His important publications relating to Rajasthani are: Rajasthani bhasha aur sahitya, Rajasthani sahitya ki ruprekha and Dingal mein vir rasa. All these publications have been very highly spoken of by critics in the field. Rajasthan ka Pingal sahitya was the subject of his Ph.D., now published in book form. He was the first scholar to edit the well-known text of Halan Jhalan ra kundaliya. Essentially being a scholar concerned with manuscripts and editing of old texts, he did a commendable job in preparing a search report on the manuscripts available in Rajasthan. It has been published under the title Rajasthan mein hastalikhith granthon ki khoj, Part I. Another equally prominent work of his is Dictionary of Prithviraj Raso, which is still unpublished. During active government service, he was deputed as the first Director of Rajasthan Sahitya Academy, housed in Udaipur. In his capacity as Director, he also represented the Academy at the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi. After retirement, he joined the Rajasthan Vidyapith, Udaipur as honorary editor of its research journal, Shodh patrika. This institute of standing, now enjoying a University status, conferred the title of 'Sahitya Chudamani' on Menariya. His miscellaneous works include Glimpses of Mewar (English), Mewar ki vibhutiyan (Hindi) and Rajprashasti (an old Sanskrit text). Menariya stands unique for his scholarly contribution to the renaissance of Rajasthani studies.

MENEZES, ARMANDO (English, b. 1902), a noted poet, had a brilliant academic career. He graduated from St. Xavier's College, Bombay, in 1924, winning several distinctions. Besides English, Menezes is well-versed in Latin, French and Portuguese. He entered Bombay Educational Service and worked at St. Xavier's College, Bombay, for some time. He worked also as Under Secretary in the Education Department in the Bombay Secretariat, as Member-Secretary of the Karnatak University Committee and as Principal at different places such as Visnagar, Kolhapur, etc. He joined Karnatak University, Dharwar, as Professor and Head of the Department of English (1958). He retired from service from the same place.

Menezes tried his hand at several genres: poetry, drama, essay. As a poet, he is traditional, following mostly the conventional forms and structures. Within these forms, however, he achieves, quite often, notable success. There is also a remarkable thematic variety: it ranges from reflections on the nature of poetry ('The Poet's Beauty') to science and art ('Science and Art'), love and beauty ('Ode to Beauty', 'Contraries', 'Maid in Waiting') nature ('Sunsets at Dharwar') religion ('To Christ in the Eucharist'), nationalism ('Thirteenth January', 'Freedom', 'Tashkent', 'Nehru', 'Gandhi'). He also wrote The Fund (1923), a mock-epic, The Emigrant

MENTHA

(1933), a satire, Caste, a social comedy, Lighter Than Air, (1958), a collection of broadcast talks. His prose collection contains evaluations of writers such as Blake, Sarojini Naidu, Harindranath Chatterjee, etc.

MENTHA (Sanskrit). Closely associated with the poet-king Matrigupta of Kashmir is the creative artist Mentha, the writer of the court-epic Hayagrivavadha which, though not available in a complete form, has been quoted frequently by literary critics and has constituted at times the content of an animated discussion in regard to treatment of plot and characterisation. In his endeavour to describe the reaction which the epic Hayagrivavadha produced in the mind of the royal patron, Kalhana presents a beautiful story. It is said that when Mentha read out his new poem to Matrigupta, he did not utter even a single appreciative word. Sad in heart, Mentha proceeded to tie the manuscript, but before he placed his manuscript down, the king placed a golden plate under it as a mark of great appreciation for the epic and profound respect for its creator. Mentha experienced celestial joy, but being a poet, he considered the gift of gold as redundant not being necessary for creation of poetry (Rajatarangini, Chapter III. verses 260-262).

The Sharangadharapaddhati ascribes the well-known verse: "Limpativa tamangani varshativanjanam navah/ Asatpurusha seveva drishtirviphalatam gata" to Vikramaditya and Mentha jointly, giving rise to the conjecture that Mentha was first associated with the court of Harsha Vikramaditya, father of Shiladitya of the first half of sixth century A.D. and then when Matrigupta was installed as the king of Kashmir, he got himself attached to the new King's court. Many references to poet Mentha are available in the writings of other poets, especially Rajashekhar. One such verse of Rajashekhar praises the embellishment of Vakrokti employed by Mentha and says that being struck by the Vakroktis of Mentha, which resemble the instruments to curb the elephants, the poet-tuskers shake their heads (as a mark of appreciation of the splendor of the literary figure). The verse runs as follows:

Vakroktya mentharajasya vahantya shrinirupatam/
Abiddha iva dhunvanti murdhanam Kavikunjarah.

Another verse occurring in the prologue of the drama Balaramayana records Rajashekhar as an incarnation of that genius which appeared first as Valmiki then as Bhartrementa and thereafter as Bhavabhuti. The verse running as:

Babhuva Valmukabhavah pura kavih
Tatah prapede bhuvi Bhartrementhatam/
Sthitah punaryo Bhavabhutirekhaya
Sa vartate samprati Rajashekharah gives rise to the conjecture that like Valmiki, Bhavabhuti and Rajashekhar, Mentha also wrote a poem or drama on the story of the Ramayana, a work, which unfortunately has been lost. In his Kavyamimamsa, Rajashekhar has yet a third reference to Mentha, where it is said that Bhartrementa was tested in the city of Ujjain along with Kalidasa, Bharavi, Harichandra, Chandragupta and others, a reference, in which Mentha and Kalidasa are mentioned in the same compound, implying thereby that the first is as great as the second.

Bhartrementa has to his credit the famous Mahakavya Hayagrivavadha, which is quoted frequently by later rhetoricians, including Mammata, Rajashekhar, Bhoja and Hemachandra. These quotations and references indicate that Mentha is as much a master of Rasa as of Vakrokti and that he is an expert in the art of making poetic figures internal textures in the structure of poetry. The technique adapted by the poet in presenting the characters in this epic forms the subject matter of an animated discussion and all this goes to show the vast popularity of the epic. The whole of the first canto of this poem is given to a description of the demon Hayagriva, who is slain ultimately by Vishnu. Hemachandra finds fault with this and says that the unimportant accessory should not have been over-delineated (Kavyanushasana). The commentator Ramachandra however, differs from his teacher on this point; he does not find any Rasa dosha here. Following the principle indicated by Dandin that it is better for the literary artist to describe at length the prowess of the enemy and to extol the hero by saying that the hero won such an enemy, Ramachandra defends Mentha, and says that the poet has done his job quite satisfactorily by over-developing the qualities of the enemy.

The Subhashitavali of Vallabhadeva; Subhashitaratnakosha of Vidyakara and Saduktikarnamrita of Shridharadasa cite a few verses attributed to Mentha, and there is no evidence to find out whether any one of them forms part of Hayagrivavadha. Two verses quoted in Saduktikarnamrita paint the images of elephants caught from the slopes of Vindhya mountain, and try to depict the anguish experienced by them due to separation from the familiar surroundings. These verses are probably responsible for the name 'Hastipaka' given to Mentha. They also give credence to the belief that the literary artist was engaged in the pursuit of catching wild elephants and taming them thereafter. All these indicate that Bhartrementa was a great literary figure of ancient India, whose approach and technique constituted the content of an animated discus-

MERE RAMA KA MUKUT BHING RAHA HAI (Hindi) is a collection of Vidyanis Mishra's essays, representative of creative prose writing in Hindi today. In these essays the creative power springs from a sensitive grasp of mass culture. The essays fall in the category of 'Lalit hibandha', and are animated by a rich flavour of the folk elements. The 'I' of these essays is not an exclusive 'I' as in the West, but absorbs mass consciousness and becomes 'we'. We have therefore, an 'integrated' view of life, a free movement of thought and a search for meaning in the ordinary. And all this goes with the pleasure of an intimate chit-chat. The essays which exhibit best these qualities are 'Mukut mekhla aur dharti,' 'Vindhya ke dharti ka vandan,' 'Hoi hain shila sab,' 'Chandramukhi,' 'Meghadut ka sandesh,' 'Ayodhya udasa lagti hai,' 'Radha Madhav ho gayi'. This light-heartedness is intended not to make the subject non-serious, but to establish a personal closeness with the reader. We begin with the ordinary and then the context acquires a larger meaning and significance.

Hazariprasad Dwivedi made the barren land of personal essays fertile, and on this fertile land, Mishra planted his work, Mere Rama ka mukut bhing raha hai. Personal experiences have been interwoven in these essays with strands gathered from varying sources, such as religion, philosophy, mythology, arts. The old stories have been imaginatively re-told, and there is no attempt to superimpose them on the essays. The author is concerned obviously with the onslaught of Western culture on Indian thought. This anxiety is at the centre of such essays as 'Ayodhya udas lagti hai' and 'Mere Rama ka mukut bhing raha hai'.

The aesthetic beauty of the essays is reflected both in its thought and language. Here is no anemia of a bookworm. The personal style of an intimate dialogue brings home the fact that personal essays do not need wide scholarship. They get their creative vitality from their capacity to absorb the pulse and sensitivity of the masses.

MERE SAIYAN JIYO (Punjabi) is a poetic work by Bhai Vir Singh, published in 1953, which won the Sahitya Akademi award in 1955. It was the last major poetic work of Bhai Vir Singh, a father-figure in the modern Punjabi literature. Pulling Punjabi writing out of the traditional moulds and format of the 'Qissas' and 'Janamsakhis', Bhai Vir Singh broke new grounds both in content and in form. He tried vers libre, freed Punjabi poetry from the rigidities of rhyme and introduced what he styled as

'Sirkhandi chhand' in a big way in his 'mahakavya' entitled Rana Surat Singh. Bhai Vir Singh undisputedly marks a turning point in the Punjabi poetic tradition and heralded a new era that ushered in eminent poets like Mohan Singh and Pritam Singh 'Safir', Harbhajan Singh and Jasvant Singh 'Neki'.

Essentially the seeker of spiritual truth and a mystic, one finds that Bhai Vir Singh has 'arrived' in Mere saiyen jiyo. In poem after poem, he talks about his spiritual journey, his longings, his search, his anguish and then his fulfillment. It is his own grace that has blessed him:

Those who love me
Come to my door
Longing for a glimpse;
Those whom I love
I go to them.
Their door is my door.

He had a beatific glimpse of God in the blossom of a rose bud. And he is left wondering how could Almighty be contained in the narrow folds of a flower. It is the wonderment that he shares with his readers. His mouth is closed when he says:

When you take me in your embrace
I am left with no words on my lips.

But it is not all other-worldliness that the poet is preoccupied with in this collection. In his poem entitled 'Hath kar wal, rasna uchar wal', Bhai Vir Singh advocates spiritual pursuits along with honest hard work for earning one's living.

And it is also not true that preoccupied as he is with the message, Bhai Vir Singh is less satisfying in the poetic quality of his verse. He continues to be as sensitive, as suggestive, as rich in imagery as ever. At times the words trip on his lips with fleeting nimbleness succeeding most eminently, in reflecting the twilight of spiritual mood, not so easy to arrest by a less proficient pen.

It is indeed a major work from a major Punjabi poet and is destined to have an abiding place in Punjabi letters.

MERI KAVITA, MERE GIT (Dogri) is the first collection of Dogri poems by the first poetess of Dogri, Padma Sachdev. Published in 1969, it got her the Sahitya Akademi award for 1971. It has been translated into Hindi by Padma herself and the translation has been published by the Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi.

Some of the poems in the collection, read out by the poetess to the famous Hindi poet Ramdhari Singh 'Dinkar', moved him to remark, "After listening to these poems, I felt that I should throw away my pen.... What Padmaji writes is real poetry."

MERO SIJU-MEWAIRA RUNKH

Poems of this collection show a beautiful combination of folk-patterns and modern trends in poetry. The poems not only give voice to the pain and anguish of woman's heart and the suffering on earth, but also express with subtlety and authenticity the complex sensibility of the common citizen. The originality and freshness of several images, symbols, similes and metaphors employed in different poems of the collection, give to Dogri poetry a certain richness of imagination and creativity at different levels. The Dogri language of the poems retains its pristine beauty and also offers glimpses of new meanings and symbolic shades due to the skilful and innovative use of some words with varied stances.

MERO SIJU (Sindhi) is a compilation of 'new' ghazals by Arjun 'Hasid', published in 1984. The book received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1985.

Arjun Hasid has traversed long distances to arrive at a place where he is clubbed with the 'new' ghazal poets. Somehow he shook off the stigma of the word 'progressive', attached to his poetry, earlier than expected, and changed over to erotic poetry. Hasid has a larger share in romantic poetry written in frank and uninhibited language, reflecting animal love, giving vent to his intense emotions.

It seems that the poet's rendezvous with the romantic poetry lasted a little too long. But then the magic spell of romance broke and, strangely enough, a transformation etched its way into the poet which brought him before us in the form of a different poet—a 'new' poet. He brought out a compilation of 'new' ghazals, entitled Mero siju (The murky sun) in 1984.

What is new about Hasid's ghazals in Mero siju is that they talk about us and they talk about this day only, the painful, dark today, and not yesterdays and tomorrows. His ghazals are pure psychic automation expressing our thoughts and feelings. The ghazals do not explain; they simply come out as witness to the present age, moving through time and struggling with destiny.

It is interesting to note that in these ghazals, the poet has not used any romantic words like love and the beloved, the cup and the cup-bearer, the flower and the nightingale, wails and waits.

Arjun Hasid is one of the most personal, powerful and sensuous contemporary poets. The loss of certainty pecks at the heart of his poems. He uses poetry as an anodyne. It is not a cure, but it is certainly alleviating. The ghazals get well beyond the superficial to reveal the living sinews of a fascinating way of the modern life, the life that is so cruel, so demanding—a vivid picture of life based on intimate knowledge.

His other poetic works include Suwasani ji surhani (1966) and Pathara patharu, kanda kanda (1974).

MESHRAM, KESHAV T. (Marathi; b. 1937) was educated at Akola and Bombay. He had to join the Railway after doing his intermediate examination in 1958. But later he did his B.A. (Hons.) in 1960, received the Anant Kanekar Award. In 1963 he did his M.A. He became a professor of Marathi in Mahad, and later in Bombay from 1962. Now he is the head of the department of Marathi there.

The earlier part of his life was spent in terrible poverty and sufferings due to caste-discrimination. He worked as a cycle riskshaw-puller and a loader of trucks and a labourer at the coal and lime quarries. He is a poet, novelist, short story writer and literary critic with a difference. He is one of the prominent writers of the Dalit movement in Marathi literature, though he does not have any political or literary ideology. Very realistic and authentic, he has carved out a place for himself in modern Marathi literature by dint of his merit.

FURTHER WORKS: Collections of poems: Utkhanan (1977), Jugalbandi (1982), Akasmata (1984). Novels: Hakikat and Jatayu (1973), Pokharan (1979). Short story collections: Kharwad (1980), Patrawal (1982), Dhagada (1984), Literary Criticism and essays: Chhayaban (1973), Gal ani abhal (1978), Samanvaya (1979), Shabdangana (1980), Rutleli Manase (1982), Bahumukhi (1984), Anthology: Vidrohi kavita (1978) is prescribed in six universities in Maharashtra.

MEWAIRA RUNKH (Rajasthani) is a novel by Annaram 'Sudama' of Bikaner which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1978. The novelist has presented a realistic picture of a modern village in Rajasthan and its society. His emphasis is to show the exploitation of the poor people at the hands of the money-lending class. This class is also engaged in petty shopkeeping and making enormous profits by illegal and corrupt practices. The money-lenders have a sinister design and work in alliance with the village-based, petty Government officers. The money-lending widows in this class are worse than men. The novelist has also exposed the religious hypocrites who want the simple village-folk to live in darkness and cling on to superstitions, while they themselves are engaged in making money; worse still, they live a life of lechery. The corruption in Government circles has also been lashed in the book. It is an effective novel which gives us a first-hand experience of the village people, showing the atrocities committed on them, and their own petty squabbles and lack of mutual understanding.

MEYKANTAR-MHAIMBHAT

MEYKANTAR (Tamil; b.13th century) of Tiruvenneynal-lur belonged to the 13th century. Scholars believe that his Shivajnanabodham, on Shaiva Siddhanta, was released in 1223. This is worked out on the basis of the date given by Umapati Sivacharyar in his Sankarpanira Karanam. And Umapati was the great grand disciple of Meykantar.

The name Meykantar is a descriptive proper name. It means one who has seen the truth. Arulnandi explains it saying, 'the one who has seen the false and avoiding it, perceived and persisted with Truth'. Meykantar's other disciple, Manavachagam Kantantar, and a later saint-poet, Tayumanavar, also elaborate on these lines. The contribution of Meykantar is the interpretation of the word 'advaitam', on which stands the whole edifice of the Siddhanta philosophy. To give a correct interpretation of this word he had to elaborate the stand-point of Siddhanta in a mutually consistent manner, and the result is the Shivajnanabodham, the first systematised work explaining the Siddhanta school.

The Shivajnanabodham consists of twelve sutras (aphorisms). The first six are general ('podu') and the rest are specific ('unmai'). The whole book is divided into four parts, each containing 3 sutras.

Meykantar himself illustrated this work with examples and a commentary. There are many commentaries on the text, the earliest being that of Pandiperumal. Sivajna Munivar wrote two commentaries, one a short one (chirururai) and the other a long one (perurai), known as Shivajnana bhashyam, or Dravida mahabhashyam or simply Mapadiyam in Tamil.

The service which Meykantar did through his work to the Shaivasiddhanta system can be compared to the contribution of Shankaracharya to the Advaita philosophy or to that of Ramanujacharya to the Vishishtadvaita school.

MHAIMBHAT (Marathi; 13th century) was born in a rich family at a small place in the district of Aurangabad, Maharashtra. After completing his training under Ganapati Apayya, a Vedic scholar, he thought of meeting Chakradhara, the founder of the Mahanubhava sect, and accordingly anticipated a pedantic win-over against him. However, the meeting turned out to be quite contrary to the expectations of Mhaimbhat and the result was that he was not only impressed by Chakradhara's mastery over language and his style of argumentation but was also convinced of his godhead. In fact, he returned a changed person and in due course received initiation into the fold of Chakradhara at the hands of his guru, Govindaprabhu of Riddhipur. In spite of his conversion, however, Mhaimbhat was still labouring under the weight of his ego born of his riches and scholarship. He was relieved of it by Nagadeva, the first acharya of the sect, who proved to be an eye-opener for him, and he spent the rest of his life in promoting the cause of his mentor, Chakradhara.

Mhaimbhat lives in our memory by his monumental work namely Lilacharitra, which is the earliest prose composition in Marathi. It was undertaken almost immediately after the passing away of Chakradhara and completed around 1280. It is an anecdotal biography of Chakradhara written in simple yet pointed prose by one of his painstaking devotees who applied himself to its composition in almost filial faith and completed it with all the help that he could command from his spiritual brothers in the fold of Chakradhara. The Lilacharitra, meaning the charitra or life in the forms of lilas or anecdotes, is divided into three parts, the 'Ekaka', the 'Purvardha' and the 'Uttarardha', containing in all about 1200 memoirs of Chakradhara (According to Kolte, the Ekaka is a part of the Purvardha and the total number of lilas exceeds 1400). Of these parts, the Ekaka is the shortest and the sweetest. It depicts the lonely wanderings of Chakradhara during the earlier period of his nomadic life which is shrouded in mystery and presents him as a forlorn mendicant in search of God.

Mhaimbhat was guided in his endeavour of compiling the Lilacharitra by Chakradhara's chief confidant, Nagadeva, who judged the authenticity of the material collected from various disciples of Chakradhara and verified the words that were put into his mouth. In this way, with the cooperation of spiritual brothers and the supervision of Nagadeva, Lilacharitra took shape and eventually came to be recognised as the basic work of the hagiography. Never have the small events of a mystic's daily life been described in such intimate detail. Never have the casual utterances of a great spiritual teacher been set down with such minute fidelity. The Lilacharitra begins with a few surprises and bewilderments, like the soul of Changadeva Raul, entering the dead body of Haripala and transforming it into the living Chakradhara. But once they are over, we begin to find something stimulating and instructive about the very strangeness and the eccentricity of the man revealed to us in Mhaimbhat's narrative. Apart from being an intimate and lovable portrayal of the multifaceted personality of Chakradhara, Lilacharitra also presents his devotees in all their variety and idiosyncrasies which give it the form of a portrait-gallery. Its simple style and its lively and pithy dialogues are a permanent source of literary pleasure. And finally, it is not merely a personal account of a sanyasin but also an indirect presentation of the social and cultural life of Maharashtra of the 13th century. To the Mahanubhavas it became a permanent fountainhead of their sectarian literature.

Riddhipuracharitra, also known as Govindaprabhucharitra, is another anecdotal biography compiled by Mhaimbhat around 1288. Its subject is Govindaprabhu, the eccentric and even choleric godman of Riddhipura. It is small work containing only 323 memoirs and its literary value is also not the same as that of Lilacharitra. Mhaimbhat is supposed to have written similar accounts of the remaining three pancha-Krishnas of the Mahanubhava sect, but they are not so well known. Besides these biographical works, he is the author of a few ‘Aratis’ or devotional songs known as ‘Jatia Dasak’.

MHAMBRO, A.N. (Konkani; b.1938) Arvind Narayan Mhambro, born at Raibandar, Goa, is a Konkani satirist. He passed M.A. from the Bombay University in 1964, with philosophy as his principal subject. He worked as a Staff Artist in All India Radio, Bombay from 1963 to 1965 and then joined Kirti College, Bombay, as lecturer in philosophy. In 1970, he joined the Tata Economic Consultancy Services, Bombay. He started writing in Konkani and Marathi around 1950. He edited the Inter-Collegiate Konkani magazine Vidya (1961), the fortnightly, Konkani (1962), and Prasada-ful (The oracle, 1971), a collection of Konkani short stories. He also published delightful little poems for children entitled Ghumche katar ghum ghum (Beat the drums, 1964) which won him the Goa Kala Akademi award. With his profound insight into the social and political affairs of Goa, he has proved himself to be a good satirist, exposing the follies and foibles of the powers that be. His satirical vein takes the form of the burlesque and parody. He is equally at home with short story and play. The following works have won him critical acclaim: Taretarechim sanvgam amchya gonyant (Our Goa is full of strange characters), Ek sarkari of is (A government office), Eka mantryachi mulakhat (An interview with a minister). The characters he portrays are mostly government servants, doctors, lawyers, shop-keepers, etc. He also gives beautiful descriptions of the places as in Sundar mhajem Raibandar (How beautiful is my village Raibandar).

MHARO GAON (Rajasthani) by R.D. Shrimali (b.1938) published in 1978, is a collection of poems honoured by the Sahitya Akademi, with its annual award in 1980. It contains 32 poems. The two main topics dealt with in the poems are the village teacher and the prevailing state of affairs in the countryside. These two powerful and effective topics represent the society and the poet expresses himself through them on a variety of other topics in a broad but subtle way. His mood is both satirical and defiant. He is quite at home while expressing the life of a teacher, for being a teacher himself in a village, he could understand the profession and experience of the village life. It is this very mood that is noticeable in his award winning book of fiction Salawatan (Wrinkles). The irresponsible attitude of the teacher portrayed in his poems has been attributed to his physical and mental afflictions to a considerable degree. ‘My village’ is a poem of the all-pervading political corruption and a gruesome story of the exploited masses already perched precariously on the verge of hunger and acute poverty. The neo-feudalistic elements in the changed form and shape are proving no less dreadful. Despite his being a government servant, his fearless attitude and daring statements deserve all appreciation. The ‘white cap’ has been his special target and has served as a token of all political and social corruption, deformities and degradation. He has also confirmed the popular belief that though famines in Rajasthan bring the conditions of hunger and create problems for the masses, they bring festivities and rich crops of profit for the political leaders.

‘MILIND’, JAGANNATHPRASAD (Hindi; b.1907). A dramatist, poet, essayist and satirist, ‘Milind’ was born at Murar in Gwalior district (Madhya Pradesh). He left school at his home town under the influence of Gandhi’s Non co-operation movement though later he was educated at Akola, Poona, and Benaras. He knew many languages like Hindi, Sanskrit, English, Urdu, Marathi, Bengali and Gujarati.

From 1920 to 1970 he took part in active politics and was associated first with the Indian National Congress and later with the Socialist Party of India. His main preoccupation, however, has been journalism and creative writing. For his services in the field of literature he has been awarded several prizes, and was honoured by Uttar Pradesh Hindi Sansthan, Lucknow, for his life-long services to Hindi.

His main contribution is in the field of drama. His Pratap-pratigya (1929) and Gautamnand (1952) are historical plays. The first was written to arouse feelings of patriotism, and the other to do justice to a historical character hitherto neglected. Samarpana (1950) is a problem-play based on a conflict between personal love and social and national duty.

FURTHER WORKS: Drama: Priyadarshi (1962), Virchandrashekhara (1967), Jayajanantra (1967). Collections of poems: Jivansangit (1940) Navyug ke gaan (1942), Balipath ke git (1950), Bhumi ki anubhuti (1952), Mukti ke svar (1954), and Nai kiran (1966). Long episodic poems: Swatantrata ki balivedi (1962), Mrtyunjaya manav (1976). Essays: Chintanakana and Samaskriti ka prashn (1954). Humorous writing: Billo ka nakchhedan (1954).

MIMAMSA

MIMAMSA (Sanskrit). The word 'mimamsa' is derived from the root, man, to think and literally means rational thinking, investigation, examination, enquiry, etc. The term in its conventional sense is used for one of the theistic system of Indian philosophy because it critically investigates and examines the interpretation of Vedic rituals and formulates some principles according to which uniform and rational meaning may be arrived at where there is a divergence of opinion with regard to the drift of disputed Vedic texts. Mimamsa, therefore, consists of systematised code of principles in accordance with which the Vedic texts are interpreted for purposes of rituals and sacrifices. It propounds canons for a right interpretation of the Veda and lays down compendium of maxims with the help of which the Vedas may be rightly understood and sacrifices rightly performed.

Seeds of Mimamsa can be seen in the Veda itself, especially in the Brahmanas which propogate the sacrificial system of worship wherein the rules of rituals are adhered to faithfully and flawlessly. With the passage of time sacrifices spread and more and more elaborate details were added. Discussions and doubts about the performance of the rituals sprang up and regular rational enquiries started. This was the beginning of Mimamsa which later developed into a full system in the Mimamsa-sutras of Jaimini in about the 2nd century B.C. Jaimini's work sums up the general rules of rituals and sacrifices handed over through the long tradition of Vedic interpretation and describes the different sacrifices and their purposes in detail. The work has twelve chapters and contains 2,500 sutras. This is the earliest available work of the Mimamsa system and begins with an enquiry into the nature of dharma, as the central theme of Mimamsa is the discussion of dharma—acts of duty—the performance of sacred rites. It is the longest of all the philosophical sutras and discusses about one thousand topics, and hence forms the groundwork of the Mimamsa system. The work attracted many commentators such as Bhartrmitra, Bhavadasa, Hari Upavarsa, etc. But the earlier available important commentary on Jaimini sutras is by Shabaraswami known as Shabara bhashya about the 1st century B.C. Shabara bhashya being the basis of the later Mimamsa works is further explained by Prabhakara and Kumarila Bhatta, who differ from each other in certain important respects and form the two principal schools of Mimamsa named after them. Prabhakara's commentary on the Shabara bhashya is known as Brihati which has a commentary on it, called Riguvimta by Shalikanatha Mishra. Kumarila Bhatta composed his independent exposition of Shabara's Bhashya in three parts known as (1) Shloka-Varttika (2) Tantra-Varttika and (3) Tuptika. Shloka-Varttika is further commented upon by Parthasarathi Mishra and Sucharita Mishra and Bhattombekar in their respective works, called Nyayaratnakara Kashika and Tatparya Tika. With regard to the time of Kumarila Bhatta, tradition makes him a senior contemporary of great Shankara. Yet another great Mimamsa scholar and the follower of Kumarila is Mandana Mishra, who has to his credit many important works like the Vidhiviveka, Mimamsanukramani, etc. Other note-worthy works of Mimamsa are—Parthasarathi's Shashtra dipika, Madhava's Nyayamata vistava, Khandadeva's Bhatta dipika, Apadeva's Mimamsanyayaprakasha and Laugakshi Bhasakara's Arthasaingraha.

As Mimamsa system primarily deals with the Brahmana portion of the Veda that comes chronologically Purva (pre)—before the Upanishads hence it is termed as Purvamimamsa, while the philosophical system dealing with post-Brahmanic Upanishads is styled as Uttara (post) Mimamsa, popularly known as the Vedanta. Just as Shamkhya and Yoga, Vaisheshika and Nyaya are regarded as allied systems of thought. Similarly Purva and Uttara Mimamsa both form a composite system of thought and complement each other. The knowledge and the performance of dharma is pre-requisite for the knowledge of Brahman, the central theme of discussion of Uttara Mimamsa qualifies and entitles a person to enter into the enquiry of Brahman. Hence Purva and Uttara Mimamsa are designated as the components of action (karman) and knowledge (jnana) known as karmajnanasamuchchaya. Jacobi is of the view that from the first the Purva Mimamsa and the Vedanta or Uttara-Mimamsa were one School and that it was only later through Kumarila and Shankara that they were differentiated.

Some of the principal tenets of the Mimamsa system are that the Veda is revelation, it is eternal, infallible and self illuminating, that all knowledge except the action of remembering is valid by itself, it itself certifies its own truth and does not depend on any other external knowledge for its validity; that the verbal testimony (shabdapramana) is the supreme of all other means of cognition like perception, inference etc. because the nature of dharma the main aim of Purva Mimamsa, cannot be apprehended through senses and other pramanasa except shabda, the Veda, that the relation between a word and its meaning is natural, eternal and not created by convention. All these theories of Mimamsa rotated on the axis of the conviction that the Vedas are eternal, revelation not creation and are the supreme authority on all matters, mundane as well as spiritual.

Mimamsa system being orthodox and liturgical may appear obsolete to a modern thinker, yet it is significant and useful as dealing with the elucidation of the abstruse and complex Vedic texts and evolving formulas for the correct interpretation. It touches the problem of the relation of speech and thought and delves deep from the expression into the idea garbed in it. Whereas Sanskrit grammar treating the formation of words touches only the formal aspect of language, Mimamsa on the other hand concerns itself with the composition of a sentence and the syntactical meaning arrived at from it. It is, therefore, styled as the Vakya-shastra, and is valuable for the modern science of semantics, that branch of knowledge which deals with meaning in relation to linguistic forms. The two cardinal theories Mimamsa named as Abhihitanyavada and Anvitaabhidhanavada are the great contribution of Mimamsa to the science of language. According to one view named as Abhihitanyavada, in a sentence words first convey their own individual meanings and then a relation or connection between them arises which gives rise to the total sense of a sentence as a whole. Every word in a sentence has a generic meaning which it expresses independently. When several words are combined to form a sentence, the generic senses are modified in some way or other to accommodate others. These together give rise to a sense which is the sense of the sentence as a whole. Opposed to this view is the view of Anvitaabhidhanavada which maintains that a word expresses a connected meaning and there is no need to suppose a generic sense for every word. According to this view the meaning of a sentence is comprehended from the dealings of people wherein meanings of words used in a sentence are taken connected either with some action or object or something else. No word in a sentence gives an individual meaning isolated from the main flow of the sentence meaning which is unified and whole.

Apart from that Mimamsa has exercised a great influence over all the branches of Indian knowledge. Rules of interpretation evolved by Mimamsa are frequently adopted by systems like the Grammar, Vedanta, Puranas, Smritis and even the Alamkarashastra for removing incongruities when their adherents are confronted with riddles arising out of mutually contradictory texts of their respective disciplines. Many technical terms employed in Paninian system of grammar like paryudasa, atidesha, badha etc. are directly borrowed from Mimamsa. Even the great Shankara in his commentary on the Brahma Sutras of Badarayana takes recourse to Mimamsa maxims. Many figures of speech of Sanskrit rhetoric like Parisaikhya own their allegiance to Mimamsa. Above all, Mimamsa has a big hand in giving shape to Hindu religion and Hindu law. Even today many religious ceremonies individual as well as social, are conducted according to the prescriptions of Mimamsa, and the present laws of inheritance, proprietary rights, adoption etc. are still governed by Mimamsa rules of interpretation through Smritis and Dharma Shastras.

MINA ALEXANDER (English; b. 1951) is a distinguished poet, literary critic and a teacher of English literature. She is presently settled in New York and teaches English at Furdoham University. She belongs to an overseas colony of poets who respond to Indian literature in American conditions. Daughter of a meteorologist, she comes from Kerala and her parents are from the Syrian Christian community. She began writing at the age of thirteen, travelled abroad and was educated in Africa and England.

Mina is chiefly an experimental writer who is known for her innovation in ideas and style. For her, a poem is both a record of the inner life and the external reality. Landscape figures prominently in her work and the poet is concerned with the fragile nature of the self. Her poetic mood is one of lyric intensity, love and despair. Being inventive in her phrasing, diction and metre, she corroborates pre-eminently her literary theory that a poem is a structure which reflects the art of making poetry. She is a poet of modernist sensibility with her puzzling obscure creations. She arouses other kinds of feeling than are felt in social situations. Such subversive feeling create the expression that a poem itself is not as important as the attention, the desire, the vision and the cosmogony that it evokes.

The author's works include collections of poems like The Bird's Bright Ring (Writers Workshop, 1976), Without Place (Writers, Workshop, 1977), I, Root my name (Writers' Workshop, 1977) Stone Roots (Arnold Heinemann, 1980) and a critical work, The Poet's Self: Towards a Phenomenology of Romanticism (Arnold Heinemann, 1979). She has also written a play, In the Middle Earth, and several critical essays on Indo-English literary scene. She has been a remarkable critic with fresh insights and perceptions. Her essay, 'Mahapatra: A Poetry of Decreation' is well known.

Mina Alexander's works merit evaluation by critics. Her metaphors and images deserve notice. Her private symbolism is worth examining. Her critical canons lay down the necessity for a visionary consciousness.

MIR AMMAN (Urdu) whose real name was Amanullah, was born and brought up in Delhi, but unfortunately, not much is known about his life. He was rendered homeless and reduced to penury by the ravaging of Delhi by Ahmad Shah Abdali. The aftermath compelled Mir Amman to emigrate to Patna and from there to Calcutta. At the instance of Mir Bahadur Ali Husaini, John Gilchrist, the founder of the Fort William College, appointed Mir Amman as 'Munshi' in 1801. Till 1806 he remained on the staff of the College doing book assignments which consisted of translating Persian texts. His name does not figure in subsequent records of the college, hence it is difficult to surmise whether he spent the rest of his life in Calcutta or elsewhere.

Mir Amman has contributed significantly to the evolution of Urdu. He developed a new prose style which was looked upon reverently by later prose stylists like Sir Syed, Ghalib, Mohammad Husain Azad and Hali.

Mir Amman used a lot of words and phrases which later went out of currency, but his felicity of expression was such that his writings were fully comprehended and appreciated throughout all eras. Even today, he is no less popular. Mir Amman's claim to fame in the history of Urdu prose rests only on two works, Bagh-o-Bahar and Ganj-e-Khubi. Of the two, only Bagh-o-Bahar was published in 1803. It was the Urdu translation of the Persian Chahar Durwesh which had earlier been rendered into Urdu by Mir Ata Husain Khan 'Tahseen' under the title, Nau Tarz-e-Murassa. As against the ostentatious and artificial style of Tahseen's translation, Mir Amman's Bagh-o-Bahar is written in a commonly understood idiom and has enthralled and won critical acclaim from one and all. Bagh-o-Bahar was translated into English by L.F. Smith and published from Calcutta in 1842. Duncan Forbes and Garcian d' Tassy also published abridged English and French translations respectively.

Written in a romantic strain, Bagh-o-Bahar has structural similarity with Arabian Nights. There is an abundance of the supernatural and other such romantic lore. Almost all accounts of Urdu literary history are silent over Mir Amman's Ganj-e-Khubi which was also written at the instance of Gilchrist. It is a free translation of Mulla Husain Kashifi's Akhlaq-e-Mohsini and only one manuscript is extant.

MIR HASAN (Urdu; d. 1786), full name Mir Ghulam Hasan, was a famous Urdu 'masnavi' writer. He was the son of Mir Zahik and grandfather of Mir Anis. He was born in Delhi, but later, due to foreign invasions, he migrated to Avadh. He left Delhi in about 1765, went to Faizabad via Lucknow and settled at Faizabad. At Faizabad, Nawab Salar Jung patronised him and employed him for the services of his son, Nawazish Ali Khan. After a few years, he again went to Lucknow where he died on 10 October 1786.

Mir Hasan was a disciple of Mir Zia-ud-Din Husain Zia. He liked and followed the styles of Mir, Dard and Sauda. According to some tazkira-writers, Mir Hasan showed some of his ghazals to Sauda also. The writings of Mir Hasan consist of the following:

Masnavi Rumooz-ul-Arifin: This masnavi was completed in 1774 and was first published in 1850. This is a didactic, mystic masnavi on the lines of the great Persian masnavi of Rumi. It consists of small tales told in verse. The main theme is to show the nothingness of the worldly life and to praise the other world.

Tazkira-e-shoara-e-Urdu: Mir Hasan authored this important biography of poets written in Persian prose. He completed it in 1777 at Lucknow. Some additions were made upto 1778. It was first edited by Habibur Rahman Khan Sherwani and published in 1922. This Tazkira is important for its pen portraits of many Urdu poets.

Diwan: Many of his compositions were lost in a fire. He compiled them again latest by 1778. The 1781 version contained about 8000 lines. He must have added many more ghazals till his death in early 1786. The Naval Kishore Press first published Diwan-e-Mir Hasan in December, 1912, but it had only about half of his ghazals. Another small collection named Ghazaliyat-e-Mir Hasan, edited by Mirza Ali Hasan, was published from Sarfraz Press, Lucknow, in 1944.

Masnavi Gulzar-e-Iram: This was completed in 1778 and first published in 1908, from Delhi, in the collection, Masnaviat-e-Mir Hasan. It is an autobiographical poem in which he narrates his migration from Delhi to Faizabad. In it he describes some of his love adventures.

Masnavi Sihrl Bayan, popularly called Masnavi Mir Hasan, was completed in 1784. This is regarded as his masterpiece as also the best masnavi in Urdu. This is a romantic fairy tale. Its importance lies in its portrayal of the culture of the upper classes. It is also notable for depiction of natural scenes, human sentiments and for its characterisation.

Kulliyat-e-Mir Hasan: This includes almost all the poetic compositions of Mir Hasan as detailed above and some small masnavis and a 'tarkib-band.' There are many manuscripts of this Kulliyat, but so far no one has published it. Masud Hasan Rizvi also unearthed three 'marsias' of Mir Hasan.

The chief importance of Mir Hasan lies in his authorship of Masnavi Sihrl Bayan. The other notable work is his tazkira of poets.

MIR MUSHARRAF HOSSAIN (Bengali; b. 1847, d. 1911) was the foremost among the Muslim writers of the nineteenth century. He was a prolific writer who experimented will all the existing genres—poetry, drama, novel, autobiography, essays etc. Hossain did not have much of a formal education through he had thorough schooling, first at the local primary school and the English-Bengali school of Kushtia and then at Padamdi's School and Krishna Nagar Collegiate School. For the greater part of his life, he worked as manager in the estate of the Nawab of Faridpur. His literary apprenticeship began with journalistic stints in Sambad prabhakar (ed. Ramcharan Gupta) and Grambarta prakashika (ed. Kanganal Harinath Majumdar). Hossain's literary career may be divided into two phases; in the first phase he was primarily concerned with literary creativity and zealously espoused the cause of Hindu-Muslim unity and cultural synthesis; in the works of the second phase, glorification of the Muslim past gained primacy and literary considerations became subservient. His first book Ratnabati (1869), a narrative in the fairy tale mode, is weak both in plot and treatment. The story hinges on the controversy between the prince of Gujarat and the Vazir's son regarding the comparative merits of wealth and wisdom. The second book, Basanta kumari (1873), a drama, records a maturity in style and construction. It is a story of unrequited love and jealousy in the family of King Birendra Sinha of Indrapur. The main characters, all of whom die at the end of the play, are, on the whole, drawn well. The next work Gouru shetur (1873) is written in verse of poor quality but received some acclaim from critics. The play Jamidar darpan (1873) occupies an important place in Hossain's literary output. Though it may seem a pastiche on Dinbandhu's Nildarpan (1860), the play is noteworthy not only because of its literary merits but because of its intention. It courageously exposes the evil deeds of the village zamindar who was an unregenerate profligate and thrived on the exploitation and dehumanisation of his subjects. In the play Hossain also shows how religion is exploited by both Hindus and Muslims to perpetuate individual and class interests. His autobiographical work Udasi pathhiker maner katha (1890), though spoiled at places by an excess of emotional effusions and a tendency towards exaggeration, contains valuable information about rural life in Bengal in the second half of the nineteenth century, particularly the atrocities of the European indigo-planters. Hossain was steeped in Hindu mythology as is evident from his Behula gitabhinay (1889), that story of supreme human defiance against the whims of gods and goddesses. His appreciation of the Hindu way of life and the call for Hindu-Muslim unity got expression in all the works of the first phase, so much so that in his essay 'Go-jiban' (1888) he exhorts his fellow Muslims to abstain from the slaughter of the cow that is an object of devotion for the Hindus. The views expressed in this essay were so forthright and revolutionary that it earned for him the odium and anger of his own community.

Bishad sindhu remains Hossain's major work and his reputation today rests chiefly on this work. It was published between 1885-1891 in three parts—the Mohur-rum part in 1885, the Release in 1887 and the Downfall of Ezid in 1891. Written on an epic scale, the narrative weaves a complex pattern in which the ambitions, love and hatred of private individuals seriously impinge on public life and decide the fate of whole communities. However, throughout the work the intense human drama is always foreshadowed by an overarching fate that has absolute control over human affairs. The previous knowledge on the part of their characters of their imminent downfall deepens the sense of tragedy. The author claimed that the incidents are based on authentic Arabic and Persian sources but the recent researches in this field have established the fact that the story is based on the Punthi literature extant in Bengal, particularly, Maktul Hossain, Jangnama and Shahid-e-Karbala. This seems more plausible because he knew little Arabic or Persian. Whatever the sources, his fertile imagination and extraordinary power of visualisation played upon the historical facts to create a unique effect. Though it is true that the religious aspect of the book caught the imagination of the readers and made it sell so much so that it ran into eight editions during the author's lifetime, the book stands on its own merit. Hossain invariably rises to the grandeur of action and matches it with an equally grand and sonorous style.

Gajimiar bastani (1899) marks Hossain's transition from the sane and balanced attitude of the earlier works to the essentially parochial vision projected by the works of the second phase. These works include Maulud sharif (1903), Musalmaner bangla shiksha I, II (1903, 1908) Madina gaurab (1906), Muslim biratta (1907), Eslamer joy (1908) etc. As evident from the titles, the main objective here was to create awareness among the Muslims and fill them with a sense of pride. Literary qualities have invariably been given shortshift in them. Hossain's last works are autobiographical. In Amar jibani I-XII (1908-10) and Bibi kulsum (1910), Hossain recounts the story of his life and that of his epoch.

MIR NASIR ALI (Urdu; b. 1847) son of Syed Nasiruddin Muhammad al Mansur, he came of a noble and illustrious family and his ancestors held high posts in government at Tirmiz (Soviet Turkistan) during the days of the Muslim Caliphate and later at various places in India and abroad for his scholarship, and especially for his comparative studies in religion. Besides a commentary on the Quran in Persian, he wrote a number of books in Urdu. He received a robe of honour from the Sultan of Turkey.

MIR, RASUL

Nasir Ali learnt the Quran and religious sciences from his father. He further studied Persian and Arabic under some distinguished scholars of Delhi. Later he was admitted to the Delhi College, wherefrom he passed the Entrance Examination in 1867.

After serving for an year as Head Master in a Government school in Bahraich, U.P., he was inducted in the Excise Department wherefrom he retired in 1908 after forty years of service. He was honoured with the title of 'Khān Bahādur' in 1897 for his meritorious services. During 1910-13 he served as a magistrate in Delhi. He had the honour to be announced in the Durbar of King George V in 1912. He also supervised as curator the museum visited by the king in the Red Fort at Delhi. From 1913 to 1922 he served as the Diwan (Chief Minister) of Pataudi, a princely State (Haryana). He also got the Alexander Fellowship of the Punjab University. Later, he was made a Fellow of the Punjab Historical Society, Royal Asiatic Society and the Asiatic Society of Bengal.

After his retirement he settled in Delhi and led his life in literary pursuits, publishing his journals and collecting old books and manuscripts, paintings, royal firmāns, rare works of calligraphy, and other rareties. He was a connoisseur of art and a voracious reader of books. He had a large collection of books in Urdu, Persian and English on history, philosophy and literature.

The only book he wrote was Mujarrabat-e-Kimiya (1876), a treatise on Chemistry which was awarded a prize by the U.P. Government and prescribed as a textbook in schools.

Nasir Ali was essentially an essayist. He contributed his early essays/articles to the Agra Akhbar and the Dab-daba-e-Asifi. Afterwards, he established his own press, Matba-e-Nasri, and started publishing his own literary journals. His first journal, Terhvin Sadi, was published from Agra in 1876 which had taken its name from the English The Nineteenth Century. Later, in 1880, it was named Zamana. Terhvin sadi was devoted to present the virtues of religion and the Eastern culture. In fact, it was a reaction to Sir Syed's overemphasis of naturalism as reflected in his and his associates' writings in the Tehzib ul Akhlaq. But Nasir Ali was not an adversary of Sir Syed. He appreciated Sir Syed's activities for the educational uplift of his compatriots.

In 1885, he started Afsana-e-Ayyam from Delhi. Devoted to light literature and containing a monthly review of important news, it was all written by him. Then followed Nasri in 1888 with Mirza Hairat Dehlavi as one of its chief contributors. In 1908, he started Sala-e-'Am, his most celebrated journal. Devoted to light literature, it stood for enriching Urdu prose and giving it grace and beauty. Its regular columns, particularly 'Mazun-e-Parashan', penned by Nasir Ali, won the applause of the literateurs of the day. Nasir Ali never cared to cater the common people; he saw to it that his journal remained the favourite of only the choicest and the sophisticated elites of literature. Sala-e-'Am distinguished itself from Sir Abdul Qadir's Makhzan, another literary journal of repute, by its more lively style.

He distinguished himself by his ingenuity and imaginative prose with a charming and graceful style. His prose is marked by short simple sentences and always having a poetic flavour. His essays, articles and editorials are imbued with the philosophic content and insight but more so by his polished language with a natural flow, wit and humour and apt Urdu and Persian couplets. When he started writing, Urdu prose was already becoming a true vehicle of the educational, social, moral and political reform. In fact, with a simple direct style in place of the old ornate one, it was becoming a language of awakening and reform. Nasir Ali, like Sir Syed and his associates, disapproved of unnecessary Persianising of Urdu prose. But then, he also disapproved of unnecessarily spraying Urdu prose with English words, the equivalents of which were easily available in Urdu. He was conversant with English literature, but he was not over-awed by it. He wanted Urdu prose to be enriched not only by English and European literatures, but also by the Sanskrit classics.

Well-versed in classics, he had a modern mind and looked askance of making literature a handmaid of social service or morality, as Sir Syed and his associates sought to do. As such, he was the foremost writer of Adab-e-Latif, or the light literature, which sometimes at the hands of later writers came to be a sharp reaction against the didacticism of the Aligarh Movement. They also gave more importance to elegant style than the direct and the straightforward one as adopted by the Aligarh writers. Nasir Ali's writings bear out his lively nature, profound learning of history, religion and literature, but his deep sense of aesthetics of language was always more prominent and showed itself in beautiful phrases, similes and metaphors. At times his imaginative prose reminds us of Muhammad Husain Azad, but he is not so fond of metaphor as the latter. Nor does he interest himself in romanticizing the past like Azad.

Nasir Ali always holds us by his delicate art and by appealing to our intellect and imagination. In fact, in him we find wisdom and entertainment blended together.

MIR, RASUL (Kashmiri; d. 1870) was born in Sehapur, Shahabad, in Kashmir. Little can be said with certainty about his life. He is believed to have died young.

Mir is pre-eminently a writer of love lyrics. In an age when mystic verse conferred respectability, he addressed his ghazals to an earthly beloved without pretending shyness. Some people believed that he loved a Hindu woman. He alludes to a 'Kong' and a 'Hindu princess' in his ghazals.

MIR, SAMAD-MIR TAQI MIR

Rasul Mir's ghazals are colourful and sensuous. His imagery depicts the beauty of his beloved in line and colour and caters to various sense perceptions with the help of flowers, fragrance, tinkling anklets, a swan-like neck, etc. His lyrics spring spontaneously from his heart and are highly melodious. In some of his ghazals he presents the female lover complaining with modesty, delicacy and restraint about the waywardness of the male beloved. Reversing the convention in many of his sweetest compositions, he delights in projecting the male-lover courting the female-beloved with ardour, sincerity and optimism.

Mir's ghazals bear a remarkable unity of impressions. His diction is colourful but simple, though occasionally he uses words of Persian origin. He enshrines the sentiment of love in all its nuances.

MIR, SAMAD (Kashmiri; b. 1893, d. 1959). Like his father, Samad Mir worked as a sawyer but became a building labourer later. Early in life, he started his search for 'truth' as a sufi and imbibed yoga also. He gave utterance to his first song 'Yetravun pyon' when he was past thirty and already initiated.

Mir is a mystic poet, and his 'vatsun' songs and ghazals reveal his deep insight acquired under the sufi and yogic disciplines. He feels compelled to give utterance, though inadequately, to his vision in the verse overladen with symbolism. The burden of many of his poems is: 'It is impossible to express what is obvious to Samad Mir'. As in the case of the most mystic poets, his varied experiences are surrounded by ambiguity and even obscurity. He underscores awareness and even offers 'Come and learn wakefulness from Samad Mir'. Sufi concentration, intense devotion to the Prophet, shastric practices and the utterance of 'Om Suh' are all grist to his mill. He emphasises: 'Every single atom is an integral part of the Everlasting', and for him Rama and Rahim are identical.

Mir wrote a substantial quantity of verse in the forms of 'ghazal', 'vatsun', 'naat', etc. It seems that he never cultivated poetry as an art, and it was only the inevitable utterance of his inner experience. It is said that not a single verse came from him for as long as thirteen years. One may notice faulty metre occasionally and excessive use of medial rhyme creates complication. Mir was illiterate, but, apart from imbibing our common cultural heritage, he made acquaintance with the birds and animals, insects and herbs, flowers and trees, which came handy to him as symbols. He has to his credit quite a number of metaphors and idioms of virgin freshness. He also wrote the allegory of Akanandun in fourteen cantos. His poems, embodying depth of meaning, indicate sincerity of feeling, surcharged emotion and spontaneous rhythm.

His poems were published in several parts entitled Kalami-Samad Mir by Ghulam Muhammad Nur Muhammad. His collected works were edited by Motilal Saqi and published by Jammu and Kashmir Academy of Art, Culture and Languages in 1973.

MIR TAQI MIR (Urdu; b. 1810). Mir's only serious rival to the title of the greatest Urdu poet is Ghalib (1797-1869). Mir is customarily described as Khuda-e sukhan (Poetry's God), perhaps because he has greater range than Ghalib, and has many firsts to his credit. Mir's Nikatush Shu'ara (Subtle points about poets) is the first tazkira (biographical anthology) written by an Urdu poet in Northern India. Mir was the first Urdu poet to write an autobiography. He more or less invented in Urdu a verse genre called Vasokht. He was the first to extensively develop and use a metre which is indigenous to Urdu. In addition to the usual Qasidas, Mir also wrote a large number of Marsiyas, and many long narrative poems. Ghalib's range of forms is comparatively limited.

Muhammad Taqi Mir's people, originally from Arabia, settled in Agra in the sixteenth century. Muhammad Taqi's father, Muhammad Ali (b. circa 1671) was an austere Sufi; he left behind few worldly goods when he died around 1733. Muhammad Taqi went to Delhi shortly thereafter and found a patron in Samsamud Daula, the king's pay master. Samsamud Daula died in 1739 in the battle against Nadir Shah, and Muhammad Taqi returned to Agra. He travelled back to Delhi a few months later and now found patronage under the great scholar, poet, and linguist Sirajuddin Ali Khan Arzu (c 1679-1756) who was also an uncle of Mir's by marriage.

There is no evidence of Muhammad Taqi's having much formal schooling. He certainly had a lot of Persian and Arabic, and learnt much from Arzu in a non-formal way. Around 1740, Muhammad Taqi's mind seems to have been temporarily affected due to frustration in love. His earliest poetry would also seem to date from that time.

By 1747 Muhammad Taqi had become a notable poet. He commenced Nikatush Shua'ra around that date, and also broke with Arzu. Now known as Mir Muhammad Taqi Mir, he was an arrogant young man, very proud of his powers as a poet, and outspoken in his views of others. All this is reflected in the tazkira, completed in 1752. His difficult nature, and the political instability of the times, did not make life easy for him.

From 1747 to 1772 Mir served under a succession of patrons. Notable among them were Sadat Khan Zulfiqar Jang, Raja Jugal Kishor, and Raja Nagar Mal. He participated in much military and diplomatic activity in the company of his patrons. Days of severe hardship and prosperity followed each other with distressing regularity. Around 1772, Mir quit the service of noblemen and began a life of secluded poverty in Delhi. Around this time too he commenced his autobiography, Zikr-e Mir, completed in 1782, with minor additions made up to 1788. Mir left for Lucknow around 1782 at the invitation of Navab Asifud Daulah who treated him with great deference and granted him a salary of 200 or 300 rupees a month. Mir lived the rest of his life in Lucknow.

By 1782 Mir had completed four works in addition to Nikatush Shu'ara. One was Faiz-e Mir, a slight book (in Persian) for the spiritual instruction of his son, (circa 1762). The other was his Persian Divan, compiled around 1764. Then there were his first and second Urdu Divans, compiled around 1752 and 1775 respectively. The third Divan was put together in Lucknow about 1785 and includes many poems from Delhi. The last three Divans are tentatively dated 1794, 1798-1803, and 1808-1809 respectively. A collection, without the Marsiyas, was printed at Fort William College, Calcutta in 1811. The Marsiyas, discovered more than a century later by Masud Hasan Rizvi Adib, were first printed at Allahabad in 1951.

Mir's reputation has remained extremely high over the nearly 250 years since he appeared on the literary scene. Curiously enough, Mir criticism has rarely shown a corresponding degree of excellence. This is partly because his voluminous work has daunted a close study; but the main reason seems to have been certain stereotypes which have dominated Mir criticism since the 1850's. Mir is generally held to be a poet of great sadness, surpassing simplicity, and a true lover's self-effacement. He is reputed to have a tragic vision of life; his poetry is regarded as the romantic cry of an anguished heart.

All this could be true if one looked at Mir's poetry only selectively. Such simplifications do grave injustice to his total poetry. Mir's greatness lies, in fact, in his astonishing range of themes and moods. He is erotic, ironical, bawdy, philosophical, tragic, self-mocking, playful, worldly-wise, cynical, warm-hearted, self-effacing, arrogant, sweetly loving, bitter, angry, mystical, sceptical, didactical. His poetry defies categorization. No emotion is beyond his reach; no theme is too high or too low for him. In the width and depth of his experience of life, Mir is truly Shakespearean. He is the one Urdu poet whose mind seems to have travelled every where. Just as he is the creator of the finest erotic poetry in Urdu, he is also the author of some of the greatest verses celebrating the triumph of the human soul.

Likewise, Mir's style has varieties too numerous to fit stereotypical categories like "simplicity", "artistic artlessness", "directness". In fact, Mir's is a highly complex and metaphorical style. Very often his seeming simplicity conceals facets of meaning which become apparent only after close reading. He is a master of what traditional poetics calls Ma'ni afirini (creation of meaning) and mazmun afirini (creation of new themes.) While the former consists in charging the verse with more meanings than can be immediately perceived, the latter utilizes pre-existing themes in a new way, or looks at them from a new angle.

Mir is also a master of kaifiyat (intense emotiveness) where a verse doesn't so much make a concrete statement, but rather causes an immediate emotional impact. It should be obvious that kaifiyat can't easily co-exist with ma'ni afirini. Mir is the one poet who often successfully combines the two. Another quality of Mir's which again links him with the traditional poetics is shor angezi, that is, the poet's making a passionate comment or statement, often metaphorical, but in an impersonal tone, as if he weren't himself involved in the situation.

Mir's love for wordplay and his astounding vocabulary often go hand in hand. Urdu lends itself naturally to wordplay, and Mir rarely resists his tendency to make unexpected metaphorical, semantic or rhetorical connections through wordplay. Mir's vocabulary cheerfully embraces the whole range from "plebeian" to "high" Arabo-Persian. He is the greatest master of Prakritic vocabulary in Urdu, and is equally at home with arcane Persian or Arabic idioms and expressions. Both in vocabulary and in themes, Mir's poetry is that of a man grown old in experience of words, of life and things. This is why he is Urdu's greatest poet of human relationships and interactions.

Nearly all the styles and manners of Urdu poetry in the nineteenth century can be traced back to Mir. His attitude to both life and poetry informs much of the modern Urdu Ghazal. More than Spenser in English, Mir is the poets' Poet in Urdu.

S.R.F.

MIRA/MIRAN (Gujarati; Hindi/Rajasthani b. 1498, d. 1565) was a mystic and a poetess of medieval North India. Born a princess in a Vaishnav family, she studied dance, music and poetry. As her father, Ratansinh, was always engaged in warfare she was brought up by her grandfather, Dudaji, in a religious atmosphere at Medata. Her poems suggest that she had a mystical experience in early childhood and was emotionally wedded to God. However, at the request of Sang the king of Mewad, she made a marriage de convenience with his son, Bhoj. The marriage, however, was without any issue. Instead, she dedicated her life to the service of man and God, and she began to compose poems. After the death of Bhoj in 1521 and particularly after the death of Sanga in 1527, she became vulnerable and was politically persecuted by her brothers-in-law, Ratansingh and Vikramaditya. Disgusted with politics she left Mewad in 1532, a sort of exile in. went first to Medata (1533), thereafter to Brindaban (1534-36) and finally to Dwaraka (1537-1546). In 1546, in a mood of repentance. Udaysingh, successor of Vikramaditya, offered to reinstate her honourably in Mewad. Perhaps to avoid all possible political and wordly complications, she fled from Dwaraka incognito on a pilgrimage in the South (1547-1556) and in the East (1557). A witness to political chaos and confusion in North India, she cherished a vision of peace and harmony. She might have bequeathed this vision to Akbar whose 'Din-e-Elahi' could be seen as its embodiment.

Being a mystic, she did not belong to any religious cult or sect. Her definitive biography does not exist. Hermann Goetz, a German scholar, has made an admirable attempt to arrive at a reasonably authentic story of her life by a most judicious analysis of cross-references and circumstantial evidences and by a most perceptive study of her poetry. A brief summary of this story is offered here at the outset. Her poems have survived through oral tradition. Today, her poems are found in three languages: Rajasthani, Brij and Gujarati. It is likely that she composed them when she visited Mewad, Brindaban and Dwaraka. Or maybe she composed all her poems in one language only—Old Western Rajasthani. But it is certain that in course of time their language has suffered a change. In any case, she could not have composed them in the language in which they are found today. There are about 1400 poems to her name, including many of doubtful authorship. Three long narrative poems are also ascribed to her. No dates of their composition can be established. Their chronology is of no consequence since all of them are devoted to one theme, namely, God. However, it is most likely that the poems on the theme of separation precede those on the theme of meeting. Other saint-poets describe or narrate the love of Radha and Krishna from a distance. They are only witnesses, each one is a third person. Being men, their sensibility is masculine. There is predominantly 'Madhura bhakti' and 'Shringara rasa' in their poems. Mira is not just a witness, she is herself a 'gopi', a Radha. Her sensibility is feminine. In her poems, the 'Dasya bhakti' and 'Shanta Rasa' are the major themes. Her Krishna is not that of any sect or scripture, not that of mythology or history, not that of the Mahabharata or the Bhagavata and does not dwell in her own heart. Her poems are more popular than those of any other saint poet. They have been composed in a colloquial style in dialects, and appeal both to the learned and the laity. Her poems are short, simple and spontaneous. Their rhythms vary as the moods vary—now slow now swift. There music is matchless and their craftsmanship superb. They possess structural unity and exquisite artistic quality. Here one finds neither erudition, nor eclecticism nor esotericism, but intensity of feeling and profundity of experience. There are no distinct worlds of man and nature; seasons of Vasanta and Varsha act only as a backdrop for the drama of unworldly love. The poems share a common theme: God and love for God. There is no variety. But there is indeed depth. A princess of Medata and a queen of Mewad, her poetry is urbane and sophisticated, her taste is classical and selective. Her favourite images are: dagger, arrow and spear; heat, sand and mirage. She shines like a white flame in the arid desert not only of Mewad but of the world. Sappho of Greece, with her poems of profane love, and Mira of Mewad, with her poems of divine love, share the world of love-poetry between them.

·Ni.Bh.

A devotional poetess of the 'Bhakti yug', Mira or Miran belonged to no particular religious sect, nor did she start one of her own. She merely sang of her single-minded love to her lord, Krishna, describing his personal charms and yearning for the fruition of her love. The traditional belief is that she was a disciple of Raidas, and a positive link between 'Sagun' and 'Nirgun' bhakti schools of poetry.

Mirabai seems to have grown into a legend in her own life-time. It is, therefore, difficult to reconstruct her biography authentically. Nor is it possible to say conclusively how many songs she actually composed.

MIRA/MIRAN-GUJARATI, HINDI, RAJASTHANI

Mirabai has alluded to Raidas to be her preceptor. There is, however, no evidence supporting this belief. The time-lag between Mira and Raidas is too wide to make it probable. May be, she held Raidas in great reverence and looked upon him as her guru. What is important for us is not who her guru was but what she sang and wrote. Besides her 'padas', seven other titles are ascribed to her, namely, Naisi ro mahero, Gitagovind ki tika, Rag Govind, Sorath ke pada, Miranbai ka matar, Garvagit and Rag vihao. But none of these seems to be an independent work and none is authentic. Her reputation rests solely on her songs, but here too we are bewildered with their numbers, which can be anywhere between 20 and 1312. An authentic and critically edited text is still to come. Mirabai's padas have been in a fluid state and their language has been shifting from Rajasthani to Braj in the east and to Gujarati in the west. Punjabi and Hindi (Khariboli) elements are also found in some of the padas.

Though the range of Mirabai's poetic perception and her literary output are meagre as compared to those of Kabir, Sur and Tulsi, it is the intensity and the all-absorbing depth of her songs that account for her excellence. She does not sing of the love of gopis or of Radha but directly of her own love, and she regards her relationship with her Giridhar Gopal as of an exclusive nature. While the trials and travails which gopis and Radha undergo in their secret love for Krishna are a part of a mythology, Mira's sufferings were real. Her allusion to the tortures she underwent give a new dimension to her emotional experience. She has been compared with Andal, one of the Alvar bhaktas of the south but, in fact, she has attained such an enviable a place in the world of music and poetry as can hardly be claimed by any one else. Her exquisite lyricism shall be replete with a perennial charm and freshness.

V. V.

The facts about Mira or Miran Bai's period, life and works are still unconfirmed, and even modern researchers repeat with slight changes what the old historians have already said. She was the daughter of Ratansi, the fourth son of Rava

Duda. Her date of birth varies between 1498 to 1504 according to various historians, but the one accepted by Munshi Deviprasad i.e., 1504. can be generally accepted till such time as a more accurate date is put forth on firmer grounds. Her birth place is also equally doubtful. Kudaki, Bajoli and Medata, all in Nagaur district, are suggested in this connection. Viramdev, elder brother of Ratansi had bestowed twelve villages, including Kudaki, in Jagir to Ratansingh. But recent search of a manuscript, Rathodam ri khyat, by Udaising Champawat reveals that Viram got Medata in 1515 on the death of Rava Duda and thereafter he snatched Kudaki from Bhoja Sihawat. Thus Kudaki could remain in Ratansi's possession only after 1515. But according to the popular belief, Miran was born in 1504 and this fact proves her place of birth as Medata. The City Palace library at Jaipur contains a manuscript copied in 1797 (No. 306) wherein 143 of her 'padas' are available. Nos. 63,70 and 125 of them also speak of Medata as her birth-place. But this cannot safely be taken as true, as some more historical facts mentioned therein do not stand ground. This fact is also corroborated from the mention in Bhaktamal of Nabhadass commented upon by Priyadas and Raghodas. The point needs further confirmation by more reliable sources, and till then, Medata is in favour with the scholars. Though Miran was sincerely devoted to Lord Krishna from her very childhood, her elders arranged her marriage with Bhojraj, son of Rana Sanga of Mewad, in 1516. Misfortune befell her and she was widowed on her husband's death in 1523. G.H. Ojha puts this date between 1518 and 1523. This intensified her devotion to God.

The fierce battle waged by Rana Sanga with Babar at Khanawa during 1527 claimed the lives of the Rathods of Medata, Rava Viramdev's younger brothers Rayamal and Ratansi, while Viramdev was seriously wounded. Sanga also breathed his last in 1528. Thus Miran lost her father-in-law, husband and father just within 12 years of her marriage. Having lost all interest in her life, her devotional activities intensified without caring for the family prestige and the sneers of the society. She held religious gatherings and sang and danced in the presence of the saints and religious minded persons. This endangered the safety of the fort of Chitor and proved a blot on the fair name of the Rana Family. Meanwhile Ratansi, son of Sanga, ascended the throne, but he was soon killed by Surajmal of Bundi during 1531. He was succeeded by his brother Vikramajit, who is said to have been a despot. It was he who troubled Miran and even tried to administer poison to her. These facts have been variously mentioned in her own padas as well as of other poets and saints. In 1536, Banabir, the son of Prithviraj's concubine and brother of Rayamal, ended his life. Subsequently Udayasingh, younger brother of Bhojraj occupied the seat in 1540. Disgusted with all this, Miran proceeded to Medata and reached there before 1535. Bahadurshah of Gujarat had invaded Chitor in this very year, and had Miran been there, she should also have burnt herself alive alongwith all other women of Chitor.

On the arrival of Miran at Medata, the place was soon attacked by Rava Maldeva of Jodhpur in 1538 which led to Viramdev's flight to Ajmer alongwith Miran. Maldeva attacked Ajmer also in 1539 which forced Viram to quit the place. She visited several places with her uncle after this event till the latter sought the help of Shershah Suri, the emperor of Delhi, in 1543. It is believed that Miran stayed with Viram till 1538. Feeling very unhappy at all this, she left her father's residence and proceeded on a pilgrimage. Having examined various theories put up by different historians about the attack on Viram by Maldeva, we may treat 1539 as the most probable date of Miran's departure for pilgrimage. No details of the place of start or of the places she visited are available, but some scholars believe that she did visit Vrindavan where she had a meeting with Jiva Goswami. But the fact needs positive evidence. Mathura and Vridavan being associated with the early years of Krishna, her pilgrimage to the place seems probable. Her meeting with Jiva Goswami has also a sectarian touch. It, however, transpires that instead of travelling to Vrindavan, she proceeded to Dwaraka via Pushkar and lived there till her death, and this is an accepted truth. Rana Udayasingh sent his trusted men to persuade her to return to Chitor but she was fed up with wordly affairs. She had also realised her own self. That was why she did not like to return and breathed her last at Dwaraka in 1547. It is said that this date is also found recorded in the 'Bahis' of the priests of the family and seems to be a correct one. Deviprasad has given credence to 1546, while there are diverse opinions put forward by others. But these dates do not rest on firm grounds.

Some scholars treat Raidas as Miran's preceptor, but there are certain serious historical misgivings. Raidas died after Kabir who has made a mention of him in his writings. Pipaji has mentioned Kabir and Raidas in the past tense. Kabir having died in 1448, Raidas in 1451 and Pipaji in 1453 V.S. approximately, and Miran, having been born in 1561 V.S. cannot have had Raidas as his religious preceptor. Latest researches tell us that Rava Duda having conquered Medata, appointed one Jamunaji Joshi as his royal astrologer. The office was continuously held by this Joshi family till 1930. Gangadas Joshi of this very family was granted a rent-free land of 25 bighas by Maharaja Vijai Singh of Jodhpur in Medata in 1793. Certain papers in the possession of Jainarayan Asopa, son of Ramkaran Asopa, prove that the word 'Joshi' appearing in Miran's padas is addressed to the Jamunaji Joshi. The fact, however, needs further confirmation from other reliable sources also. Miran's life was marked by a series of mishappenings and uncalled-for troubles which she could win over only with patience and confidence in herself and the courage worthy of a woman of the Kshatriya race. This intense agony was the driving force behind her compositions full of eternal bliss and everlasting beauty of heart and mind. She never lost her courage in the face of the severest odds, endowed as she was with the strength of devotion to the Almighty. She surrendered herself only to Lord Krishna.

Even more problematic than her life story is the text of her compositions. During the last 20-25 years, almost 2000 'padas' have appeared in her name in various collections. There are numerous interpolations and a good number of them do not have any connection with Miran. Almost all editors have copied them from the manuscripts and have neither cared about their authenticity nor presented a scientifically edited text. The contemporary political, social, literary and psychic circumstances and folk-feelings are also to be kept in mind alongwith various forms of the prevalent language. Side by side we have to look into what other contemporary poets and saints tell us about Miran. Nabhadass has commented freely in this respect in the chappaya metres of his Bhaktamal. She was like a 'gopika' in the age of 'Kali' who demonstrated her love for Krishna. She was fearless and knew no bounds. She sang in the praise of her lover Krishna. Her own men troubled her and even tried to kill her by attempting to make her drink poison, but she hardly cared for them and shunning all false prestige, devoted herself to Krishna. Her devotion was that of the lover and the beloved. The whole text of her 'padas' runs into 300 to 400 only, and even this is a conjectural figure. We may judge certain specialities of her poetry on this basis. She is completely devoted to her Lord in all possible aspects and is prepared to do anything to please Him, even to get herself sold for his sake. Her love is not of this life only, but a continuity of ages and numerous lives. This spirit of complete surrender finds expression in various glorified ways. That there is no place for public remarks and prestige of the family in the philosophic field, is made explicit by Miran. She has brought this fact home for every one. She has tried to generate fearlessness in man and attempted at making him rise to a higher level.

Her submission of self connotes an intensive feeling. Nature is no partner of her feelings of separation and her longings are on an individual basis. Her 'padas' are full of natural beauty, a sort of innocence and a delicate well-being befitting the fair sex. Her line of action is well-defined and she believes firmly in her meeting the Lord. The agony of love haunted her since the very childhood and it is the story of her forlorn life. Her writings have left a strong imprint on the Indian life. There are numerous 'padas' which supply necessary information on her life and her struggle with her own men. But very few of them can be ascribed to Miran. Some of her 'padas' have a 'nirguna' (formless) touch which seem to belong to a later stage when Miran got some perfection in her line of devotion. It is at this stage that there is no difference between 'nirguna' and 'saguna'. Her original language must have been Rajasthani only with slight impressions of Braj and Gujarati here and there. Gradually, these impressions were more pronounced during the course of time. Out of the writings attributed to her, 'Gita Govind tika', 'Narasiji ro mahero', 'Satyabhamaji no rusano', 'Rag sorath', 'Rag govind' and 'Padawali', none except 'Padawali' and the various ragas representing her padas may be safely treated as belonging to her.

A number of publications have appeared in the name of Miran and some of the important ones are: Karottamas Swami, Miran Mandakini, (Agra, IInd edition); Manavirsingh Gahlot, Miran jivani aur kavya (Kashi, 1945); Bangiya Hindi Parishad, Mira smirti grantha, (Calcutta, 1949) Padmavati Shabanam, Miran brihat sangraha, (Banaras, 1952); Parashuram Chaturvedi, Miran Bai ki padavali, (Prayag, 1955); Murlidhar Shrivastava, Miran darshan, (Allahabad, 1955); Murlidhar Shrivastava, Miran darshan, (Allahabad, 1956); Brajratnadas, Miran madhuri, (Varanasi, 1956); Anand Swarup Swami, Miran sudha sindhu, (Bhilwada, 1957); Harinarayan Purohit, Miran brihat padavali, (Jodhpur, 1968); Kalyansingh Sekhawat, Miran brihat padavali, (Jodhpur, 1975).

MIRAJI (Urdu; b. 1912, d. 1949) had his schooling in Gujarat, Kathiawar, Jacobabad, Sukkar and Lahore, but he discontinued his studies after passing his matriculation examination. He was on the editorial staff of Adabi Duniya, Lahore (a literary magazine) for a few years. He joined the All India Radio during his stay in Delhi. He moved to Bombay eventually and edited Khayal (a literary magazine) in collaboration with the well-known Urdu poet Akhtar-ul-Iman. Miraji showed early proclivities for discovering erotic manifestations in normal human functions, feminine modes of dress and even vagaries of nature. He blends mythological elements with an anguished poetic sensibility. He carries the lofty and the carnal in a state of precarious balance. Miraji handles ghazal, nazm and git with a sense of rhythmic variation and metaphorical elegance. He signifies a point of departure from the modes of expression of Hali, Iqbal and Josh Malihabadi. 'Mujhe ghar yad ata hai' (I remember my home) 'Samundar ka bulava' (The call of the sea) are two of his well-known poems. Miraji is an abiding influence on modern Urdu poetry. He wrote some prose also mainly consisting of an autobiographical sketch and his studies of Amru, Vidyapati, Chandidas, Edgar Allan Poe and Baudelaire. Miraji's works include Miraji ki nazmein, Git hi git, Is nazm mein, Mashriq-o-Maghrib ke naghmen, Nigarkhana, Paband Nazmen and Teen rang a selection.

MIRANBAI KI PADAVALI (Hindi; early 16th century) is a collection of 'padas' by Miranbai, the famous devotional poetess of the medieval age. Her unparalleled fame as a poetess of exquisite beauty rests primarily on her padas, which are extremely popular all over northern India even today.

Among more than two dozen collections of her verses published in India, only three have been compiled on the basis of available manuscripts. These are Miran Mandakini (ed. Narottam Swami, Agra, 1930), Miran Smriti grantha (Bangiya Parishad, Calcutta, 1950) and the 55 padas included by Udaysingh Bhatnagar in his Rajasthan mein Hindi ke hastalikhit granthon ki khoj.

Verse composition in the form of padas has a long tradition. In Miran's padavali we have a harmonious blend of folk traditions with the artless spontaneity of a gifted poetess. While reading these poems one is struck by their genuinely lyrical qualities, depth of passion and irrepressible urge for identification with the beloved.

The poetess conceives of Lord Krishna as her lover to whom all her affections are offered without any reservation. She longs to have a union with the Lord and sometimes feels that this union has been achieved. Thus she expresses now the bliss of union, and now the pangs of separation. This reminds us of the Sufis, and it is not unlikely that she imbibed their influence. These songs have vibrations of folk-melodies and within their music is also felt a dancing rhythm. For intensity of feeling and directness of expression, these lyrics have never been surpassed.

So far as the language of Padavali is concerned, the views of scholars are divided. Sunitikumar Chatterji and Jhaverchand Meghani are of the view that its language is pure Rajasthani, which got mixed with words from different dialects as the padas had long run into the oral tradition before attaining a written form. Motilal Menaria and Narottam Swami believe that its Rajasthani is a mixture of Brajbhasha and Gujarati also. A large number of padas are in pure Brajbhasha too, the traditional language of 'Krishna Bhakti' poetry.

MIRANI, NANDIRAM THADHOMAL 'SEWHANI' (Sindhi; b. 1819, d. 1875) was one of the early writers in

MIRASDAR, DATTARAM MARUTIRAO-MIRASHI VASUDEO VISHNU

Sindhi, who laid the foundation for the development of Sindhi prose. He was born in Amil Hindu family of Sewhan (Sindh), the place famous for Dargah of Lal Shahbaz Qalandar, a sufi saint. Nandiram learnt Persian and Arabic in traditional 'madrasa' of Sewhan. After completion of his education, he himself started a private school at the same town, teaching Persian, Urdu and Sindhi languages. Due to meagre income from the school, it was difficult for him to make the both ends meet. After the advent of the British rule in Sindh in 1843, new educational system was introduced during the fifties of the last century. Nandiram, known for his scholarship, was appointed a member of the Committee established in 1853 for standardizing the Arabic-Sindhi script. Nandiram played an important role in preparing the Arabic-Sindhi alphabet containing fifty-two characters, which is in vogue even to his day.

Nandiram was the first scholar to translate a Persian book Tarikha Ma'sumi (History of Sindh written in Persian by Ma'soom Shah) in Sindhi, using the standardized script in his work. This translation was adjudged to be the best among all entries. Hence, Nandiram was awarded a prize in cash and was appointed Munshi (Translator) in the Education Department. Thereafter he played an important role in the production of school text books and general literature in Sindhi. Major books prepared by Nandiram alone as well as in collaboration with others are: Babnamo (The first Sindhi primer for teaching the newly evolved Arabic-Sindhi script; first printed 1853), Aesop jun akhanyun (A translation of Aesop's fables with the guidance of Ellis, the Assistant Commissioner of Sindh published in 1854), (3) Tarikha Sindh (History of Sindh, a translation of Tarikha Ma'soomi, for which Nandiram was awarded a prize. It was prepared in 1854, but published in lithograph in 1861), Lekhe ji pirha (a book on arithmetic, translated from Hindi, and originally based upon a book in English written by Thomas James; printed in 1855), Sekhaito nirvaru (the first book in Sindhi on the importance of new education system: translated from Urdu and published in 1856), Jabro Muqabalo (the first book in Sindhi on Algebra, translated from English with the help of Vishwanath Nandalik, and printed in 1856), Dharati nirvaru (the first book in Sindhi on the world Geography translated from English with the help of Mahadev Shastri, and published in two parts in 1855), Sansari nirvar (the first book on 'Nature study' in Sindhi, translated from Urdu and published in 1861), Chitra ji para (a book on drawing and painting, translated from English and published in 1854) Paimaishi hisaba (the first book in Sindhi on geometry, translated and published in 1855).

The most significant contribution of Nandiram in this field is that he coined and selected various technical terms in Sindhi. Most of these terms are still in vogue in Sindhi text books. The prose of Nandiram is simple and colloquial.

MIRASDAR, DATTARAM MARUTIRAO (Marathi; b. 1927) was born at Akluj, in Maharashtra. He is a short story writer known for his rural vignettes depicted brilliantly in a typical, humorous style and revealing the innocence, astuteness, pragmatism and shrewdness of the people who, outwardly, being illiterate or semi-literate, are far behind the norms of urban world but know truly how to survive despite all odds. Mirasdar, along with a few other writers like Vyankatesh Madgulkar and Shankar Patil, has earned a reputation for his adeptness in personal presentation of his stories set against a rural background. Presently, he is a lecturer in Marathi at Garware Commerce College, Pune. Short story collections: Bapachi pend, (1957), Bhutacha janma, (1958), Virangula, (1960), Hubehub, (1960), Chutkyanchya goshti, Sparsha, Gappagoshti, Chakaty, Makadmeva, Gammagosthi, Gavaran goshti, Gudgulya (all published between 1957 and 1975). Selected short stories: Mirasdaree. Juvenile literature: Ganara mulukh (plays) and Jawaeebapunchya goshti, (1980). One-Act plays: Guttee ani itar ekankika. Humorous essays: Sarmisal. Translations: Nawketil teen pravasi (translation of Jerome K. Jerome's Three Men in a Boat), and a couple of other books.

Mirasdar has been awarded prizes by the Government of Maharashtra for Bapachi pend and Virangula.

MIRASHI, VASUDEO VISHNU (Marathi; b. 1893) had a very distinguished educational career at school and college and won several prizes and scholarships. He studied at the Deccan College and topped in the M.A. Examination of the University of Bombay. He started teaching Sanskrit at the Morris College, Nagpur in 1942 and later at the Vidharbha College, Amaravati in 1947. He retired in 1950. From 1957 to 1966 he worked as the Head of the post-graduate studies and as Honorary Professor of Ancient Indian History and Culture in the Nagpur University.

Many honours were bestowed upon him for his scholarship and research. The title of Mahamahopadhyaya was conferred on him in 1941 by the Government of India. In 1956 he was honoured in the traditional manner with ceremonial dress and copper plaque by Madhya Pradesh Sahitya Parishad. The D. Litt. degree was conferred on him by the Sagar, Bombay and Nagpur Universities in 1958, 1959 and 1960 respectively. He was elected President, All India Oriental Conference, All India Indian History Conference and Indian Numismatic Society. He was elected Honorary Fellow of that Society. Vidharbha Research Society presented him with a commemorative volume. In 1967 Dr. Radhakrishnan awarded him with a certificate for his scholarship and dedication to Sanskrit studies.

Mahamahopadhyaya Mirashi has won world recognition as a learned scholar of Ancient Indian Literature and History. He has so far written about 250 research papers in English and 125 in Marathi on Sanskrit and Prakrit literatures and on Ancient Indian History. The following are some of his works. In English: Inscriptions of the Kalchuri-Cedi Era (Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum, Vol. IV); Inscriptions of the Vakatakas. (Corpus Inscriptionum Indicarum. Vol. V.); Studies in Indology. Vol. I to Vol. IV; Kalidasa. In Marathi: Kalidasa; Samsodhan Muktavali. I to V Series; Vakatak Nrapati Ani Tyacha Kal; Kalchuri Nrapati Ani Tyacha Kal; Meghdutatil Ramagiri Arthat Ramtek.

M.D.H.

MIRCHANDANI, ARJAN GOBINDRAM 'SHAD' (Sindhi; b.1924) started composing poems under the influence of progressive trend. He graduated from the University of Bombay with Sindhi as one of his subjects. In 1973 he obtained his Ph. D. Degree from the same University for his thesis on Sindhi ghazal. He started his career as a part time lecturer in Sindhi first at Khasla Collage and then at Jai Hind College, Bombay. Later, he joined the Department of Sindhi in the University as its head. He has been connected with Board of studies in Sindhi.

Initially he came under the influence of an eminent Sindhi poet, Hari 'Dilgir', an exponent of 'Bevas' school of modern Sindhi poetry, but by and by he carved out his own place in Sindhi literature. He started his poetic career in the forties when he was a student, but it was only when he brought out his first collection of poems under the title Aun ghitiyuni jo g'ainderu (I am a street singer, 1957) that he came to limelight and was regarded as a trend-setter in progressive poetry. His poems though moulded in traditional forms, deviated substantially in thought content. One of his poems 'Modia jo bilu' (Grocer's bill) is no doubt striking and exhibits his progressivism and dynamism. His poems are technically perfect and are characterised by rich imagery, and powerful in expression. His dance-drama D'ahiyun d'ukha d'issani (Those who are too clever, suffer, 1960) based on an old folk-tale, is also a feather in his cap.

His next publication was Volga je kinara (On the banks of Volga, 1967), a translation of selected Russian poems in free verse, for which he received the Soviet Land-Nehru Award. He kept on experimenting in form and content and after seven years he brought out his next collection Tapasia jun roshniyun (Lights of penance, 1974). His new collection proved that he was not a spent force and that there was no paucity of ideas or dearth of new themes in his creative activity. The most important poems in this work are 'Chanda yatra' (Journey to the moon), 'Sindhi', 'Sarhad je par' (Beyond the frontiers), 'Vatan ji yad' (Remembrance of the native land) and 'Pira' (Torture). His next collection of poems entitled Andho dunho (The blind smoke) was picked up for Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1983. The title poem depicts the tragedy that engulfed the Sindhi community when it was uprooted from its native land, Sindh, after the partition of the country.

In the field of criticism and research his Bevas ain nao dauru (Bevas and new-age, 1970) is a solid contribution. However, he is essentially a poet whose poetic output, though small, is nevertheless qualitative and of permanent value.

D.K.M.

MIRCHANDANI, LEKHRAJ KISHINCHAND, 'AZIZ' (Sindhi; b.1897, d.1971) was born in a well-to-do Sindhi Hindu family at Hyderabad Sindh. His father Kishinchand Naumal was an Executive Engineer and owned hundreds of acres of irrigated land. He was a man of healthy physique and attractive personality. He had his higher education in the Elphinstone College Bombay and after graduation he tried to manage his property, but it seems that he just could not do it. After partition of the country, he taught Sindhi in K.C. College Bombay, from where he retired as Professor at the age of 64. Aziz was known as an excellent host, and very often invited people to parties.

Besides being a great scholar of Sindhi, Aziz was well-versed writer of Persian. He was a prolific prose writer and has as many as seven books of criticism, plays, etc. to his credit. Drama: Ajit Singh (1931), Mr. Manju (1934), Ghariban mara (1935). Prose: Adabi aino (1941), Gul-o-khar (1955), Sami (1963), Sindhi istalah (1978).

However, Aziz is best known as a poet. His poems are compiled in as many as nine collections: Kuliyat-e-Aziz (1938), Shairani shama (1940), Gulzar-e-Aziz (1940), Pachhtava ja lurika (1946), Mushahrah (1946), Abshar (1953), Surhai (1963), Lalkar (1965). Having complete control over Persian prosody, Aziz is best at composing 'ghazals' and 'rubais'. Although one finds Persian and Arabic words scattered all over his earlier poetic compositions, yet his effort to write in simple, intelligible language is visible in his poetry composed during the last ten years of his life.

He was a powerful critic and his book Gul-o-khaar. (Roses and thorns, 1955) is a milestone in criticism on Sindhi poetry. His collection of poems Surahi (1963) was picked up for Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1966.

MIRCHANDANI, NANIKRAM DHARAMDAS-MIRCHANDANI, U. THANWARDAS

MIRCHANDANI, NANIKRAM DHARAMDAS (Sindhi; b. 1890, d. 1946) was a prose writer and a poet. He was a teacher in Navalrai Hiranand Academy, Hyderabad (Sindh). Mirchandani dedicated his entire life to the service of younger generation by imparting moral education and by building character of the children. He was a scholar of English, Sanskrit, Hindi and Urdu. Hence, he enriched Sindhi literature by translations and adaptations in Sindhi of the masterpieces from these languages.

Mirchandani contributed significantly to the development of Sindhi fiction, play, essay and poetry. He remained continuously active in the literary field since the second decade of the present century. He wrote full-length and one-act plays in Sindhi, especially for Hyderabad Amateur Dramatic Society established around 1912 in Hyderabad Sindh. He was himself a good actor and played an important role in the growth of Sindhi stage. His first play seems to be Farebi fitno (Mischief of deceit, 1914) based upon the plot of an English novel Vendetta by Marie Corelli. Some other plays written by Mirchandani are Patisheva (Devotion of Husband, 1920), an adaptation of Urdu play Nek Parvin, Prema bhag'ti (1923) a translation of Urdu play Bilva Mangal, by Agha Hashr, Suhini Mehar (1946) an original play based upon a Sindhi folk-tale; Novels: Adarsh nari (Ideal woman, Hyderabad, Sindh, 1926), Nazik gulri (Tender flower, Hyderabad Sindh, 1928), Kashmiri phul (flower of Kashmir, Hyderabad Sindh, 1943), Aram mahal (Palace of delight), Nara jun kingiryu (1946).

He translated into Sindhi the poem Meghaduta (A cloud messenger), a famous Sanskrit poetic work of Kalidasa, in 'doho' form. The language used by Mirchandani in this translation is simple and elegant. However the translation does not faithfully render into Sindhi the poet's ideas and images at several places. The work contains explanatory notes and a running commentary in prose also.

In the later years of his life, Mirchandani began to translate the Bhagvadgita in Sindhi verse. He added to it annotations and critical notes, comparing Bhagvadgita's philosophy with the teachings of the Bible, the Quran and the scriptures of some other religions. The work remained incomplete and unpublished due to sudden death of the writer. Mirchandani wrote a large number of essays containing beautiful pieces of Sindhi prose. He compiled Standard English-Sindhi Dictionary which was published in 1928 from Hyderabad Sindh. Though Mirchandani has written in different forms of literature, he is more remembered for his contribution to the development of Sindhi drama.

MIRCHANDANI, UDHARAM THANWARDAS (Sindhi; b. 1833, d. 1883) was one of the early Sindhi prose writers, who laid the foundation for the growth of Sindhi prose in different branches of literature. Born in a Hindu Amil family of Hyderabad Sindh, he got his primary education in Persian in a local Madrasa. He was hardly ten years old when the British rule was established in Sindh in 1843. Considering the needs of the period, he studied English and acquired good proficiency in it. Besides, he became well-versed with Hindi, Urdu and Punjabi. After completing formal education upto secondary level, Udharam got a post of 'Munshi' in commissioner's office. Later on, he was appointed a translator in Education Department. He was one of the members of the Committee appointed by the Education Department in 1853, to evolve standard script for Sindhi on the basis of Perso-Arabic characters. As Udharam had a good knowledge of English, he used to teach Sindhi to European officers in Sindh, because the basic knowledge of a local language was made compulsory for the British Officers by the government.

Udharam prepared a good number of text books in Sindhi. Besides, he enriched the Sindhi literature by composing melodious poems and writing instructive and entertaining fiction. He was the first Sindhi scholar to collect some folk-literature in Sindhi prose as well as poetry, and got it published in newly standardized Arabic-Sindhi script.

Some of the major literary works of Udharam are: (1) Sindhi readers for primary, first and second standard, printed in 1853. These contain lessons in prose and poetry, (2) Sindhi vyakaranu (Sindhi grammar) printed in 1854. It is the first grammar of Sindhi written in the Sindhi language, (3) Mufidul talibin (Useful book for students). It is entitled in English as Oodharam's Guide and is meant for teaching Sindhi through English and vice versa. It was published in 1861, (4) Totenamo (A book of stories originally based upon Sanskrit work Shukasaptati, but translated by Udharam from Urdu in 1862), (5) Duniya ji mukhtasar tarikh (A Brief history of the world, translated from English and published in 1855), (6) Rai D'iyacha jo kisso ain akhaniyun (Folk-tale of Rai D'iyach and other stories). The book contains eleven folk-tales of Sindh. Udharam transliterated a folk-tale of Rai D'iyach, which was published by Captain George Stack in his Sindhi Grammar in 1849. This collection was published in newly devised Arabic-Sindhi script in 1861, (7) Rasselas (Johnson's English novel translated in Sindhi by Udharam and Sadhu Navalrai Advani in 1868. They were awarded prize on this translated work), (8) Kisso Kamsen ain Kamrup jo (Long narrative poem composed by Lalo Bhagat and transliterated from Devanagari Sindhi and published in 1869), (9) Kisso Mehar Munir ain Badar Munir jo (Folk-tale narrated by Udharam in poetry form in 1869 and published in 1871), (10) Sindhi-English Dictionary

MIRI JIYORI-MIRJI ANNARAYA

(Compiled by Shirt, Udharam and Mirza Sadiq Ali Beg. It was published by the government in 1879).

M.K.J.

MIRI JIYORI (Assamese) is the masterpiece of Rajani-kanta Bardoloi. It was his first novel and may be described as a kind of national history of the Miri (Miching), a tribal community of Assam. It has creditably portrayed and deftly handled an almost baffling problem of the conservative Miri society. In the process it has become a fine study of the tribal Miri life, their geographical situation, their village organisation and their beliefs.

The Miris inhabit the valley of the river Subansiri in the district of North Lakshimpur. Jonkey happens to be a Miri youth, while Panei is a Miri girl, both belonging to the same locality in the valley. These are the two leading characters in Bordoloi's novel. Both grow up on the banks of this river in constant company in play and dance. They are two nature's creatures in their simplicity. The warmth which bound them together in their childhood gradually matures into love when they grow into adolescence. The nearness to each other which they enjoy as adolescents in their romping on the river sands, in the work of paddy transplanting in the muddy fields, in the dance at the time of the Nara-chinga Bihu and in their journeys in river boats to the accompaniment of Bihu songs slowly but surely unite their hearts in passionate love ties. But obstruction in love comes from Panei's parents, especially from her father, Tamed. The reason of this disapproval is that Jonkey is poor and a lone boy. The earnest desire of the parents, Tamed and Nirmai, is to ensure for their only daughter a comfortable future. Hence they deliberate and decide to give their daughter in marriage to the rich youth, Komud. So when the marriage with Komud is nearly settled Panei runs away from home. The main conflict in the action begins at this point. Jonkey and Panei take a vow before their deity, Karsing Kartan, affirming their love and promising never to part with each other. All these things happen on the banks of the river Subansiri that is a silent and indifferent spectator of the mysteries of life.

But both are caught and a case is filed in the Court against them. Panei is allowed to stay with her parents till the disposal of the case. The old father, Tamed, begins hurried preparations to forcibly give Panei in marriage to Komud. In desperation the simple Panei once again runs away from her father's house. In her mad wanderings in search of Jonkey she is held by the Gachi Miris. At the same time Jonkey also is found wandering for Panei. He also is held by the same Miris. In a last joint attempt made by them to escape from the terrible catastrophe by running away they are caught and tried by the social Court. They are condemned to death. In getting them this severe punishment, there is the enmity of the selfish Rebang who also has been an unsuccessful suitor for Panei's hand. The sentence is carried out in all severity. Both Jonkey and Panei are pierced through by the same spear and thrown into the river Subansiri where they perish in the most tragic manner.

This, in a nutshell, is the story of the Miri jiyori. The plot construction is perfect. Through a minimum number of characters the story advances in a deft manner. The characters themselves are convincingly drawn. The Miri jiyori is also important as a regional novel. In it are depicted the life and ways of a tribal community inhabiting a particular region. We do not get as faithful and convincing a picture in any other novel of its kind. Though it deals with the intense love of a young Miri pair, the treatment is such that it attains a kind of universal tragic grandeur.

MIRJI ANNARAYA (Kannada; b.1918, d. 1975) was an eminent novelist, short story writer, critic and scholar. His full name was Annappa Appanna Mirji. Born in a Jain family, after having passed his Jana examination conducted by Kannada Sahitya Parishat, Bangalore, he served as a primary school teacher. He wrote several essays and short stories under the pen-name Industanaya, in his early days. He published his first and famous novel Nisarga (Nature) in 1945. It is a significant contribution in the field of fiction in Kannada. It has a theme of unfulfilled love between two young lovers who belong to two rural families. Nature plays a prominent role in this novel creating rural surroundings in effective way. Here, author has a fine grip over the situations of life that prevail in rural atmosphere. He has used the dialect of northern part of Karnataka as an instrument to carry the theme more successfully. This novel was very well received by critics as well as common readers. It won him many awards including Devaraja Bahadur award which was the earliest award instituted for best Kannada works.

Later, he published more than ten novels. Rastra Puruse (1948), Ramanna mastaru (School teacher Ramanana, 1948), Sreyamsa (1954) are some of his notable contributions that have enriched the field of fiction in Kannada with diversified theme and effective treatment.

His other contributions include essays on basic education, short stories, biographies, travelogues, literary appreciations, religious works, etc. His other outstanding contribution to Kannada literature is his voluminous research work, Jainadharma (first published in 1952), a treatise on Jaina religion and literature. Encyclopaedia in its nature, this work contains a survey of history of Jainism, a detailed information about Jain ethics and literature found in Kannada, Sanskrit, Prakrit and other Indian languages. This book concludes with a survey of Jain ideology in comparison with the modern outlook, its thought and content.

MIRZA, AKMAL-UD-DIN AKMAL-MISHRA, BALDEVPRASAD

While he was serving as a primary school teacher in Jivana Siksana Sala (since 1955), he was honoured in 1962 as a best teacher by the President of India for his yeoman's service in moulding future generations of India. He established a trust in the name Gandra Ganga Jnana Pitha in his home town through which multifarious literary activities are conducted including organisation of literary work-shops, bringing out publications, and providing facilities to writers for their stay and research studies.

P.S.S.

MIRZA, AKMAL-UD-DIN AKMAL (Kashmiri; b. 1642, d. 1717) was the son of Adil Khan whose father Mirza Malik Muhammad Khan Badakhshi served as Akbar's Governor in Kashmir. Akmal was patronized by Shahjahan, and initiated by Khwaja Habib Ullah Attar into a discipline of mysticism that considers music essential for spiritual advancement. His ever-growing interest in mysticism led him to a deep study of two masters, Moulvi Rumi and Farid-ud-Din Attar, whose works inspired him to attempt his magnum opus, Bahr al Irfan (Ocean of intuition) in 80000 Persian couplets on spiritual insight.

Though Akmal is believed to have written ghazals also in Kashmiri, none of them has been retrieved so far. What, however, is ascribed to him by oral tradition as well as recent documentation, is a couple of lyrics of the 'Vatsun' type which, despite their folk-style, betray a fairly high standard of craftsmanship. Most probably he did not find his Persian suitable enough for writing mundane love songs, as is seen here in the lines addressed to Juma:

'The day has sunk, who are you waiting for/Frisk about, O tender lass, humming lilting lo lo/Lovelorn lass, I saw you go across the river-bed scattering flowers all around/May you prosper for my sake, and eye me likingly/Frisk about O tender lass, humming lilting lo lo.'

According to an anecdote, Akmal had a baker couple among his devoted disciples, and Juma, the female disciple, was a special favourite with him. She would often recite to him her own Kashmiri songs, and he felt he too should reciprocate. Hence the need to write in Kashmiri in preference to Persian.

Another lyric, popularly ascribed to Akmal, is a masterpiece of improvisation, typical of the unsophisticated folk-song. It employs not only a homespun language but also homely situations and metaphors which give us a glimpse of the lovelorn lass, viewing her lover from various vantage-points, the attic, the enclosing wall, the dais, the wayside.

MISHRA, BALDEVA (Maithili; b. 1890, d. 1973) was an essayists, a biographer and a critic. Born in a Mithila Brahmin family at Bangaon, Baldeva Mishra Jyotishacharya is to be distinguished from his namesake, the late Rajapandit Baldeva Mishra, an elderly contemporary (1887-1965). Both were renowned scholars of Sanskrit and are generally confused with each other. Baldeva Mishra Jyotishacharya had his early education at Bangaon and Madhipura. He moved to Banaras where he spent a major part of his life, and ultimately retired as a decipherment scholar from the Kashiprasad Jayswal Institute at Patna. He edited and translated into Hindi Aryabhattachiyam of Aryabhata. He belonged to the Moda group of writers and had been one of its regular contributors since 1910. Through his reminiscences, he has brought to light many unknown facts about Maithili which appeared now and then in various magazines. His association with his preceptors like Jenalal Choudhary and Sudhakar Dwivedi of Banaras stood him in good stead in his later life. His main publications are Ramayanasiksha (1939), Chanda Jha (1948), Sanskriti (1949), and several biographical and literary pieces later brought out by the Vaidehi Samiti, Darbhanga, in a book form as Research papers, in the series called 'Shyamanandan Sahaya Vyakhyanamala'. He also published a very comprehensive questionnaire on the history of Mithila. He has produced many thoughtful essays. He is rightly considered a prominent representative of the earlier generation.

His essays cover a wide range of interest. His best writings are those which aim to uphold some human virtues or moral lessons in the life of some characters or in certain episodes of the past. Some such essays are collected in the Ramayana, the Mahabharata siksha and Gappasappaviveka.

Though by profession an astronomer and a Sanskritist, in Maithili he has distinguished himself as an essayist.

the weekly magazine Jantantra, published from Rajnandgaon, and editor of Jan-bharati published from Calcutta for some time. He was a versatile writer and made distinctive contribution to Hindi literature. Some of his important publications are: shankar-digvijaya (Play, 1922); Jiv-vigyan (Essays, 1928); Samaj sewak (Play, 1932); Kaushal-kishore (Maha-kavya, 1934); Tulsi-darshan (Research thesis, 1938); Jivan-sangit (Kavya, 1940); Saket sant (Mahakavya, 1946); Chhattisgarh parichaya (Short stories, 1950); Omar Khayyam ki rubaiyan (Translation, 1951); Hridayabodh (Translation of kavya, 1951); Bharatiya sanskriti (Essays, 1952); Manas mein Ram katha (Essays, 1952); Antahsphurti (Kavya, 1954); Bharatiya sanskriti ko Goswamiji ka yogdan (Essays and lectures, 1957); Manas-madhuri (Essays, 1958); Shyam-shatak (1958); Brij-bhasha kavya, Ram-raja (Mahakavya, 1960); Vyang-vinod (Kavya, 1962).

The Governments of U.P. and M.P. gave him literary awards on many occasions. He published over 50 works.

MISHRABANDHU (Hindi). The term refers to the famous trio of three brothers, namely Ganesh Bihari Mishra, Shyam Bihari Mishra and Shukdev Bihari Mishra. Of the three the last two, Shyam Bihari (1873-1947) and Shukdev Bihari (1878-1951), were more actively engaged in literary pursuits. Born in the village Itaunja (Lucknow), the two brothers were educated at Canning College, Lucknow. Shyam Bihari Mishra took his M.A. in English from the Allahabad University, and later in 1937 the same University conferred on him an honorary Degree of D. Litt. In 1897 he was appointed Deputy Collector, followed by a number of other important positions in the Government. From 1924 to 1928 he was a member of the Council of State. The government conferred the title of Rai Bahadur and the Court of Orchha the title of Rao Raja on him. He was associated with a number of Universities. Shukdev Bihari Mishra took a degree in law in 1901 and practised law for a period of five years. He gave up the practice to join judicial service as a 'Munsif'. He was appointed the Diwan of Bharatpur, and for sometime served as a sub-judge also. In 1927, the British Government conferred the title of Rai Bahadur on him too. He also took a trip to Europe in 1930. He was also associated constantly with the Universities of Allahabad and Lucknow. The two brothers took interest in literature only as a hobby to start with, but ultimately it became a life-mission for them.

The significance of Mishrabandhu is mainly attributed to their critical writings and history of literature, but it is said they had written a large volume of poems also (a thousand pages in Braj bhasha and modern Hindi). The focal point of their interest, however, was history. They made good use of it in writing historical novels. The main feature of the seven novels written by them is the authenticity of historical events and characters though they could not penetrate deep into the subtle undercurrents of historic sensibility. These novels are thus largely a documentation of historical events through descriptions and dialogues.

Mishrabandhu also wrote a couple of plays. Shivaji is a historical play. Netronmeelan (1915), another play, reveals the atmosphere of the courts prevailing in those days.

Mishrabandhu, however, owe their fame to Hindi navaratna (1910-11), a pioneering work in Hindi criticism, and Mishrabandhu vinod (1913), a voluminous account of Hindi poets published in three volumes, containing the bio-data with brief introduction to the works of nearly 5000 poets. A fourth volume on modern poets was added to the series in 1934.

It is often remarked that the critical evaluation of poets in Hindi commenced with Hindi navaratna. Prior to it, there were two main styles prevalent in Hindi criticism: first the 'book-review' style of Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi and his contemporaries which mainly touched upon the flaws in the language; and second, the historical and analytical examination by western scholars and the Royal Asiatic Society. Mishrabandhu did not formulate any consistent or definite norms of evaluation, but they did go a step beyond Mahavirprasad Dwivedi's style of book reviewing while evaluating a number of major Hindi poets. They departed from Dwivedi's style of fault-finding and adopted a more appreciative tone. The task of adding perceptiveness to the concept of criticism was performed by Mishrabandhu. They took into account the emotional content, ideology, tone and poetic craft of a work under reference. They asserted that a critic had to take "many factors" into consideration apart from 'rasa', 'dhwani', 'guna', 'alankara', etc.

Mishrabandhu also introduced the judicial style of criticism, although Acharya Ramchandra Shukla was critical of the legislative role assumed by them. This style of criticism is apparent in Hindi navaratna. The choice of nine major poets and dividing them again into three categories, may appear arbitrary but it is, no doubt, significant. In Mishrabandhu vinod also they have placed poets under different categories, after enumerating the characteristics of each category. The authors, however, admit that the method of picking out poets in this manner has its own drawbacks since the method lacks objectivity of outlook. Mishrabandhu further admitted that they were very often faced with the dilemma of determining priorities among the categories themselves. There is always the danger of being impressionistic and Mishrabandhu also could not escape it. This style of criticism also involves comparison between different categories and poets. The authors have drawn comparisons not only with Hindi poets, but in certain cases with poets of European languages as well. The choice often lacks propriety, though some of the comparisons are interesting, e.g. comparison of Tulsidas with Shakespeare. Mishrabandhu followed the principles of Indian poetics in their criticism. They were also greatly concerned about the development of an independent critical style in Hindi. On more than one occasion, they declared that an independent style, free from Sanskrit poetics, already exists in Hindi criticism. They extended these arguments to advocate the use of a simple, lucid, spoken language of the masses, free from the influence of Sanskrit.

They have also offered some very elaborate and poignant commentaries on certain poets in Vinod and Navratna. Instead of pointing out grammatical mistakes and flaws in the language of poets, they have tried to explore the literary quality of the language.

Mishrabandhu vinod was subjected to a lot of criticism by later historians, particularly Ramchandra Shukla. The fact, however, remains that the posterity, including Shukla himself, owes a lot to Mishrabandhu. Ramchandra Shukla has drawn heavily on Mishrabandhu vinod in his analysis of 'Riti' poets—a fact which he has also admitted. Mishrabandhu had the commonsense not to call Mishrabandhu vinod a 'History of Literature', although in the introduction to the volume, they referred to the earlier histories and analysed the social circumstances and background of a poet. Their effort to divide the entire literary history broadly into some broad periods also paved the way for later historians to arrive at a more scientific division and classification of literary periods.

N.J.

MISHRABANDHU VINOD (Hindi). Three brothers Ganesh Bihari Mishra, Shyam Bihari Mishra and Shukadeva Bihari Mishra jointly wrote a unique book, entitled Mishrabandhu vinod. Its uniqueness lies in the fact that though authored by three men, it maintains lucidity in thought and structure. Published in four volumes, it contains more than two thousand pages. The first three volumes appeared in 1913, covering the historical data on Hindi literature available till then for the period ranging from 650 A.D. to 1868 A.D. In 1934 the fourth and the last volume was published which contained the bio-data of poets and writers up to 1920. Among books on the history of Hindi literature it has the fourth place, but in the order of critical writings on the subject it has the distinction of being the first. Its title is a misnomer for not being indicative of its concern either with history or with criticism. This is not done deliberately to create any confusion, but the authors did not intend to make their work a historical or chronological document. They submitted humbly that they were not competent enough to undertake such a work. They wrote in the introduction to the first volume: "After due consideration of the seriousness of historical writing, we feel we have no such capability to write on the history of a literature". In reality, however, the work is no mere pastime of literature, but a voluminous chronological document on poets.

The credit to write first the history of Hindi literature goes to the French scholar, Garcen De' Tassy, Shiva Singh Sainger and Sir George Grierson. In the works of these scholars the historical perception is almost negligible or inadequate. Tassy mentions only the names of a few well-known poets in his History of Hindustani Literature. Sainger gives a brief introductory account of about a thousand poets. Grierson in his Modern Vernacular Literature of Northern Hindustan gives a historical account of about one thousand years of Hindi literature. Against such a background, one has to recognise the importance of these brothers, known as Mishrabandhu, who collected the details of more than four and a half thousand writers and their writings. In its compass, their book excels all earlier works on this subject.

The scientific outlook essential for writing a history of literature is what the Mishrabandhus lack. There is no reference in their book to the socio-political and religious climate of the age under discussion. It does not make either any analysis of the literary trends embedded in the mancurrents of the time. This is not to belittle the efforts of the Mishrabandhus in collecting and presenting chronologically the bio-data of several thousand big and small poets. Their long and sustained effort is praiseworthy. Even though Acharya Ramachandra Shukla passed strictures on their classification of literary periods, the truth is he himself was indebted to them for historical data. Even later historiographers like Shyamsundar Das, Hazari Prasad Dwivedi, Ramashankar Shukla, Ramkumar Verma, Acharya Vishvanath Prasad Mishra, Ganapatichandra Gupta and many others have held the work in high esteem and many research scholars have benefitted from it.

MISHRA, BHAVANIPRASAD (Hindi; b. 1913, d. 1985) was educated at Narsimhapur in Madhya Pradesh. He received his B.A. degree from Robertson College, Jabalpur, took active part in the freedom struggle, edited Kalpana (1953-1955), and later joined the All India Radio as producer from 1956 to 1958. He was also Deputy Chief Editor of the Sampurna Gandhi vangmaya (collected works of Mahatma Gandhi) from 1958 to 72. As a poet, he shows close awareness of the environment around him. The first poet in the anthology, Dusra sapatak, he is best known for his grasp of the contemporary situation and a fresh approach to the sublime and the beautiful. His sympathy with the common man puts him in the tradition of Khusrau, Kabir, Rahim, Mira, Bharatendu and Maith-ilisharan Gupta. Philosophy and understanding of life in its various facets, social as well as political, lie as undercurrents in his poetry, but never do they overpower his poetic sensibility. In his poems, he is never overtly aggressive, though the note of protest is ever present, as distinct in 1970 as it was in 1937 when his early poems first shot him to fame. By his own admission he does not consider style as important as content, and insists on an easy communication between the writer and the reader. His poetic diction is, therefore, simple and effective. The pure musical quality of the poems does not, however, suffer in the process, nor does the heavy emphasis on communication make his language suffer from oversimplification. This is one of the major achievements of a poet in an age when complex sensations lead one often to an exclusive sort of expression intelligible only to a chosen few. Gitpharosh is his first collection of poems published in 1956 and may be considered a characteristic work of the poet. The influence of Sarvodaya and Gandhism may be seen in a few poems here. This collection was followed by Chakit hai dukh (1968), Andheri kavitayein and Gandhi panchshati (1969). The poet's latest works include Buni hui rassi, Vyaktigat, Khushbu ke shilalekh and a short narrative poem based on the new interpretation of the historical character of king Ashoka.

His other works are Anam tum aate ho, Parivartan jiye, Trikal sandhya and a short epic poem Kaljayi. Buni hui rassi won him the Sahitya Akademi Award (1972). The other awards that he received were the Madhya Pradesh Government Award (1972), Ghalib Award (1973) and the Delhi Sahitya Kala Parishat Award (1973).

Though, at times, his excessive fondness for a language close to ordinary speech gives his poems a certain prosaic quality, Bhavaniprasad Mishra's poetry at its best will be remembered as an important stage in the development of Nai Kavita in Hindi.

MISHRA, CHANDRANATH (Maithili; b. 1925), better known by his pen name 'Amar' was born at village Khojpur in Madhubani. He has now permanently settled down in Misartola, Darbhanga (Bihar). After obtaining the title of 'Acharya' in Sanskrit grammar, he joined the M.L. Academy, Laheriasarai in 1947 as a Maithili teacher and continued there till his retirement in 1983. His first composition, a poem entitled 'Chasma san' appeared in 'Mithila Mihir' in 1940. Enrichment of Maithili language and literature and encouragement of new writers are the two-fold objectives of his life. He has popularised Maithili by reciting his poems in gatherings throughout the country. In 1958-59 he was the principal Secretary of the All India Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Darbhanga. He is the founder-member of 'Navaratna Gosthi', a famous literary organisation credited with a number of publications in Maithili. He is a regular writer of the humour and satire columns in some leading periodicals. He entered Maithili literature with humorous and satirical poems, and established himself as a serious writer of poems, novels, short stories, one-act plays, and works in other genres of literature. He has edited a number of periodicals and books. His works published in the book-form are: five collections of poems, Gudgudi (1945), Yugachakra, (1950), Ritupriya (1963), Unata pal (1974) and Ashadisha (1977); two novels, Vira kanya (1948) and Bidagari (1971); one collection of short stories, Jalasamadhi (1972); three histories, Maithili andolan: Ek sarvekshan (1962), Maithili Sahitya parisadak sankshipta itihas (1969) and Maithili patrakaritaka itihas (1981); and one biography, M.M. Muralidhar Jha (1980). He got the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1983 for his work Maithili patrakaritaka itihas.

As a writer of humour and satire, his main themes are political and social evils, selfishness and corruption. The best example in this genre are the poems in Yugachakra. His other book, Ritupriya, describes in a new style seasonal variations in nature. It reflects the poet's power of imagination and his skill in minute description. His Ashe-dishe is a mature work, which includes some patriotic poems and satirical lyrics of great power. He is a apathetic to the new trend of poetry called 'Nai kavita'. Lucid expression, choicest diction, attractive style and charming versification make him a poet of high order.

His novels deal with marital evils, and his short stories, sometimes serious and some times light, attract the reader mainly by their humour and satire. He has a rare collection of old Maithili periodicals and books which should be a great help to Maithili scholars.

MISHRA, CHAUDHURY HEMAKANTA (Oriya; b. 1934), humorist, was born in a zamindar family of Bheda. He passed his M.A. in Psychology and obtained the degree of Doctor of Industrial Psychology. A writer of short stories and belles-lettres, he is well-known for his satire and homour. His writings include Nishiddha pustaka (The forbidden book), Aghatana, (Chance happening), Terachagalpa (The crooked stories), Bhalluka-ra pura pant o anyanya maja galpa (Full pants of the wolf and other interesting stories). He contributes essays to the leading journals of Orissa. His latest publication is Chaudhury Hemakanta Misranka shreshtha galpa (1979).

MISHRA, DHARANIDHARA (Oriya; late 16th century) was the author of one of the earliest Oriya translations of the celebrated Gitagovinda of Jayadeva. In this work

MISHRA, DIBAKAR-MISHRA, GODAVARISHA

Dharanidhara recast the subject-matter of the twelve Sargas of the original Sanskrit work in sixteen Chhandas composed in different Oriya metres. The rendering is almost literal and most of the words employed in the original text have been retained. The translation has the same lucidity of diction as the original and with its pleasant music produces the same sentimental effect. Of about half-a-dozen translations of the time, now available, Dharanidhara's translation is the most popular and is, for its antiquity, an evidence in support of the contention that Orissa was the homeland of Jayadeva.

MISHRA, DIBAKAR (Oriya; b.1466, d.c.1500), also known as Kavichandra Ray, an eminent Sanskrit poet and dramatist, was the court poet of Purusottamadeva, the king of Orissa (1466-1497). His most well-known lyrical drama was Abhinavagitagovinda (1494).

Among his other works are: Lakshmanadarsa mahakavya, Prabhabati natakam, Parijataharm patakam, Haricharita champu, Rasa manjari, Dhruva charita and Devi shatakam. None of the literary works of Dibakar Mishra has yet been published.

MISHRA, DWARKAPRASAD (Hindi; b. 1901, d. 1987), born in a Kanyakubja brahmin family of Unnao district in Uttar Pradesh, was a poet, a journalist, an educationist, a politician, a freedom-fighter, a parliamentarian, an administrator, a scholar, a historian. Builder of modern Madhya Pradesh, he was its Home Minister in its first constituted Congress cabinet in 1937, its Home Minister and Education Minister again during 1946-1951, and its Chief Minister later during 1963-1967. He was also Vice-Chancellor of Sagar University during 1956-1962. As a journalist, he edited a monthly magazine, Shree Sharda, a daily paper, Lokamat, and a weekly Sarathi for many years. He was deeply interested in Indian culture, philosophy and history. He was Chairman of the Madhya Pradesh Hindi Sahitya Sammelan, and was decorated with the highest award of Sahitya Vachaspati by the All India Hindi Sahitya Sammelan. His writings include besides Krishnayan, Tulsi ke Ram aur Sita, Swasti, Sandesh, Anundita, Dharmakshetre Kurukshetre. His Studies in the Proto-History of India in English, translated into Hindi as Bhartiya adya itihasa ka addhyayan, and his autobiography, Living an Era, in English are important contributions, one to the proto-history of India and the other to the political history of the country in our own times. Krishnayan, the renowned epic in Avadhi, is a new land-mark in Bhakti tradition. It depicts Krishna as leader of the people and their protector, besides being a traditional benefactor of man. The writer thus gives a new dimension to both Avadhi dialect and Bhakti literature. His Anundita is a lucid and impressive translation of more than seven hundred chosen verses in Doha.

MISHRA, GIRINDRAMOHAN (Maithili; b.1888, d.1981), born at village Behta in Darbhanga district, came from a famous family of Shakadvipiya brahmins. He matriculated from Raj School, Darbhanga, graduated from Patna College and earned Kavyatirtha from Government Sanskrit College, Calcutta. He studied Sanskrit literature under M.M. Ramavatar Sharma and Indian Philosophy under M.M. Chitrardhar Mishra. Then he studied law at Patna where he was fortunate to have class-mates like Rajendra Prasad, former President of India, and Srikrishana Singh, Ex-Chief Minister of Bihar. In his college life, he was active in students organisation, and was one of the founder members of the Bihar Students Association. He was instrumental in running the Mithila-Mihir, a bilingual weekly, dedicated to the cause of Maithili as well as Hindi. His public services in the capacity of Chairman of Darbhanga Municipality and as member of the Bihar Legislative Council are unforgettable. He established himself as a Maithili and Hindi writer through a number of writings appearing in several leading literary periodicals of his time. This is why Lakshmi Narayan Sudhanshu, noted literary genius and ex-Speaker of the Bihar Legislative Assembly, dedicated his work Navarasa to him. While he was Chairman of All India Maithili Sahitya Parishad, Maithili language and literature made good progress. In 1975 he won the Sahitya Akademi Award on his memoirs Kichhu lekhal kichhu sunal. One of his lectures delivered at the instance of Harinandan Singh Memorial Trust was highly appreciated. A number of literary, educational and social institutions founded and patronised by him are living memorials to his name.

MISHRA, GODAVARISHA (Oriya; b.1886, d.1956), statesman and litterateur, was born in a poor family, passed his early days in poverty, did his M.A. and studied law in the Calcutta University. Immediately after this he joined a group of patriotic teachers at the newly founded nationalist school at Satyabadi.

MISHRA, GOVINDA-MISHRA, KAMAPALA

Mishra's literary works include translated prose works. He translated some famous biographies and fiction from English. His short stories, such as 'Panu Misra' and 'Tola Kania', drew the attention of the people to the old social problems and superstitions. The two historical plays he wrote, namely Mukunda Deva (1917) and Purusottama Deva were designed to depict the Gajapati kings as ideal nationalist heroes to suit the temper of the time. He also wrote for the children. His stories from the Ramayana and the Mahabharata became very popular with children. He edited and published two journals, Lokamukha (1924) and Janata (1941). He was also associated with the editorial work of the Samaja. His first poem 'Saraswati abahana' appeared in the Utkala sahitya in 1909. Collections of his poems include Kalika (1921), Kisalaya (1922) and Gitiguccha (1957). Some of these are works of translation. 'Samyoi tire sakale', 'Nidagha sarasi', 'Kasiyatri' and 'Jaa' are some of his great lyrics. Greater still are his elegies such as 'Nimisaka dekha', 'Hoithanta' and 'Tha babu' which record the pathetic pinings of a loving teacher at the passing away of a dear pupil. But Godavarisha Mishra will be remembered for ever as the pioneer of 'gathakabita' (verse-tales) based on themes picked up from history and legends. On this score 'Kalijai' 'Abhirama Simha', 'Padmavati' and 'Bikrama Simha' are matchless creations which have a mass appeal peculiar only to folk literature because of their simple and unsophisticated style, the fine lyric touches and noble sentiments. His auto-biography, Ardhasatabdir Odisha O tanhire mo sthan, though incomplete, won him posthumously the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1961. All his works have been compiled in Godavarisha granthavali in four volumes.

G.C.U.

MISHRA, GOVINDA (Assamese; 17th century), is widely known as the author of Misra-gita or Pada-gita for his lucid metrical rendering of the Srimad Bhagavatgita into Assamese. He has left no information regarding himself and his family. It is a fact that his family hailed from the present district of Kamrup in Western Assam. He was a Sanskrit scholar of considerable repute but preferred to write in his own language for the edification of the ordinary readers and listeners. There are two opinions regarding his family identity. One that can be easily discarded is that he was the father of Srirama Ata belonging to the Kalasamhati branch of the Assam Vaishnavism who founded Ahataguri satra in eastern Assam towards the middle of the seventeenth century. According to this tradition Govinda Mishra's father's name was Tarapati and his grandfather was Kalapachandra.

Against this version it is enough to say that the family of Srirama Ata hailed from eastern Assam and he himself was a disciple of Gopala Ata, the founder of the Kalasamhati branch. On the other hand, Govinda Mishra categorically tells us that he was a disciple of Bhattadeva, the father of Assamese prose, and therefore belonged to the Damodari branch of the Assam Vaishnavism. As he was a disciple of Bhattadeva (1558-1638), Govinda Mishra can be reasonably placed between 1580-1650.

Govinda Mishra translated the entire Gita into Assamese in the prevailing Assamese metres, viz; pada, duladi and chabi, in a language which the common people understood. While rendering it he took the help of four commentaries which he names as those of Shankara, Bhaskara, Hanumat and Anandagiri over and above the devotion-biased commentary of Sridharaswami. It may be mentioned that being partial to the devotional approach the Vaishnavas of Assam accepted Sridhara's commentaries on the Gita and the Bhagavata and respected them. Naturally, therefore, Govinda Mishra interprets the Gita with a devotional bias. Of course, he has not failed to utilize other commentaries mentioned by him whenever and wherever he considered Sridhara's commentary inadequate.

The second work by him, so far known, is the metrical rendering of the Sanskrit devotional work Bhakti-viveka by Bhattadeva explaining and elaborating the nine-fold bhakti and other elements connected with it, such as the necessity of Sharana, indispensability of a guru, desirability of worshipping a personal God, etc. Bhattadeva compiled this work collecting relevant verses from the puranas, the epics and the upanishads. Govinda Misra not only translated the original verses but also the commentary of Bhattadeva, adding his own elaboration where he felt it necessary. Of the two extant works, Mishra's rendering of the Gita is more popular, and numerous copies of this work are found all over Assam.

MISHRA, KAMAPALA (Oriya; b. 1875 d. 1927), son of Pandit Damodara Mishra and Gayatri Devi, passed the B.A. Examination from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, in 1897, worked for some time as Sub-Divisional Officer in the State of Mayurbhanj, passed the B.L. Examination from Cuttack in 1908 and joined the bar. After a short period he lost his mental balance. He was temporarily cured and then served for some years as the Head Master of Talcher High School.

Steeped in traditional culture, well-versed in Sanskrit and Oriya, he was a keen lover of music and drama. He was a gifted singer of the traditional Oriya songs like the champus and chhandas. His first literary work was a poem, a 'kavya', named Apurva swapna (The unique dream) followed by his first drama, Sita bibaha (The marriage of Sita), both written while he was a student. Sita bibaha, published in 1899, is a drama of five Acts which presents Sita from her childhood and deals with her marriage with Rama and her journey with him to Ayodhya. It has an almost traditional introduction or Brastavana setting forth the theme through the song of a dancing 'nati'. But there is no 'Sutradhara' in it. Following his predecessor Ramshankar Ray and the Shakespearean tradition, Kamapala has often used blank verse in dialogues. Though his blank verse is occasionally uneven and faulty in rhythm, it is better than that of Ramshankar. As in Sanskrit dramas, here, too, the friends of Sita are seen engaged in plucking flowers or cracking jokes with Sita. A Vidushaka is introduced. The mythological theme is treated with a bold originality. The miracle element, usual in mythological dramas, are comparatively less evident. There is no song from the Nepathya. Asides and whispered speeches are rare. The influence of the folk plays is seen in the presence of a rather large number of songs in the drama.

Basanta latika was published by the author's son Umakant Mishra in 1933 but it had been written as early as 1913. It was first staged by the Balanga Theatre Party. It is semi-historical in theme depicting an imaginary tale of palace intrigue. In dialogue and craftsmanship, as also in the art of depicting varied emotions, it is superior to Sita bibaha. It has no conventional 'nata' or 'nati' in the 'prastavana'. Instead, Kamapala introduces Parvati and the Rajalakshmi of the Mayurbhanj royal family. In this drama, too, blank verse is introduced. Harishchandra of Kamapala Mishra, written in 1902, though never published, was staged more than once. It is a drama in five Acts with mythological characters like Harishchandra, Shaivya and Rohitasva and imaginary characters like Mangalya, Kalapi and Varana. Reformistic and realistic in approach, it is critical of the coarseness and vulgarity of the contemporary folk dramas and of the growing moral degeneration, religious corruption and the arrogance of the Brahmins. Kamapala Mishra's last two works are a drama named Durga sarari and a novel named Prabhamayee

MISHRA, KASHIKANT 'MADHUP' (Maithili; b. 1906) is in some ways the most 'poetic' of all modern poets. He has written his literary autobiography recently in verse, Prerana-punja (1980). He was born in village Koilakh in Madhubani district, but has lived all his life in his mother's native village Korthu in district Darbhanga. He was educated in the traditional style of a Sanskrit scholar of Mithila in his own village Koilakh. Later, he went to Lohna Vidyapith and then to Devghan. Finally, he passed the Acharya examination from Muzaffarpur. He became a teacher at Sanskrit Vidyalaya, Simra, district Muzaffarpur, in 1939. He passed the Shastri examination in Vedanta also. From 1940 to 1977 he served as an Assistant School Master at Jayananda High School, Bahera. Since his retirement he has been living at Korthu.

'Madhup' was a precocious young boy. He began versifying even when he was in the primary classes. In later years his power as an 'Ashukavi' (instant composer of verses) grew and he turned out line after line, book after book. He received the Government of India's award on his poem Tribeni in 1954. The Maharajadhiraj of Darbhanga gave him a prize on Kobara-gita, and Babu Krishnandev Singh on his collection of poems, Shatadala. He received the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1970 on his epic Radha-viraha, and the Maithili Academy's Vidyapati Award for 1983 on his autobiography Prerana-punja in 1983.

His first important collection of poems was published in 1941 and since then he has been publishing at least one volume of poems every year. The range of his poetry is naturally very wide—poems for popular consumption, and poems for the most fastidious scholars. The style varies from regular versification to irregular free verse, and the topics cover from social and occasional matter to literary topics from traditional Pauranic and historical sources. He is master of the lyric. His conception of the khandakavya and mahakavya have dimensions which may be called sublime. In recent years he has made himself famous as a poet of the Karuna rasa. His best poem in this field is 'Ghasala athanni' (1938), i.e. the worn-out eight anna piece.

The important poetic collections of 'Madhup' come under three categories: first, the popular poems, such as, Apurva rasagulla (1941), Tataka jilabi (1945), Pachamera (1949), Chaunki chuppe (1966) and Bola bam (1981); second, the literary works, such as, Radha-viraha (1969); third, the middle type which includes works, avoiding both artificial ornamentation and cheap popularity, such as, Jhankara (1942), Shatadala (1944), Dvadashi (1979) and Prerana-punja (1980).

A substantial portion of Madhup's poetry is still unpublished, but the poems which have already seen the light of the day deserve close study. His innate gifts of expression and poetic fervour can never be challenged.

MISHRA, KRISHNABIHARI-MISHRA, MADHAVPRASAD

MISHRA, KRISHNABIHARI (Hindi; B. 1890, d. 1959), was one of the stalwarts of early Hindi criticism published mostly in periodicals. He received his B.A. and LL.B. degrees from Lucknow and Allahabad. He was fortunate in having a literary environment around him. His father Rasikbehari Mishra, a lover of literature, influenced him to a considerable extent. From his very student days, he started writing in the periodical, Samrat. Later, his articles appeared in Maryada, Indu, Abhyuthan, *Vishalbhara*t, and other leading periodicals. After practising Law from 1917 to 1924, he joined the journal Madhuri as co-editor with Munshi Premchand. In collaboration with his younger brothers, Vipinbihari and Navalbihari, he also published a quarterly, Hindi samalochana. Besides, he was connected with the editorial department of the daily Aaj. His scholarship and critical faculties are best seen in his well-known work, Dev aur Bihari, which ranks among the noteworthy works of comparative criticism. Besides, his critical articles were published in various periodicals and journals. Some of the best known pieces are 'Matiram ka gaj varnan', 'Kabir aur Bihari', 'Sahitya darpan ki vimala tika', and 'Brajbhasha sahitya ka sanrakshan'. These articles provide ample proof of his deep understanding and appreciation of medieval Hindi literature. Among his other books Matiram granthavali, Ganga-bharan, Natnagar vinod, Navras tarang, Mohan vinod and Cheen ka itihas deserve special mention.

R.N.S.

MISHRA, LAKSHMINARAYAN (Hindi; b. 1903). Among the Hindi playwrights Lakshmi Narayan is worth mentioning after Bharatendu Harishchandra and Jayashankar Prasad. He was born at Basti (U.P.) in a respectable wealthy family. Perhaps, this accounts for his family pride and a respect for the tradition reflected in the prefaces of his plays. He graduated from Banaras and obtained the LL.B. degree from Allahabad. While in Banaras, he came in contact with many poets and writers who inspired him for creative writing. He began his literary career with a poetic composition Antarjagat at the age of eighteen. Then he made his debut in the field of drama. His first play Ashoka was published in 1926. Thereafter his playwriting continued for half a century, i.e. till 1976. He has produced 23 plays and three collections of short stories. His plays may be classified in the following groups on the basis of their themes:

(i) Mythological plays: Narad ki vina, Chakravyuh, Chitrakut, Aparajit, Dharati ka hridaya, Ganga dwar, Saryu ki dhar. (ii) Historical plays: Ashoka, Garudadhvaj, Dasashwamedh, Vatsaraj, Vitasta ki Laharen, Jagad-guru, Bharatendu, Mrityunjaya, Vaishali main vasant. (iii) Social (Problem) plays: Sanyasi, Rakshas ka mandir, Sindoor ki holi, Mukti ka rahasya, Rajayog, Aadhi rata.

A play can be said to be a mirror of life. In this mirror we find reflected both contemporary contexts and traditions of ages. This criterion, when applied to his plays, reveals that almost all of them display the entire mentality of the present age against the backdrop of the past.

In Ashoka and Narad ki veena the dramatist has focused on the question of harmony among people by depicting clashes between the Hindus and the Buddhists and between the Aryans and the non-Aryans respectively. The plays thus express the present-day need for commercial and racial unity. Likewise, his Vitasta ki laharen pleads for an integrated world culture through the coordination of the Greek and the Aryan cultures. The love for harmony starts off with the life of an individual. This the writer illustrates in his play Vatsaraj. In the character of Udayan the dramatist has portrayed the art of blending worldly pleasure and ascetic renunciation. In fact, Mishra's historical and mythological plays show the sublime and the magnificent aspects of Indian culture.

It is widely acknowledged that Lakshmi Narayan Mishra is the father of Hindi problem plays. His true representative work in this genre is said to be Sindoor ki holi. To write a problem play was a new experiment in Hindi dramaturgy which grew in importance in course of time. In his problem plays Mishra exposes various aspects of contemporary society, such as problems of women, sex, co-education, marriage, social disparity, illegal offspring. In these plays Mishra was inspired by the works of Ibsen and Bernard Shaw, but the western influence is only in the extrinsic form, since the inner core of his plays is purely Indian. The dramatist has used the western dramatic technique in his use of stage directions, division of play into acts and scenes, make-up of characters, histrionic art, creation of environment, etc. But his characters, though realistic, tend to be idealistic. In each of his problem plays, there is an ideal character who imbibes fully the impact of Indian culture.

In his one-act plays Mishra has chosen the problems of modern life for his themes. The collections are entitled Pralaya ke pankha par, Ashoka vana and bhagawan Manu tatha anya ekanki. In the first two collections a couple of one-act plays deal with the issues of rural life and the rest with the problems of the women. In the last collection, 'Bhagwan Manu', 'Yagyavalkya', 'Kautilya' and 'Acharya Shankar, etc. are concerned with the glorious torch-bearers of Indian culture. Mention may also be made of his incomplete epic Senapati Karna. In fact, Mishra's contribution to Hindi dramaturgy is of great significance.

V.A.

MISHRA, MADHAVPRASAD (Hindi; b. 1871, d. 1907), was an eminent Hindi essayist, biographer and stylist. He was born in the village of Koongad in Haryana. He studied privately with his scholar-father Ramjidas, and several other able gurus. He was an erudite scholar of Sanskrit, and a staunch Sanatanist. He was editor of Sudarshan (Varanasi, 1900) which continued briefly for about two years, and later, of Vaishyopakararak in which his essays and other prose writings regularly appeared. He expressed his views fearlessly and in a forceful manner and did not hesitate to disagree with even Acharya Mahavir-prasad Dwivedi and Waber, the European Indologist. He did not spare even Swami Ramtirtha, Madan Mohan Malviya, and Shridhar Pathak.

He edited Sudarshan, a periodical, laying sound foundations for Hindi journalism. The early poems of Mahavirprasad Dwivedi and Maithilisharan Gupta appeared in it. He tried his hand at poetry and drama also, but with little success.

His short story 'Larki ki bahaduri' (Bravery of a girl) has been acclaimed as the first perfect Hindi story with a modern approach. His Vishuddha charitavali (1903) is the biography of Swami Vishuddhanand, while Madhava Mishra nibandhaval is a collection of miscellaneous essays and other prose-writings.

He made a significant contribution to Hindi prose and its style at the turn of the century. Babu Balmukund Gupta, Chandradhar Sharma 'Guleri', Acharya Ramchandra Shukla and others paid high compliments to him. His style ranged from the highly Sanskritised tradition of the Sanskrit poet, Bana, to the chaste flow of Khari Boli with a sprinkling of such Urdu words as have been absorbed in the main stream of Hindi.

R.L.K.

MISHRA, MANAMOHAN (Oriya, b. 1920), popular poet and author, was educated at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack. He did his M.A. in English from Patna University in 1943. He joined the freedom movement while he was a student and was jailed more than once. His journalistic and literary career began with his political activities from the early 40s. He was a representative of The Times of India and The Hindustan Standard in Orissa and edited The Congress (1957) and the Kalinga (1960-62). He was involved in the World Peace Movement and afterwards worked for labour welfare. He travelled widely in the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia, France, England, East Germany, West Germany and China. He picked up the progressive trends in literature. His poetical collections include Koti kanthe (In the voice of many, 1948), Awaj (1950) and Nua gapatie lekha (1953). He has written a biography of Stalin (1953). His translated works are Manushya daitya (1946) and Rusiya kavitali (Russian Poems, 1967). His only story-collection is Ei desir matire (In the soil of this country, 1947). He wrote an excellent political discourse Gala mahayuddha o ta pare (The last World War and after, 1946) and two treatises on language, namely Chalanti bhashar prayog (1968) and Chalanti bhashar bijnan (1969).

K.C.B.

MISHRA, PRATAPNARAIN (Hindi; b. 1856, d. 1894), was born in the Baijegaon village of Unnao district (Uttar Pradesh). He received no regular education, but acquired a good knowledge of Hindi, Urdu, Persian and English. He also knew Sanskrit, Marathi, Punjabi and Bengali and translated a good many novels into Hindi. He regarded Bharatendu as his 'guru', and was attracted towards literature by reading his journal, Kavivachan sudha. He learnt prosody from Lalitji of Kanpur, and in the beginning composed 'Alhas' and 'Lavis'. He was a reformist in literature and his works are predominantly didactic, though not dull. There is also a touch of humour and satire in his writings. In order to propagate Nagari, he started a journal, entitled Brahman, in 1883. Most of his works became popular through this journal. In 1889, Madan Mohan Malviya invited him to join the staff of Hindustan, then published at Kalakankar. He worked there for about a year, and then returned to his own Brahman. Through this journal, he gave an impetus to Bharatendu's movement and the Swadeshi dynamism. Beside, he wrote for it essays rich in wit and humour. His literary essays are subjective in approach, and are written in an intimate style even on common topics such as, 'Dant', 'Ta-Ta', 'Do vriddha stree', 'Balak', 'Nari', 'Atmagaurav', 'Manoyog'. The language is idiomatic and has a touch of the dialect. His published works are:

Poetry: Prem pushapavali, Man ki lehar, Lokokti shehar, Kanpur mahatmya, Swagtante, Bradlay swagat, Trupyamatam, Shri Prempuran, Holi hai, Shringar vilas; plays: Kali kautuk, Hathi hamir, Bharat durdasha, Sangit Shakuntal (free translation).

R.N.S.

MISHRA, RAMCHANDRA (Oriya; b. 1915) or Phaturananda, which is his pen-name, is a well-known humorist and satirist. Having studied for an L.M.P. diploma first, he obtained his B.A. degree from Utkal University. As a young man he was greatly fond of mechanical gadgets and aspired to become a mechanic. But he had to give up the idea in favour of literary pursuits when he suddenly lost his eyesight. His career as a humorous writer began with the publication of a poem called 'Kavi ladhei' (Poets fighting) in the Dagara, a literary monthly with which he has been closely associated for the last forty years. His first humorous stories were published continuously in the Dagara after the magazine shifted its office from Bhadrak to Cuttack in 1949. He became famous with the publication of his first book which was a novel called Nakata chitrakara (The noseless painter) in 1953. It deals with the story of an ugly looking painter, his romantic involvement with a sophisticated girl and his subsequent frustrations. Though sentimental at places, the narrative is characterised by an almost Dickensian blend of humour and pathos. Nakata chitrakara was followed by Sahitya chasha (Growing literary crops) and Heresha (The shameless one) in 1959, Bidushaka (The messenger) and Mangalabaria sahiyasamsada (The Tuesday literary club) in 1963. Hasakura (The giggling one) in 1972, Brihat bhanda (The great bluffer) and Amrita behia (The shameless) in 1977 and Vote in 1980—all collections of humorous stories. Phaturananda directs his humorous and satirical attacks mostly at literary personages, their follies and pretensions and quarrels over petty issues. His poems, Nilatha kavi (The shameless poet, 1954) has the same theme. His stories are thus repetitive in respect of the situations they create, and not entirely free from a crude kind of wit. But he is never bitter or cynical about his victims. Very often he is self-critical, knows his own limitations, and does not hesitate to laugh at himself. Broadly speaking, the chief target of his attack is the contemporary youth, wild, undisciplined and frantically looking for an identity in the wrong quarters. One of the main sources of humour in his works is the typical language he uses—almost a sub-dialect spoken by the original inhabitants of Cuttack. Phaturananda knows Bengali, Hindi and Sanskrit, besides English. He is a cartoonist and has held several exhibitions of his cartoons. He was the founder Secretary of Sarasa Sahitya Samiti, an organisation devoted to creation and popularisation of humorous writing.

MISHRA, RAMADARASHA (Hindi; b. 1924). A poet, a critic, and a novelist, Ramadarasha Mishra was born in a lower middle-class family at Dumri (Gorakhpur) in Uttar Pradesh. He had his early education at a village school, and did his M.A. in Hindi from the Banaras Hindu University, and Ph.D. in 1956. He was a Lecturer at M.S. University, Baroda, and later at St. Xavier's College, Ahmadabad. He remained there until 1964, when he moved to Delhi. He is well-versed in Gujarati, Hindi, and English.

His elder brother was the main source of encouragement to him. Abject poverty, superstitions, backwardness and social customs of eastern U.P. find an expression in his writings. Though a poet at heart, he has not allowed romanticism to dominate realistic trends in his stories and novels. Without over-playing local colour, he has gone deep into the changing pattern of the rural life of eastern U.P. The main concern of his poems is dehumanization of life and gross neglect of the environment.

Ramadarasha Mishra is a prolific writer. His works are: Novels Pani ke prachir (1961), Jal tutta hua (1969), Bich ka samaya (1970), Sukhata hua talab (1972), Apne log (1976), Raat ka safar (1976), Akash ki chat (1979). Collections of Poems: Path ke git (1951), Bairang benam chitthiyan (1963), Pak gayi hai dhup (1969), Kandhe par suraj (1977). Collections of stories: Khali ghar (1968), Ek vah (1974), Dincharya (1979), Sarpa dansh (1982), Essays: Kitne baje hain (1982). Criticism: Hindi alochana ka itihasa (1960), Hindi samiksha, swarup aur sandarbha (1964), Hindi upanyas ek antaryatra (1968), Hindi kahani: Antarang Pahichan (1966), Chayavad ka rachnalok (1981), Sahitya: sandarbha aur mulya (1960), Adhunik Hindi sahitya: Samvedana aur drashti (1974), Hindi kavita: adhunik ayam (1976), Aitihasik upanyasakar Vrindavanlal Verma (1962), Jahan main khara hoon.

He got awards from Uttar Pradesh Hindi Sansthan (Lucknow), Hindi Academy (Delhi), Authors Guild of India (New Delhi) and Nagari Pracharini Sabha (Devariya).

MISHRA, SADAL (Hindi; b. 1767, d. 1847) was one of the four (the other three being Insha, Lallu Lal and Sadasukh Lal) earliest pioneers of modern Hindi prose, who according to Ram Chandra Shukla 'tried to write in a language that conformed to its daily use. In spite of the numerous drawbacks of his language his prose 'reflects in its entirety the accepted form of Hindi prose....With a little retouching here and there, his language could well be moulded into the prose style of today... As such he occupies an important historical place in the development of modern Hindi prose.

Son of Pt. Nandmani, Sadal Mishra belonged to a family of Shakdwipiya Brahmin's of Shahabad, district Bihar. Employed as a teacher in the Hindustani department of the Fort William College, Calcutta. History records his name as the author of Nasiketopakhyan alias Chandrawati (1803) and Ramcharit (1806). The episode of Nasiket finds mention in Yajurveda, Kathopanishad and the puranas. Sadal Mishra rendered it into an independent story in Khariboli for the benefit of Hindi readers. His style is poetic and engaging. His other work, viz. Ramcharit, is the Hindi version of Adhyatma Ramayan. It was composed at the instance of Gilchrist in a language free from Arabic and Persian elements. Sadal Mishra granthavali published by the Bihar Rashtra Bhasha Parishad in 1960 comprises the above two works, apart from his other less known writings.

Shyamsundar Das's assessment of Sadal places him, in order of importance, as a pioneer of Khariboli after Insha Allah Khan. It may, nevertheless, be said that his language contained all the drawbacks peculiar to a language in its transitional, formative stage. His word formations, his vocabulary and syntax all carry the imprint of the dominant literary languages of the time, viz., Braj, his own 'purabi' dialect, and local Bengali. One may also find grammatical lapses and a pedantic touch that militates again fluency and makes the style heavy going.

Ma.C.

MISHRA, SOUBHAGYAKUMAR (Oriya; b. 1941), one of the outstanding modern poets of Orissa, was born at Behrampur. After having obtained his post-graduate degree in English literature, he joined the Behrampur University as a teacher of the subject, and he is still professionally attached to this University.

Soubhagyakumar is widely travelled and received a writer's fellowship from the University of Iowa in 1983. He received many awards from various literary organisations, including the Sahitya Akademi Award (1986) on his Dwa Suparna.

He has by now published more than six collections of poems in addition to a number of critical essays in well-known literary journals. His poems have been translated into quite a few Indian and European languages. His important publications include collections of poems like Atmanepadi (1965), Madhyapadalopi (1970), Nai pahanra (1973) and a translation of a Bengali novel by Shirshendu Mukhopadhyay, Ghuna poka (1975), besides his own translation of his poems into English, entitled Counter Measures (1973).

Soubhagyakumar's poetry is marked by a deep perception of men and things and own distinctive use of poetic diction which is both precise and rich in suggestion. He has explored in his poetry many possibilities of the language and made his own characteristic contribution to contemporary literature. His poetic sensibility has been sharpened by his social awareness and grounding in contemporary literature.

MISHRA, UMESHA (Maithili; b. 1895, d. 1967) was an eminent Sanskrit scholar and authority on Indian philosophy as well as a great protagonist of Maithili. Born in an erudite Maithili Brahman family reputed for its Sanskrit learning, he did his M.A. in Sanskrit from Benaras Hindu University (1922). After passing the examination of Kavyatirth from Sanskrit Association, Calcutta (1923), he joined as lecturer in Sanskrit, Allahabad University (1923), from where he obtained the degree of Doctor of Letters in 1932. While at University he became widely known as an Indologist and a Sanskrit scholar, his interest embraced Philosophy, Religion, Literature and Law. Among his contributions mention may be made of 'Conception of matter according to Nyaya-Vaisheshika, (1936), Nimbarka School of Vedanta (1940), Critical Bibliography of Purvamimamsa (1942), Bharatiya tarkashastra (1950), A Critical Study of Bhagavatagita (1957), Bharatiya darshan (1958), and History of Indian Philosophy (in three volumes), In recognition of his scholarship he was awarded the title of Mahamahopadhyaya by the Government of India (1943), and the U.P. Hindi Sahitya Sammelan honoured him by conferring the title of Sahitya-Varidhi (1966) on him. He held such distinguished positions as Director of Mithila Research Institute (1949-52) and Vice-Chancellor of Sanskrit University (1961-64). The acquisition from Nepal of Mahakal samhita (photostat copy), yet to be published, is regarded as one of his notable achievements. Besides, he championed the cause of Maithili and published a large number of articles in it and edited several old texts to preserve its glorious heritage. He brought out a critical study of Manbodh's Krishnjanma, an 18th century classic, and wrote Vidyapati Thakur on the life and works of the great Maithil poet. His edited works include Vidyapati's Kirtilata (1960) and Kirtipataka (1960). His Maithila samskriti sabhyata is a highly acclaimed book on the cultural life of Mithila. He evolved a Maithili style which is now widely in use.

S.J.

MISHRA, VAIDYANATH ‘YATRI’ (Maithili; b. 1911) is said to be born at village Tarauni in Darbhanga district (Bihar). He comes from a poor Brahman family. He studied Sanskrit in the traditional way at Satlakha, Tarauni and Varanasi. Later, he took to sanyas, embraced Buddhism, was christened as Nagarjun, became a Bhikshu, studied Tripitaka, learnt Pali, Prakrit, Sinhali, Tibetan and many modern Indian languages, travelled to Srilanka and Tibet, and at long last came back home and bade good-bye to Buddhism.

His three pen-names are 'Vaideha', 'Yatri', and 'Nagarjun', and he writes in four languages: Sanskrit, Maithili, Hindi, and Bengali. He wrote first in Sanskrit, then in Maithili under the inspiration Sitaram Jha in Varanasi, next in Hindi, and lastly in Bengali. He started creative writing under the penname of 'Vaideha'. Later on he stuck to his name 'Yatri' in Maithili and 'Nagarjun' in Hindi. In Sanskrit he is only 'Vaidyanath Mishra', and in Bengali 'Nagarjun'.

In Maithili he is credited with three novels and two collections of poems. His novel Paro was first published in 1946 and Nabaturia in 1954. His most famous novel Balchanma was originally written in Maithili, but it appeared first in Hindi. The original version came out as late as 1967. His first collection of Maithili poems entitled Chitra, was published in 1949, and the second collection Patrahin nagna gachh appeared in 1967 which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968.

Yatri is acclaimed as the pioneer of progressive writing in Maithili. He has an inspiring personality: a personality trying to look beyond home and hearth, breaking off the rusty chains of tradition, rebelling against authoritarianism, and always affectionate to the new generation. As in his own life, he rescued Maithili poetry from the fetters of metre and rhyme.

His Auhar Jinagi (Blind life) is a very effective poem which irradiates life suffering from faithlessness, instability and indecision. In the sphere of novel Yatri stands high. Paro deals with hidden love for a cousin. Nabaturia describes the enthusiasm of the youngsters fighting the social evil of old-age marriage. His masterpiece Balchanma vigorously fights social inequality and conservatism of society. He is known for his mastery over language and style, and has inspired a number of new poets in Maithili. His poems reflect the Marxian trend of thought. He is free from traditional conservatism and raises his voice in support of the struggle for the emancipation of the toiling masses. From this point of view the poem, 'Parama satya' (Ultimate truth), represents him best. He is equally an expert in writing political satire. He has hit hard at social evils in such poems as 'Vilapa', 'Budha', 'Bara'. His nature poems have fragrance of soil and novelty of presentation. Description of Maithil life local patriotism, awakening for struggle, realistic social scenes are the typical features of his poems. Some of his poems are based on his personal experiences and reflections, which are admired for the spontaneous overflow of his feelings, universalisation of personal experiences, and charming expression. Such poems include 'Antim pranam' (Last salutation), 'Gamak chitthi' (A letter from home), 'Bhavana', 'Sinuria am', etc.

MISHRA, VIDYANIWAS (Hindi; b. 1925) hails from village Pakardiha, district Gorakhpur, Uttar Pradesh. He received his higher education at Allahabad and his traditional education of Sanskrit at Varanasi. He wrote his Ph.D. thesis on the descriptive technique of Panini. He worked with Rahul Sankratyayan on his dictionary project. Gorakhpur University, Sanskrit University, and Agra University have been the venues of his career. He was also a guest teacher for some time at the universities of California and Washington; and he retired as Director of the KM Munshi Institute of Linguistic Studies, Agra.

Vidyaniwas has written a number of essays and analytical articles, better known as 'lalit' and 'vaicharik' essays. His imagination is guided by a deep sense of culture and traditional values.

A deep understanding of Hazariprasad Dwivedi's style rooted in folk culture, and his own scholarship of Sanskrit, made him develop a style which is both personal and poetic, erudite and reflective. The author seems to be particularly enamoured of the epic age, and a number of his essays are based on the interpretations of the symbolic value of characters and situations found in them and how they are relevant to the human situation in modern times. From the 'lalit' essays in Chitvan ki chhanh, Tum chandan ham pani and Maine sil pahunchai, he switched over to the more analytical essays in Asmita ke liye. His anthologies now usually include both types of essays in which the demarcation of technique is barely visible, and the essays are a combination of both the analytical and the personal in an elegantly composed rhetoric. He has also translated some poetry from German and has himself written some poignant poems found in the anthology, Pani ki pukar.

His work includes: essays, Chitvan ki chhanh, Kadam ki phooli dali, Tum chandan ham pani, Angan Kapanchhi our banjara man, Maine sil pahunchai, Sahitya ki chetna, Basant aa gaya par koi utkantha nahin, Mere Ram ka mukut bhing raha hai, Parampara bandhan nahin, Kantile taro ke aar paar, Kaun tu phulwa beenihari, Asmita ke liye, Bhramarananda ke patra, Tamal ke jharokhe se, Sancharini; Research: The Descriptive Technique of Panini, Reeti Vigyan, Bharatiya bhasa darshan ki peethika, Hindi ki shabd sampada, Hindu Dharma, Jivan mein sanatan ki khoj. Poetry: Pani ki pukar.

MISHRA, VISHVANATH PRASAD (Hindi; b. 1906, d. 1982) was brought up and educated at his hometown. After completing his higher education he joined the Department of Hindi at Benaras Hindu University and served there till 1962 when he went to Magadh University, Gaya (Bihar) as Head of the Hindi Department. He served the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Varanasi, in various capacities. He was awarded the Acharya Mahavir Prasad Dwivedi Gold Medal on his book Vangmaya vimarsha (1926) by the Sabha in 1944.

A critic belonging to the Acharya Ramchandra Shukla school of Hindi criticism, his main field of research and study is Ritikal (later medieval period of Hindi literature). His book Bihari ki vagavibhuti (1936) is his main contribution in the field of practical criticism. Pointing out the various influences of the old poets on Bihari, he has tried for the first time to probe into the latent excellence of his poetry. It is the first important book on Bihari and has a historical importance. His book on the history of Hindi drama examines and evaluates various Hindi plays in the light of Sanskrit dramaturgy. He would, however, be long remembered for editing and writing authentic commentaries on the works of Riti poets, such as Keshav, Rasakhan, Bhikaridas, Ghana-nand, Bodha and Thakur. In his works on the history of literature from the beginnings to modern age, he has presented a lucid exposition of the main literary tendencies, and achievement of the principal poets. His books on poetics, Kavyanga kaumudi (1924) and Vangamaya vimarsha, are of a high order. The first deals with the principal theories and various genres of literature. It is based on Sanskrit poetics. The second is a book on MISHRAN, SURYAMALL (Rajasthani; b. 1815, d. 1868) is considered to be the best poet of the bardic tradition in the modern period as well as the greatest scholar among bards. He was the son of Chandidanji who belonged to the 'Misan' branch of bards. The name of Suryamall's mother was Bhavanbai and his brother's name was Jayalal. Suryamall died at a place called Bundi. He married six wives. He had only one child, a daughter. It is said that while he was fondling the baby by swinging her high and low, she died in his arms. He took one Muraridan as an adopted son. After Suryamall's death, he completed Vanshbhaskar (pages 4294-4368). From his very childhood, he was gifted with sharp intellect and uncommon retentive power. In no time he mastered numerous subjects. He had acquired knowledge from many persons to whom he expressed his gratitude in Vanshbhaskar. Among these, he had particular regard for Ashanand and Sadhu Svarupdas. Including Muraridan and Ganeshaj puri, eleven disciples of Suryamall are famous. He was supported by the ruler of Bundi, Raoraja Ramsingh and was patronised by him. He is famous for his frankness and independent spirit. The following works of Suryamall are famous: Vanshbhaskar, Virsatsai, Balvadvilas, Ramranjat, Chhandomayukh, Dhatu rupavali, Satiraso and some scattered gitas (songs), dohas and kavittas. Of these, the first three have been published. Ramranjat was composed by the poet in 1825 at the age of ten years. This work describes the glory of Raoraja Ramsingh, his wedding, the occasion of the festive date known as 'Savanki Tij' and the festival of Vijaydashmi (also known as Dussehra, which is a prelude to the famous festival of 'Diwali or Dipavali'), Ramlila (a dramatic re-enactment through mime, of Lord Rama's numerous heroic deeds as recorded in the Ramayana) and the episodes relating to 'Haya' and 'Gaya', the city of Bundi and hunting excursions. The Chhandomayukh and Satiraso have been known only through their mention. Dhatu rupavali (pertaining to metals) is a small work of ordinary quality, the manuscript copy of which is to be found in the private library of the Bundi 'darbar' or court. His scattered works lie here and there, collected in published and unpublished volumes. In Balvadvilas, there are descriptions of the royal household of Bhinaya, the life and daily routine of Raja Balvant-singh, the ruler of that place, administration of the state.

social character and so on. The language and style of this work and Vanshbhaskar are of the same type.

Suryamall's special fame is due to Vanshbhaskar and Virsatsai. It was by the order of the ruler of Bundi, Raoraja Ramsingh, that Vanshbhaskar was written. But the poet could not complete it. Like the Mahabharata, it is an encyclopaedic work of gigantic proportions. Including a brief critical note, the number of its published pages are 4,368. The story goes that the poet dictated it to numerous writers. It is largely a historical account of the Chauhan's belonging to the royal line of Bundi, but it is also, where context permits, a description of numerous Rajput dynasties, events and anecdotal narratives. It treats subjects like war, army, city, social rites and customs and festivals. Thereby one comes to know of the poet's knowledge of history as well as his deep knowledge of other arts and sciences like astrology, religion, philosophy, mathematics, literature, chhand (metre), 'Shakun', 'Shalihotra' state religion. The language used in Vanshbhaskar is chiefly Pingal and at places Rajasthani has also been used. Besides Pingal, Sanskrit, Apabhramsha and Prakrit languages have been used at some places. Vanshbhaskar is indicative of Suryamall's deep knowledge and marvellous poetic faculty. It belongs to the Champu category of poetic composition wherein at places prose has been employed in place of verse. Vanshbhaskar is not a historical account but a descriptive poem with historical interest. It is a source book for historical purposes, particularly with respect to the contemporary or slightly earlier events. Vir satsai is also incomplete. It has 288 dohas. Its language is literary Rajasthani. There is a unique expression of heroic sentiments. The dohas contain not a description of any particular hero, but it is rather a depiction of the heroic elements that strengthen it. These constitute the main objective of the work. Suryamall is chiefly a poet concerned with the evocation of the heroic interest and Vir satsai is an unexcelled work on this subject. His journalistic work, too, has special importance. He wrote many inspiring and didactic letters to numerous contemporary 'Samants (Vas-sals) of high as well as low status. Those letters, too, tell us about the political, social and cultural conditions of that age.

MISRI, SHAH (Sindhi; b. 1828) was a sufi saint poet. His ancestors were called Shahpottas, meaning descendants of Shah. Misri Shah was a dervish. He was well-versed both in Arabic and in Persian, besides Sindhi. He was greatly influenced by the great Persian classics like the Maulana Rumi's Masnavi, Diwan Hafiz, as also nearer home by the Risalo of Shah Abdul Latif.

Misri Shah was very much fond of travel. He associated himself with the fakirs and travelled with them for years to Jodhpur, Jaipur, Ajmer, Kutch, Girnar and Hinglaj. Ultimately he settled down at Mount Abu and often passed nights in prayer and meditation.

Misri Shah, both as a composer and as a singer, was a highly esteemed poet of his time. His poetry is chaste in diction and pregnant with thoughts. Like Bekas, he too sang praises of the beauty of the physical form. His poetry is replete with references to wine and the 'Saqi' (The cup-bearer). He reached the ultimate goal of love through 'Ishq majazi'.

His composition follows the 'surs' of the classical Indian music. It is also known for its metrical accuracy and excellence. He wrote both in Sindhi and in Hindi. He composed 'ghazals', 'nazms', 'bayts' and 'kafis'. His kafis are superb. 'Misri' means sugarcandy. 'Misri' Shah's kafis are as sweet as misri. "There is no time for death/and living is not worthwhile./All is destructible/God alone is everlasting." Verily Misri Shah was called the king of poets of his time.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Assamese). As a result of the Treaty of Yandaboo concluded between the Burmese and the British on 24 February 1826 Assam was annexed to the British empire under the initiative of David Scott. Scott imported a host of clerks and petty officials from Bengal to run the administration. In 1829 the British Baptist missionaries of Serampore Mission opened a station at Gauhati under James Rae at the request of David Scott. Scott and the European gentlemen at Gauhati established a school with James Rae as Superintendent. Bengali was introduced as the medium of instruction in this school. Scott was also instrumental in establishing a few Bengali medium schools. He died young in 1831. His successors too followed the same policy. The number of such schools rose to sixteen in 1838.

In 1836 the British Government as a part of their empire building policy and also partly at the instance of the newcomers passed orders that Bengali would be the language of the courts and schools of Assam. The Assamese people had to get themselves involved in a cultural war. On 23 March of 1836, two American Baptists arrived at Sadiya (Now in Arunachal Pradesh) with their families. They also brought a printing machine with them. Their arrival at Sadiya was rather providential and it is a landmark in the history of modern Assamese literature which, strictly speaking, begins from 1813, the year when Dr. Carey of Serampore Mission published his Assamese translation of the New Testament done in collaboration with Atmaram Sarma, an Assamese pandit from Kaliabor. Carey also translated the Old Testament in 1833, with the help of Atmaram Sarma. The two missionaries had actually set out for the Shans of Northern Burma and South China, their ultimate aim being to reach the Golden Gate of the Celestial Chinese Empire of their dream for evangelical work. But they were frustrated in these two courts. They were destined to work in Assam. Brown wrote, 'This region providentially opens before us'.

The Baptists at first worked among the Khamtis and Singphos at Sadiya and learned their languages. Brown began to learn Assamese which in the beginning he took as a patois of Bengali. Subsequently he overcame his wrong notion. Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Cutter started a school for teaching Assamese to children. Miles Bronson arrived at Sadiya in 1837. The missionaries could not pass their days peacefully at Sadiya owing to the Khamti and Singpho insurrections against the British. They shifted to Jaipur in 1839. Bronson established an outpost at Namsang to preach the message of Christ among the Nagas. The American Board still had the hope to enter China from Namsang and therefore they sent Cyrus Barker and Mrs. Barker to work among the Nagas with Bronson. They joined the Baptists at Jaipur in 1840. Rhoda Bronson, Bronson's sister, also came with them and joined him at Namsang. She fell ill and died in 1840. Cyrus Barker refused to work among the Nagas. Ultimately Brown, Bronson, Cutter and Barker decided to open stations in the Brahmaputra Valley from where the Serampore Mission had left in 1838. All of them came down to Sibsagar in 1841. Brown and Cutter remained at Sibsagar while in the same year Bronson left for Nowgong where he set up an Orphan Institution to take care of the poor and homeless orphans. A large number of such children were converted. There was an upsurge of conversion which is described as the 'Nowgong Revival'. Barker opened a station at Gauhati in 1843. The missionaries concentrated their work at Sibsagar, Nowgong and Gauhati. In each station they established Assamese medium schools to prepare the ground for evangelical work. Thus the work of Assam Mission began properly from 1841.

Brown found that the translation of the New Testament done by Carey was unidiomatic and laden with Sanskrit. He devoted himself to the translation of the New Testament from 1838 to 1847 and got it printed at the Sibsagar Baptist Mission Press in 1847 under the title Amar trankarta prabhu Jishu Khristar natun niyam which went through the third edition in 1850. Earlier he had completed the translation of thirteen chapters of the Gospel of Matthew. Brown wrote his Grammatical Notices of the Assamese Language (1848). He rendered some of the Psalms into Assamese verse. He made books of elementary arithmetic (1845, 1855) and geography (1851) for school children. His monumental work was the monthly Arunodai which he edited for long nine years. His worthy wife E.W. Brown also wrote Gananar anka (1840) and Bhugolar bibaran (1849). Brown refused to accept Solomon Peck's recommendations about Assam Mission and therefore he left Assam in 1855.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-BENGALI

The translation of the Old Testament was undertaken by some of the missionaries. Bronson translated a portion of it while A.K. Gurney rendered a major part of it into Assamese. The entire Old Testament in Assamese was published only in 1903. A.K. Gurney's Kani bôhaeruar sadhu was published in 1876. Elokeshi beshyar bisay, a novelette originally written in Bengali by Miss M.E. Lesley, was translated into Assamese in 1877 by Gurney. His Kaminikantar charitra (1877) is described as the first traditional novel in Assamese as it delineated socio-psychological tension through characterisation and plot construction. Mrs. Gurney's Phulmani aru Karuna (1977) is a translation of Mrs. Mullen's original Bengali book of similar name. It must be mentioned that the perspective of these Christian missionary writers was circumscribed. They failed to create anything ennobling.

Among the Christian writers Nidhi Levi Farewell who was the first convert wrote profusely both in prose and in verse dealing with religious and secular matters. His tirade against Hinduism had very little impact on the culturally rich Assamese people.

In the field of language the missionaries made original contribution. While Brown wrote a grammar of the Assamese language, Bronson rendered yeoman's service to the Assamese language by producing in 1867, after twelve years of hard labour, his monumental work, A Dictionary in English and Assamese—Achamiya aru Ingraji abhidhan consisting of 14,000 words.

The missionaries were pioneers in the field of Assamese journalism also. In January 1846 they founded Arunodai which was described by them as a monthly paper "devoted to Religion, Science and General Intelligence". It was brought out from the Baptist Mission Press at Sibsagar. The Arunodai set a new pattern and style of prose writing employing the everyday speech of the people as the medium of literary expression.

The greatest contribution made by the missionaries to the cause of the Assamese was their long and sustained endeavour to see that the Assamese language was used in the schools and courts of Assam. Brown established through his writings that Assamese was an independent language. Bronson stood as a friend, philosopher and guide of the Assamese throughout the period of the language controversy. When in 1853 A.J. Moffat Mills came to Assam to investigate the state of affairs in the administration of Assam, Bronson and Anandaram Dhekiyal Phukan discussed with him matters relating to the status of Assamese and Phukan submitted a memorandum. Other missionaries also individually submitted their view-points in support of Assamese. In his 'Report on the Province of Assam' Mills strongly recommended the steps suggested by Phukan for introduction of Assamese. The administrators of the Company turned a deaf ear to it.

Phukan, under the pseudonym of 'a Native' wrote a booklet, A Few Remarks on the Assamese Language and on the Vernacular Education in Assam. It was submitted to the Government which paid no heed to it.

The callousness of the Government stirred Bronson to find out the cause of this inaction. He found out that William Robinson, who had written the first Assamese grammar, A Grammar of the Assamese Language in 1839 and held the post of Inspector of Schools of Assam had published a paper in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal (1849) wherein he had stubbornly maintained that Assamese was identical with Bengali. Bronson obtained Robinson's viewpoints in the form of a paper and circulated it among the missionaries for eliciting their comments. Brown, Danforth, Ward and Stoddard sent their comments supporting Assamese to Bronson who submitted all these with a letter of his own advocating the cause of Assamese to the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, F.J. Haliday. Haliday did nothing about it. Bronson did not remain silent. This time he came out public. He wrote to the Editor of The Friend of India (25 May 1855) advocating the redemption of Assamese. The Friend of India published an editorial supporting the cause of Assamese. The reaction of the Government is not known.

Bronson had to leave for America in 1857. He, however, returned to Assam in 1861 and resumed his old efforts. When his dictionary appeared in 1867 it became a veritable fortress for the war he was waging. But very soon the opponents submitted a representation claiming that even in this dictionary out of the first 688 words 591 were only Bengali. The renowned I.C.S. Officer and reputed Bengali scholar R.C. Dutt was requested by the Government to examine this allegation. He examined it and rejected their plea with the declaration that Assamese was an independent language.

Now Bronson adopted a novel method of warfare, that of voicing opinion through memoranda. The Humble Memorial of the Assamese Community at Nowgong, Assam with signatures of 216 persons headed by Bronson as the President of the Community was submitted on 9 March 1872. Such memoranda were also submitted from Sibsagar, Gauhati and other places at the instances of the Baptists. All these memorials, perhaps, went to remove in an effective manner the misgivings that were working inside the Government machinery through the machination of officers like Robinson. Thus at long last the Government finally decided to make Assamese the language of the courts and schools of the Assam Valley districts from 25 July 1873.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Bengali). The contributions of the missionaries towards the enrichment of the Bengali language and literature are immense. Their role in the development of Bengali prose in its formative stages deserves special approbation. Although the missionaries under reference were foreigners and propagation of the tenets of Christianity among the Bengalis including attempts at proselytization where possible were their avowed objectives in taking to the cultivation of the Bengali language and literature yet it cannot be denied that it indirectly proved to be of great benefit to the growth of the Bengali prose literature during the first three decades of the nineteenth century.

They showed uncommon zeal not only in developing the written language but also in their pioneering efforts in the setting up of the printing press and several other allied industries like type-foundries, indigenous manufacturing of paper and binding workshop as an indispensable aid to the production of books so necessary for the spread of knowledge and general education in the country. They also showed their mettle in another field of enterprise no less notable: the field of journalism. First they published Digdarshan, then a newspaper entitled Samachardarpan. Both these journals were first published in the early part of 1818 within an interval of one month between the two.

The most distinguished as well as the most representative of these missionaries were William Carey, Joshua Marshman, Ward, John Clark Marshman, Felix Carey, Brandson Pearson and a few others. Their chief area of operation was the Serampore Baptist Mission which had been established in 1800. Reverend William Carey was not only the undisputed leader of the group but was also the principal source of inspiration and example to them all. Carey was a remarkable person from more than one point of view. Imbued with an idealism he was also a man with an inexhaustible fund of energy and dynamism and versatile in interests and approaches. An idea of how energetic he was and of the variety of his activities can be had from the fact that though the many-sided programmes of the Serampore Mission absorbed most of his energy he had still a considerable storehouse of surplus energy left to devote to the work of the Fort William College where he had been a teacher for many years. Apart from writing quite a number of text-books himself, he induced Ramram Basu, Mrityunjay Vidyalankar, Rajiblochan Mukherjee and others of the Fort William College to write text books in Bengali. He also guided scholars to prepare translations not only of the Bible but of many other worthwhile books dealing with the physical sciences like biology, physics, astronomy, geography and the like.

There were arrangements in his press for printing books in quite a number of provincial languages besides Bengali. These languages were Hindi, Marathi, Telugu, Gujarati, Kannada, Oriya, Arabic, Persian and English. The scope of the Mission's type-foundry was expanded manifold with the active help of Panchanan, Manohar and Krishnachandra Karmakar, the three famous Bengali type-cutters of the nascent period of printing in Bengal.

The East India Company had not in the beginning looked upon Carey with favour. They did not allow him to set up a mission within the jurisdiction of the territories ruled by him. But in the face of Carey's undaunted spirit all obstacles gave way and finally he was able to pitch his tents in the Danish settlement of Serampore. Carey was in the over-all charge of the Mission. Joshua Marshman was in charge of the schools and boarding houses, Ward looked after the printing press and Pearson Felix Carey and others were engaged in text-book writing. John Clark Marshman was given the responsibility of editing the magazine and Panchanan and Manohar were given the task of running the type foundry. Thus a huge establishment was set up and within a short space of time resulted in its many modes of activity branching off in many useful directions ultimately creating history in the annals of literary and educational progress of the country.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Gujarati). As commercial expeditions of European countries expanded their activities, and started acquiring political power, Christian missionaries also intruded into India for propagating Christianity. As they had to work amongst the downtrodden people, they had to talk to them in their own language. So they learned Gujarati. In 1808 a missionary Drumand prepared a book on Gujarati vocabulary, and another book on Gujarati Grammar, which were the first books in Gujarati in those genres. Though the books were meant for new entrants, they were of immense value, to common people for understanding the peculiarities of the language.

Rev. Josef Von Somren Taylor came to India, as a bishop, and stayed in Gujarat. He studied Gujarati, and wrote Gujarati vyakaran (Gujarati grammar) in late fifties of the nineteenth century. His grammar is better and more scientific, than his predecessor missionary writer. He also prepared devotional songs on christianity to be sung during mass prayers. He composed those songs in folk tunes, to popularise them. He also wrote Karar ne lagto praveshe bodh, which was a summary of New Testament. testament.

The main task of missionaries was to publish Gujarati translations of New Testament, and small booklets on the life of Jesus and various episodes from the Bible. Such types of publications continue to flow in incessantly even at present.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-HINDI

In the fifties, a Spanish missionary Father Wallace, emerged as a top ranking writer, who has written books, on subjects of social relevance in chaste Gujarati. He has written a few songs free of any religious bias. He went to Hindu families, stayed with them, as a member of the family, studied their problems, as a sociologist, and presented them in an objective manner. He has won several awards from Gujarat Government Gujarati Sahitya Parishad. He has written about fifty books on a number of topics. His contribution to Gujarati literature is valuable.

C.M.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Hindi). The Christian missionaries have played a significant role in the development of Hindi prose. The main aim of these missionaries was to propagate Christianity. They used Hindi prose as medium for translating their religious books. They came to India long before the East India Company.. Many Christians in South India are of the opinion that St. Thomas came to Malabar in 68 A.D. and propagated Christianity there. Ample proof of the activities of the missionaries in Madurai, Madras and Malabar during the third, sixth and eighth centuries is available. In the north there are references to various Dutch, Portuguese, French and English missionaries during the reigns of Mughal emperors. All this has, however, little relevance to the growth of Hindi prose, but then there were missionaries who established their centre of activities at Serampore near Calcutta in the beginning of the 19th century, and brought out their books in translation which obviously led to the propagation and evolution of Hindi prose writings.

The fact that the missionaries played a key role in the advancement and modernisation of Hindi prose cannot be denied by anyone, for at a time when prose writing had no direction, and the Christian translators guided the writers along a definite path. They chose the medium of straightforward Khari Boli. In 1719 William Carey set up a press for the publication of religious literature in Serampore. From 1801 to 1832 A.D. this press turned out many translations of religious writings into Hindi and other Indian languages. Among the colleagues of Carey were Marshman and Ward. The former travelled widely in India and wrote in detail about different aspects of Hindu society.

Ward published the Hindi renderings of various book in different areas, apart from religious books. He accomplished this task by pressing into service a number of able scholars. He himself translated the Bible in two volumes, published by the aforesaid press in 1811 and 1818 respectively. The missionaries of Serampore, in fact, published many religious books in more than forty Indian languages, including Brajbhasha, Avadhi, Bagheli, Kannoji, Marwadi, and Malvi, beside Khari boli.

Fort William College was founded by Wellesley in 1800 during the East India rule. This college played a unique role in the development of Hindi prose. The language policy of this college was quite different from that of the Company. The civil service entrants had to study at this college Sanskrit, Hindi, and other Indian languages, along with many other subjects. Wellesley also intended to propagate Christianity through this college. Hence William Carey was appointed here as the Head of the department of Sanskrit and Bengali. The well-known Christian missionary David Brown and Buchanan were appointed Provost and Vice Provost of the College respectively while Gilchrist was Professor of Hindustani language. Gilchrist favoured Hindustani tilted towards Arabic-Persian languages, and preferred Roman and Persian scripts. The students and the missionary workers were not happy with the language and script policies of Gilchrist. This, eventually, made the higher authorities change the language policy and appoint William Price as the new Head of the Department of Hindustani. Under his headship a change did come. Khari boli was recognised in place of the Hindustani language.

A new chapter was added to the language policy of the Company when Lord Macaulay prepared his plan for imparting education through the English medium. This plan carried weight with the Christians, for the newly educated Indian youth began to be lured by Christianity. The other impact of the plan was that the Indians began to realise that their own literatures lagged behind the western literature in many fields. The English prose, by then, had grown rich immensely. This inspired many Indian scholars to work for the development of Hindi prose. Further, Charles Wood studied the vernaculars of India and planned a project for opening rural schools. Consequently, the rural schools came up, and their syllabi made for the fast growth of Hindi prose. Many writers now came forward who in their own way cultivated Hindi prose by polishing and enriching it. Under both the schemes, various institutions and publishing organizations such as Calcuta School Book society, Agra School Book Society, Agra College, Delhi College, Bareilly College etc. were founded. The language of the text-books became well-structured and worthy of handling new subjects.

The religious propaganda of the Serampore missionaries spread in the first half of the nineteenth century to various parts of the Hindi belt, such as Patna, Munger, Bhagalpur, Chapra, Benaras, Allahabad, Lucknow, Kanpur, Aligarh, Meerut, Jhansi, Ranikhet, Nainital, Dehra-doon, Delhi, Jaipur, Ajmer, Jabalpur, Nagpur. The missionaries established many welfare institutions such as schools, colleges, hospitals, etc., in various parts of the country to win public support. The common people, however, looked upon them with askance. The reason was not far to seek. These missionaries belonged to the ruling class who opposed the Indian social system directly or indirectly. Moreover, many of their programmes mutilated against the Indian culture. Even when Queen Victoria took over from the East India Company, the dispensation changed, but the policy of administration continued; the zeal of the missionaries was unabated.

It is pertinent to note that though the missionaries rendered into Hindi their religious books, they could not achieve any maturity of expression or style. Their translations also lacked literary flavour, although the language gained in simplicity. Nevertheless, the prestige that the Hindi prose earned was largely due to the attempts of these missionaries.

V.A.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Kannada). Karnataka came into contact with Western missionaries through Goa in the seventeenth century. These missionaries who came down essentially for propagating their religion were patronised/sponsored by different institutions. While the Society of Jesus was Catholic, the London Mission, the Wesleyan Methodist Mission and the German Evangelical Basel Mission were Protestant organisations; the Danish, French and American Baptist mission in other parts of India were not active here till the end of the nineteenth century. Even when they came, they did not contribute very significantly to the literary field.

The main reasons for the arrival of the missionaries were the propagation of Christianity and the conversion of Hindus. But this was no easy task. Consequently they had to find new avenues to attract the local people to their cause. These missionaries, particularly the Protestants, were convinced that the common man can be persuaded to understand and accept Christianity, if he were provided education. Moreover, by then the English language was gaining ground steadily and the missionaries seized this opportunity. By opening English schools which were in demand, they managed to use these schools as a forum for strengthening their conversion activities. Such a step necessitated text-books and they started writing text-books. In order to achieve their true purpose, they needed the Kannada version of the Bible and other religious books. And the missionaries took up this task of translation with utmost dedication. Therefore we find that text-books and religious tracks happen to be an important feature of Christian literature.

Then these missionaries had to face the problem of producing thousands of copies of these books. They brought into the country, the printing machine, which provided the base for western education and propagation of Christianity in these parts. Thus these missionaries carried out their literary task in an organised framework which involved the learning of Kannada soon after their arrival, the translation of the Bible and other religious tracts, the production and distribution of text-books, grammars and dictionaries, in addition to writing of books and articles on all aspects of their specific, individual interests. These literary activities played a crucial role in the development of modern Kannada literature. Even when their literary writing was inspired by their commitment to the spread of Christianity, the labour of these missionaries often led to works which go beyond their immediate religious purpose to appeal to a larger readership because of the depth and devotion that went into their toil.

The administrators and officials of the time added their bit in advancing the efforts of the missionaries. To begin with, the British officialdom wanted to have no truck with the missionaries, but gradually a situation of mutual need and dependence got created when the government established schools required the use of the text-books written by the missionaries.

Though the Catholic missionaries established the printing press in Goa in 1556, there is no evidence that they really employed the machine to produce Kannada books, till the end of the 18th century. The credit for being the first printer of Kannada books goes to the Protestants who came here in the early decades of 18th century. The first Kannada book to be printed was A Grammar of the Kurnata Language by William Carey published from Serampore, Calcutta.

The missionaries established printing presses in various places and started to publish briskly. (Though private and government publishing agencies gradually joined hands with them, the missionaries dominated the field in the nineteenth century). Literary writing bloomed a hundred fold due to these publishing facilities. Poetry, which was traditionally the sole form used for literary expression gave way to prose. Thus the printing and publication work gave rise to different themes, thoughts and forms of writing.

The literary work of the missionaries started around the 1650's and went on till the First World War i.e. 1915. Two phases can be identified in this '350-year-old history.

- (1) 1650-1815—The Pre-publishing Era which consists only of the literary writing of the Catholics, available only in the form of manuscripts.
- (2) 1815-1915—The Publication Era, dominated by the Protestants. To begin with, two kinds of books—text-books and religious books—were written. Towards the end of this phase, different kinds of books other than religious writing were also written, after the first World War in the twentieth century. From then on, Christian literary writing is so negligible that it can be described as defunct/extinct.

The first Christian to settle down in Karnataka was Leonardo Benamo or Bename. He is also the first Christian writer in Kannada. After he established the mission's centre in Mysore in 1649, he wrote book with the main purpose of propagating Christianity. As indicated in Somer Vogel's Jesuit bibliography, the titles of these books are: The Defence and Explication of Christianity and Its Hidden Principles, A History of Christian Saints, A Criticism of the Caste System and Superstitious Beliefs of Mysoreans, Kannada Dictionary and Kannada Grammar.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-KANNADA

Till 1850, Christian literature in Kannada was little known. Fortunately, two manuscripts of Christian literature written in 1739 are now available in the Morseden collection of the S.O.A.S. library in London. These twin volumes have helped to establish that modern Kannada literature dates back to eighty years earlier to its recorded origin. These manuscripts have thrown up some very interesting facts. An examination of handwriting of both works has indicated that they were written by the same person. Secondly a scrutiny of the stylistic aspects has shown that both books were authored by the same person. And that person is Saverry. These works were written in 1739. The entirely Christian religious content of these works was translated from Italian, Latin and Portuguese. It is hard to establish if this writing was his original work.

The significant aspect of these twin manuscripts is the edicts of Carla Thome. These are the sixteen principles formulated by Carla Thome on the 'Malabar Rites', well-known within the Christian literature. The content of these works can be paraphrased as follows:

- (1) Aspects related to Jesus Christ's life
- (2) Biographies of Christian Saints

Christian pen names and special terms figure uniquely in these works. Wherever possible, they have been Indianised. The meaning of the original word is fully represented in the new Kannada form. Thus Benedict becomes 'Ashiravadappa' and St. Felicity 'Santoshamma'. It would be particularly interesting to determine whether the language of these texts is medieval Kannada or modern Kannada. There are plenty of mistakes in handwriting which include problems with the aspiration of specific sounds. These peculiarities were not limited to the work of missionaries alone. They can be seen in other writing of the same period such as chronicles, epigraphs and Dasa prose.

The Second phase may be said to begin with the arrival of John Hands, a Protestant missionary, at Bellary in 1809-10. In the ensuing hundred years various missions—London, Wesleyan (Methodist) Basel (Evangelical)—and their followers were actively engaged in educational and literary activities in Karnataka. The Catholics had to step up their own activities to keep up with working style of these Protestants. Let us now examine the function of each of these organisations.

The London Mission: John Hands who arrived in Bellary in 1810, started learning Kannada soon after. Since he was the first Protestant missionary, he did not have any access to the Kannada dictionary or grammar, which were available to the later missionaries. Yet he managed to learn Kannada quite adequately and even found time to translate most parts of the Bible into Kannada, which was a commendable feat.

As Hands was not an expert user of the language William Reeve was sent from London to assist him. The first requirement for the translation of Christian books was an English-Kannada dictionary. Reeve set out to fulfil this task. Under the patronage of Thomas Monroe who was then the Governor of Madras, the company government undertook to publish this dictionary in 1824. Later when Reeve completed his work on the Kannada-English Dictionary in 1832, the government took on the responsibility for publishing that also. And these happen to be the first ever dictionaries to be published in modern Kannada.

In the absence of the meanings, etymology and usage of words, information that is so familiar to us now, we can imagine the awesome onus that Reeve had taken upon himself. More so when the words had to be chosen from a totally new language for the preparation of the dictionary. In addition, Reeve perhaps wanted to go beyond simply providing the meanings of words to include information about the language and lifestyle of Karnataka. Consequently, we see many complementary details along with various synonyms being provided in his English-Kannada Dictionary.

John Reid, who took over Hands's missionary work in Bellary, has translated many Christian books into Telugu and Kannada. He had a natural affinity for the business of publication. But unfortunately he died at an early age in Bellary. Among his works, An Aid to Learn English (1836) lives up to its name. Reid says he wrote the book for these who wanted to undertake English education and for those who wanted to keep abreast of things while in contact with the English authorities. His preoccupation with the propagation and promotion of Christianity comes through vividly in his choice of examples. Occasionally, this is complemented by his intolerance about Hindu beliefs and practices.

B.H. Rice is a big name among the missionaries of the London mission. His life was closely intertwined with the public life of Bangalore for four decades. He was known for his intelligence, foresight, love of music, education and service-mindedness. "Knowledge is power and especially so when based upon the word of God and imbibed in early life," was one of his working principles. We can almost say that there were no educational books in his time. Therefore he concentrated on writing books to suit the needs of different levels of education and on distributing them. He has borrowed generously from

Tamil texts in the construction of these texts. Even the religious texts of his time were mostly translated from Tamil.

However, Rice was the first to question the value of religious texts translated directly from the various European languages. He opined "Religious texts in indigenous languages should be in keeping with the thinking and feeling of indigenous people. Only then will they have the power to persuade people." Some of his progressive thoughts which he presented to fellow Protestant missionaries in 1888 are as follows: "The mood of questioning and independent thinking is growing among the natives. Books which quench this thirst should be produced. As the native missionaries are more capable of producing the literature appropriate for the purpose, special opportunities should be created for them. We should highlight Christian tenets by comparing them with Hinduism. We should create a separate literature for women. Translation of good indigenous literature from one language to another should proceed more systematically. Music, being the most popular literary form, should be used with advantage for the promotion of Christian faith."

Rice, who rendered long years of service to the missionary cause, was honoured twice publicly (1879-1887). Among his children only B. Louis Rice (Father of epigraphy) and Edward P. Rice (who wrote the history of Kannada literature in English) continued the Kannada literary work of their father.

Wesleyan Methodists: The Wesleyan missionaries worked more for the field of education and publication than for literature. But whatever they published is of a high quality and has been widely reprinted. John Garrett, Daniel Sanderson, John Stevenson and Henry Haigh are the more famous missionaries who worked for the mission during its active period between 1833 and 1913.

John Garrett: Even though he started work as the manager of the Wesleyan press in Bangalore, he was more interested in educational activities. Realizing the role Garrett had played in the growth of local English schools, Commissioner Cubbon requested him to formulate a suitable educational programme for the entire Mysore Province. Cubbon, who was delighted by Garrett's programme, must have invited him to take over as the Educational Officer (1856). From then on, Garrett does not seem to have contributed much as a missionary.

Garrett's work proceeded mainly in two directions—writing text-books and editing ancient works. As Reeve's dictionaries were not suitable for school children, many missionaries came together under Garrett's guidance to produce such dictionaries.

More important than this is his work Bahubhasha Bhagavadgite (1846-48). It was essentially his brain child and he prepared the Kannada translation himself. Keeping this as his base, he added more from English and Latin. This edition which also consists of the writings of Warren Hastings and the German, Baron Humbolt, is considered truly unique. The Classical Dictionary of India is yet another work by Garrett. His study of classical Kannada literature not only inspired him to compile this encyclopaedia of Indian names, but also provided details about mythological characters and episodes. Both these works earned him fame at the national level.

Daniel Sanderson is one of the missionaries who studied the Kannada language and literature deeply. Sanderson had plans of introducing Kannada to foreigners step by step in the form of four collections of stories. However only the first of these was published. This text, which uses simple and lucid Kannada, was for a long time a standard text for the Kannada examination for foreigners. It was also popular among natives as collection of short stories.

J. Stevenson began with text-book writing. Later he became especially known as the publisher of Mudramajusha. He took unpardonable liberties in editing this work of Kempunarayana. His justification for making these erratic changes was that the narrative should be suitable for teaching at the university and that it should conform to the instructions of government.

Henry Haigh, who was on the committee for the second edition of the Bible played an important role in the preparation of the Bible which is being currently used. He also published quite a few books on religion. His significant contribution to the world of books lies in the series named Pice papers on Indian Reforms. They are useful booklets on prevalent ideas. He successfully put out a famous journal called Vrittant patrike for many years, from Mysore.

Basel Mission: The period from the inception of the Basel Mission to the onset of the World War, witnessed advent of more than a hundred missionaries from Basel. A majority of them were connected, in one way or other, with literary work and the publication of books. More than five hundred Kannada works came out in the course of the last century. Their number exceeded the number of books in any other language brought out by the Mission. In this connection, the names of Moegling, Wuerth, Kittel, Ziegler, and Kristanuja Watsa are held in high esteem for their invaluable contribution to Kannada literature.

Herman Moeglin was endowed with the qualities of mental alertness, command over languages and fluency of expression. This booklet is considered the first piece of writing in the form of a letter in Kannada. In its narrative form, this work makes amusing reading even today.

Missionaries, elsewhere, have generally followed the practice of translating evangelical books from other languages. But Moegling's Jati-vicharane and Deva vicharane are original treatises. They are considered to be the first literary essays in modern Kannada. The earliest newspaper, too, saw the light of day, thanks to the efforts Moegling. This newspaper, Mangalora samachara (1843-44), came out with the intention of providing general knowledge to the Kannada folk. The fact that very little evangelical writing found its way into this newspaper bears testimony to the broadmindedness of Moegling. It is hard to imagine how Moegling could, in those days, collect news about the economy of England, the Kabul War or the Khalsa of Gwalior State.

Moegling made a collection of the proverbs he came upon during his contact with the common folk. He also set about his task of reforming the script. His two memorable works Coorg Memoirs and Rajendra nama give insights into the life of Coorg. He translated Kannada literary works into German and published them in the ZDMG magazine. He also brought out Medieval Kannada classics in the Bibliotheca Caranatica series. Recognizing his inestimable contribution to literature, the Tubingen University conferred the doctorate degree on him in 1858.

Thus, Moegling was a pioneer in various fields of Kannada literature. He was successful in translating his new ideas into reality and he paved the way for prose literature in modern Kannada. In short, he was one of those who laid the foundation of modern Kannada.

W.G. Wuerth spent most of his time in North Karnataka and came into contact with Virashaiva religion. As a result, he wrote a book comparing Christianity with Vecrashava religion. His memorable work is Prakkavya malike. This is the first collection of Kannada poems.

Undoubtedly, Ferdinand Kittel was a great scholar among the missionaries of the Basel Mission. His Kannada-English Dictionary is a monumental work, a work which will endure as long as Kannada literature survives.

Kittel has wielded his skilful pen in other areas of literature with equal felicity. In the evening of his life, he wrote his learned grammar treatise, A Grammar of the Canarese Language (1903). Since this was written incorporating the principles of comparative philology, we can see, therein, the different stages of the development of Kannada language. Among his other works of repute, mention must be made of the following: textual criticism of ancient Kannada classics, composition of a small narrative poem in Kannada (Kathamale narrating the life of Jesus Christ), mature discussion of oriental subjects like 'Linga Cult' and 'Sacrifice'. For the services he rendered to Kannada, the Tuebingen University conferred the doctorate degree on him too.

Frederick Ziegler was an educationist. Before he came to our country, during his stay here and even after his return to his homeland, he continued to be an ardent teacher. His interests were varied. He wrote books with the view of benefitting the students. Among his many works, one, viz. A Practical Key to Kannada Language, may be singled out. Selecting a hundred words from common usage, he has illustrated their idiomatic usage in different sentences. The fact that he was twice chosen the president of Karnataka Vidyavardhaka Sangha (1894, 1895), a leading cultural institution of Dharwar, shows that he was held in high esteem in the fields of literature and education.

His was the last great literary name among the missionaries, who came from Basel. In the 20th century the number of men of letters, gradually fell due to the onslaught of the First World War.

But, the great literary tradition built up by the foreign missionaries has been kept up by the native literary men, such as Kristanuja Watsa and Chennappa Uttangi during the present century.

Among them, Kristanuja Watsa towers above many others. He was unique in writing books, for students and common folk in a very lucid language. For a number of years, he brought out Kraista sabha patra, the well known journal of the Mission. He was also responsible for the publication of the then Almanacs of the Mission. His literary contribution to the Basel Mission was both fruitful and long standing.

The Catholic missionaries, when compared to the Protestants, were much less interested in the writing, publishing and distribution of Kannada works. Yet when their rival sect was making progress using this tool to advantage, the Catholics could not wholly ignore it either. After Saverry's writing (1739), for nearly a century, there was no literary output by Catholics. Under the pressure of the situation, they started publishing from the 1850's onwards.

The originator of this phase of writing was L. Charbonnaux, who was then the first, independent 'Vicar Epistolic' of the Mysore Province. He established the Catholic Press in 1850 and published many religious books and text-books. Most of them were translated from Tamil. His Book of Prayers is a huge volume on the Roman Catholic religious rites and rituals. His most significant works from the point of literary history are the Kannada-Latin and Latin-Kannada dictionaries. As the study of Latin was compulsory in Catholic schools, these dictionaries must have been found necessary.

Another significant literary task that Charbonnaux undertook was the correction and editing of works written by his colleagues. A. Bonteloup is the most important of these writers. Unlike any other Catholic priest, he served maximally, i.e. for two decades, in the publication world. Predictably, 90% of his published works are translated from Tamil. His contribution relates large¹, to text-books, religious principles and the study of the Latin language. His work on Latin grammar and his work in Latin on Kannada metrics are worthy of consideration.

Two unique works of Catholics deserve to be considered separately. One of them is a Collection of Hymns

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-KONKANI

(1868). Sanskrit verses (shlokas) or sayings are provided here with a commentary. The other is Paramartha gurvina kathe. (The story of the Lord). J. Barrille has translated (1877) this original work in Tamil written by the famous Beschi.

The clash between differing sects and religions that naturally exists everywhere can be seen in the writings of Catholics and Protestants alike. Books like A Denunciation of the Misinterpretation of the Bible (1863) or The ways of the Corrupt Protestants (1867-68) are an example of such writing. On their part, the Protestants also brought out similar books.

The two important books in the present century (upto 1915) written by Catholics are The Imitation of Christ (1905) and Atmasneha (1906). The first is a translation of Thomas-e-Kempis' famous work De Imitatione Christie. The other is a translation of a work of Saint Alphonsus Liguori. Thus, in toto, even though Catholic writing in Kannada does seem negligible, they originated modern Kannada writing. In addition, they also get the credit for advancing considerably the origins of modern Kannada history. Their work on Latin-Kannada adds to their uniqueness.

The literary work of these foreign missionaries which made a humble beginning in the 17th and 18th centuries reached its peak in the 19th century. As mentioned earlier, it declined steadily in the 20th century for various reasons. For one thing, there were not many missionaries coming down to India. Further there was no more novelty or inventiveness about the preachings of Christianity for the natives. Moreover dictionaries, grammars and other aids to study languages had already been produced abundantly. In addition, Indians had increasingly become aware of the merits and demerits of conversion which made them critical towards the issue. This sentiment was further strengthened by the Swadeshi movement. As a result, Christian writing in Kannada had to bow out of the stage in the first half of this century. The official publication of the Bible in 1934 marked the end of the literary contribution of Christian missionaries to Kannada.

It is noteworthy, however, that the literary work of these missionaries has remained isolated in Kannada. Unlike the writing of other religious missionaries which mingled with the mainstream of Kannada literature and flowed on, the writing by the Christian missionaries has remained distinct and separate. Yet the new literary forms which they originated, the new ideas which they expressed, the new tools for studying languages which they introduced, albeit for their own purposes, at a time when modern Kannada literature had not seen the light of day, have been immensely useful in the promotion of literary activities in more recent times. This contribution ensures a permanent place for these missionaries in the history of modern Kannada literature.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Konkani). The Franciscan missionaries arrived in Goa in 1571, and soon after their arrival they started preaching the Gospel. In spite of the efforts at lusitanianisation, the local population remained fundamentally Indian. The choice before missionaries was either to learn local language or to leave the country. Franciscans, unlike the Jesuits who came in 1542, were handicapped by the absence of a printing press, and therefore, not much of their contribution is available for study.

Around 1595, Amador de Santa Anna translated Flos Sanctorum into the local language. According to Paulo de Trindade, it was translated into Marathi, while some other historians believe that it is the only printed book by the Franciscans in Konkani. Joao de Sam Matias translated the Symbolum Fidei of St. Bellarmine into Konkani, and also wrote a life of Jesus Christ. The Franciscans did their utmost for Konkani in the 17th century, particularly in its first half. They established four centres for Konkani study at Reis Magos, Serula, and two at Old Goa. They had composed a booklet called Cartilha de Doutrina Cristao (Charter of Christian doctrine) in Konkani which was circulated and used in the parishes of Goa. Cristovao de Jesus wrote the Arte Grammatical de Lingua Canarina (Grammar of Konkani language, 1635). Manoel de Banha compiled a Konkani Vocabulary and Gaspar de Sam Miguel wrote Syntaxis Copiosissima and a Konkani Portuguese and Portuguese-Konkani Vocabulary. Manoel Baptista wrote a Konkani Catechism which was widely used in the parishes of Bardez, Goa. Manoel de Lado also composed a Konkani Catechism around 1665. The enthusiasm of the Franciscans for Konkani seems to have declined considerably in the second half of the 17th century. The reason of their being whisked away from their parishes in Bardez is believed to be their ignorance and negligence of the local language. Yet, during the beginning of the 18th century, their order had some outstanding scholars like Domingo de S. Bernadino, who wrote an explanation of Credo (I believe) in Konkani.

St. Francis Xavier, the first Jesuit to land in India arrived in Goa in 1542. Later, a band of several Jesuits followed, some of whom made notable contribution to Konkani in the domain of lexicography, grammar and allied studies. They also produced a bulk of literature, eminently religious, ostensibly with a view to propagate Christianity and facilitate conversions. By the end of the 16th century, they established centres of Konkani studies at Old Goa, Raitur (Rachol) and Chodan (Chorao). The main genres cultivated at these centres were 'Doutrinas' (doctrines), puranas (scriptures), lives of saints, catechism, vocabularies and grammars.

The first printed primer of the Catholic doctrine in Konkani is believed to be that of Manuel do Oliveira, a local convert, published in 1560. Thomas Stevens composed Krista puranas (Christian puranas) and published it in 1616 to suit the new-Christians. Some believe that it is in Marathi while others opine that it is in Konkani. Catechism and puranas were more concerned with Christ and his life, abstract doctrine and morals. The neo-Christians had to be supplied with biographies of saints, and these were also supplied. St. Anthony of Lisbon and also St. Peter and other eleven saints find important place in Onvllancho Mallo (Garden of Bakula flowers) by Miguel de Almeida, Sam Padrachem puran (St. Peter's Purana) by Etienne de La Croix and Sant Antonichi jivit-katha (St. Anthony's life) by Antonio Saldanha. For introducing the converts to daily meditations and contemplations, Joao de Pedrosa's Devachim Yacagra Bollandim (Meditations of God) and Ignazio Arcammonne's Sagllea Varussache Vangel (Gospel for the whole year) were considered to be the first ever versions of any portions of the Bible in any Indian language.

The compilation of vocabularies of Konkani jointly by the Franciscans and the Jesuits involved labour for nearly a century and a half. The lexical efforts began in 1542 and reached their zenith around 1683-1685, the approximate years of death of two Konkani scholars, Miguel de Almeida and Antonio Saldanha. The honour of writing the best exposition of Konkani syntax goes to the Franciscan friar, Gaspar de Sam Miguel, who led the lexical effort of both the Franciscans and the Jesuits in his Syntaxis Copiosissima. Angelo F.S. Maffei wrote a book on Konkani grammar in 1882, and published an English-Konkani Dictionary in 1883 and Konkani-English Dictionary in 1885 both in the Roman and the Kannada scripts. These are pioneering efforts in lexicography in Mangluri Konkani.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Maithili). During, the 18th and 19th centuries a number of Christian missionaries recognised the value of local vernaculars and nourished them. The growth of Maithili, however, owes little to these missionaries. Fr. Antonio is said to have published some portion of the Holy Bible in Maithili, but later it was contradicted. Recently, however, the Bible Society has published Gospels in Maithili. Carey of the Serampore Mission is said to have included Maithili in his venture of compiling a multilingual dictionary, but except a few half-burnt pages, the manuscript has been lost. The Christian missionaries in Bihar were mostly concentrated in the south where they did some excellent work for the mission. They seldom turned to North Bihar and kept away from the land of Mithila which was considered conservative and barren for their purposes. In the south of Bihar they mostly concentrated in the district of Ranchi. Here, apart from tribal languages, they chose a local vernacular, called by them Nagpuriya, for contacting the village folk of Chota Nagpur and Santhal parganas. They published the Gospels also in this dialect. Rev. F.H.

Whitley of the S.P.G. Mission, Ranchi, published a chrestomathy of this dialect, entitled Notes on Nagpuria Hindi, containing a skeleton grammar and specimens in prose and verse. This so called Nagpuria dialect of Maithili with some elements from Magadhi, Bhojpuri and other languages was brought in by the immigrant settlers. This dialect is yet serving the locality as a common medium, linking the tribal and non-tribal sections of society. Fr. John of Bongaon is said to have composed some christian devotional songs in Maithili, but those available are only in Brajbhasha on the line of Surdas and Mira.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Malayalam). Kerala was in contact with the West even at the time of ancient Greece and Rome. But a new chapter in Indo-European relationship started with the landing of Vasco da Gama at Calicut in 1498. In concurrent waves during the 16th, 17th and 18th centuries Christian missionaries from Portugal, Italy, Germany, Hungary and Austria came to Kerala. The main object of these missionaries was the propagation of religion and they all had to learn the language of the people they were to work with. They also established printing presses attached to certain seminaries to accelerate the gospel work. The first Press to be established in the region was that at the Ambazhakad Seminary in the Cochin area in 1563. Some of the missionaries enthusiastically studied the various aspects of the language and culture of Kerala. The result was an unprecedented enrichment of Malayalam

St. Francis Xavier, one of the most remarkable evangelists who came to India, translated into Malayalam portions of the Bible which was printed at Goa in 1557. He also compiled a Malayalam version of Catechism. This appears to have been the beginning of a movement of translations from foreign languages. According to the information available to us today, the first dissertation on Malayalam grammar was written in Latin by Anjelos Francis (1650-1712) who was the bishop of Varapuzha. Samkshepavedardham is the Malayalam version of Compendium Doctrinae Christianae and gained special significance as the first book printed completely in Malayalam characters. The author of the work is Father Clement (1714-1789), who was in Varapuzha for a long time. Though the book was written in Malayalam the printing was done in Rome in 1772. John Baptista (1674-1714) and Francis Roz (1715-1789) also translated some gospels.

Varthamanapusthakam adhava Romayatra (Book of news or a voyage to Rome) of Paramakkal Thomakathanar (1736-1799) is the first travelogue in any Indian language. Thomakathanar together with Kariyattil Ouseph Malpan (1742-1787) performed a tedious journey to Rome. The voyage took about two years. It is written in a very simple and attractive style

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-MALAYALAM

Fr. Johann Ernst Hanxleden or Arnos Padiri (1681-1732) as he was popularly known, was a German Catholic missionary (later admitted to the Jesuit order) who came to Kerala in 1701 and stayed in Velur near Trichur. He learned Sanskrit and Malayalam from a Nambuthiri of Ankamaly. Thus equipped, Fr. Johann started his literary career. He composed many poems in Malayalam. The most important among them is Chathuranthyam (Fourfold end) dealing with death, last judgement, heaven and hell. It is composed in four cantos giving vivid pictures of the agonies of a dying man. The most popular work of Arnos Padiri is Misihacharithram puthen pana (Story of Christ-a new song), so called because it was something different in style and form from the old ballads current among the Christians. It is the story of Jesus Christ depicted in a highly devotional setting and written in the musical Malayalam metre 'drutakakali'. His other poems are Vyakulaprabandham (Sorrows of the Virgin) and Umma parvam (Story of Virgin Mary). He compiled the Malayazhma-samskrita-Portuguese Akaradi (Malayalam Sanskrit Portuguese Dictionary). It is incomplete and has not been published. He also wrote a book on grammar, Granthabhashayute vyakaranam (Grammar of the Sanskrit language). Johan Philip Wesdin (1748-1806) or Paulinos Padiri was a Carmelitan monk from Austria who took on the name of Paulinus a Saneto Bartholomeo. He came to Varapuzha in 1774 for missionary work and spent thirteen years there. He wrote 24 books in Malayalam. His important works are Devashalgunam (Six qualities of God), Thresiacharithram (The story of St. Theresa), Koodasha puthakam (A treatise on worship), Divyajnam labhikkanulla sarani (Path to divine knowledge) and Etthu divasatte dhyanam (Eight day's meditations).

Benjamin Bailey (1791-1871) who hailed from England, was ordained a priest of the Church Mission Society and came to Kottayam in 1816 as the principal of the Seminary there. In 1818 he gave up the post and devoted all his time to the translation of the Bible into Malayalam and preparation of other works necessary to facilitate missionary activities. Rev. Bailey established the first printing press in Malayalam in 1821 (C.M.S. Press, Kottayam). He introduced improvements in the usage of Malayalam alphabet and also adopted the English style of printing sentences with the use of punctuation marks.

He compiled two dictionaries, A Dictionary of High and Colloquial Malayalam and English (1846) and A Concise Dictionary of English and Malayalam (1849). By 1829 he completed the translation of the New Testament and it was printed at C.M.S. Press in the same year. The translation of the Old Testament was published in 1841. The first printed periodical Jnananikshepam (Treasury of knowledge) was also started from the C.M.S. Press in 1848. Rev. Bailey wrote six more works including Ramamohanrayiyude Upanishad vyakhyanam (Ram Mohan Roy's commentary on Upanishads).

Hermann Gundert (1814-1893) is the most esteemed among the foreign missionaries who enriched Malayalam language and literature. He was a missionary attached to the Basel Mission Society. Settling down at Illikkunnu in Cannanore district in 1829, Gundert began his three-fold service as educationist, journalist and linguist. He wrote more than twenty books in Malayalam, the most important of which are Malayala bhasha vyakaranam (A grammar of Malayalam, 1851), Keralappazhama (Antiquity of Kerala), Pazhancholmala (A garland of proverbs), Vedapustakam (Bible, 1854), and Sanchariyude prayanam (translation of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress) and the Malayalam English Dictionary (1872). He also edited an anthology of prose and verse for the use of students under the name Padhamala (1851). Gundert's Malayalabhasha vyakaranam is the first authoritative text on Malayalam grammar. It is set forth in three parts: Orthography, Etymology and Syntax. Gundert's successor at Basel Mission was L. Garthwaite. He has written the Vyakarana chodyottaram (A catechism on Malayalam grammar) with an English translation.

The first Malayalam journal Rajyasamacharam was published from Tellicherry as a monthly in June 1847, by Gundert. Though the magazine was mainly intended for religion it contained some news items also. In October 1847 Gundert started another monthly Paschimodayam. The contents of the eight page magazine were divided into two broad heads: Geography and Keralapazhama.

Marsalinos, Richard Collins and Rev. George Mathen (1819-1870) were also responsible for many Malayalam works on Western models. Richard Collins the Anglican missionary, who was the Principal of C.M. Seminary from 1855 to 1861 wrote Lakshuvyakaranam (A short grammar and analysis of Malayalam, 1864) and Malayalam Dictionary (1865). Marsalinos, who hailed from Italy, was the bishop of Varapuzha. He wrote 14 books on Christian faith including Satyavedacharithram. He was responsible for the sponsoring of the periodicals Nazrani dipika and Satyanadam.

Rev. George Mathen wrote several books on theology and secular subjects. Satyavedaketam (1861), Veda-samyukti (1862) Orusamvadu and Balabhyasanam (1867) are studies on scriptures. He had also contributed learned essays on earth, atmosphere, heavenly bodies, rebirth, matriarchal system, etc. His most outstanding work is Malayanmayude vyakaranam (Malayalam grammar, 1863). He was quite familiar with both Western and Indian approaches to the subject.

A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian or the South Indian Family of Languages written by Rev. Robert Caldwell (1814-1891) and published in 1856 is a monumental work. It was Caldwell who proved beyond doubt that the languages of South India, i.e., Telugu, Kannada, Tamil and Malayalam, belonged to a separate family having no genealogical connection with Sanskrit or any other language of the Indo-Aryan family.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-MARATHI-PUNJABI

Archdeacon Koshy (1826-1900) is to be particularly remembered for his Paradeshi mokshayatra (translation of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, 1845) and Pulleli Kunchu (a treatise on the superiority of Christianity written in the form of fiction, 1882). His other important works are Ayayum makanum (The nurse and the child), Pattu vayassulla oru penpaital (A ten year old girl), Bhasmakkuri (The ash mark) and Tiruvavatharam (The sacred incarnation).

Shobharaja vijayam, Kripavati, Simson charitam Ougen charitam, Oru tiruyatravivaranam, Matavinte vanakkaganam and Bible (translation) are the contributions of Nidheerikkal Mani Kathanar (1842-1904).

In short the foreign and native missionaries gave a firm and modern basis to the study of Malayalam, not only by directing the way, but also by making substantial contributions. The lexicographic and grammatical works of these scholars and also their translations from foreign languages into Malayalam became beacon lights for the new generation of Writers.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIUBUTION (Marathi) Christian Missionaries had started infiltrating into India long before the British empire was founded. Though their primary mission was to spread their religion they are found significantly contributing to the nineteenth century Marathi literature. The Christian missionaries not only published the first Marathi book but also produced the first Marathi grammar and encyclopaedia. They were clever enough to realize that to use the local language was the wisest way to preach their religion. It resulted in the production of a considerable bulk of writings in Marathi. This literature includes the translations of the Bible, prayer books, stories and text books for schools. Christa purana an epic written by Fr. Stephens (1549-1619), an English missionary staying at Goa is one such example. Fr. Stephen had command over both Konkani and Marathi and wrote Doutrina Christa explaining the doctrines of Christianity. Even the periodicals started by these missionaries contributed valuably to the development of Marathi literature and language. In 1800 William Carey (1761-1834) started the first printing press at Serampore near Calcutta where he printed the first English version of the Marathi grammar and in 1810 he published the Marathi encyclopaedia in the Modi script.

Books like Sinhasanbattishi (1814), Panchtantra (1815), Hitopadesh (1815), Raja Pratapadityache Charitra (1816) and Raghuji Bhosalyachi Vanshaval (1816) were also published by him. He also published translations of various sections of the Bible. 'The Amerian Marathi Mission' founded in Bombay in 1813 also published a translation of the New Testament in 1826. The Scottish mission had also its share in this literary activity. The Bombay Tract and Book society published quite a number of books. Rev. Gardon Hall wrote books like Lekarachi Pahili Pothi (1818), Prashnottaravali (1819), Tribhuvanachi goshta (1822), Khagoividya (1824), Devachya daha adnya (1855). Rev. Michel and Rev. Wilson also wrote such books. Samuel Newell's book Shubhavartaman ran into nine editions. Horatio Bardwell is said to have written nearly eight books in Marathi. His book Yesu Christ yache avatarkratyachi bakhar (1820) was quite popular. Thomas Candey's books Kharya dharmachi chinhe (1829), Khara dharma konta yacha vichar (1831), Yesu Christane ji prarthana shushyas sangitali tijavar tecka (1836) and Bhava konawar thevava (1839) seem to have made a good mark. Similar type of books were written by David Allen and Henry Ballentine.

The stories written on the life and work of Christ had greater literary brilliance as they at times used local models. Mrs. Farrar wrote books like Chamatkarik goshti (1834) Henry ani tyacha sambhalnara gadi sambu hyachi goshta (1835). Mrs. Candey's parables written for children were quite popular. Besides such stories the songs composed by Henry Ballantine were popular among the masses. Apart from these foreigners the native missionaries like Baba Padmanji (1831-1906) and Rev. Narayan Vaman Tilak are great names in Marathi literature as the former was a great novelist and the latter a poet of a great merit. Thus the Christian literature in Marathi has its own place and status. Occasional literary gatherings organized even today show the continuation of this tradition.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Punjabi). Before the annexation of Punjab to the British Empire, a Christian Mission had been established at Ludhiana. In order to propagate their religion through publications, the Mission started the first printing press in Punjab. For achieving their objective, the missionaries focussed their attention at first on the study of the Punjabi language. The main centre of the Mission was situated at Serampore in Bengal, where the preliminary work regarding the Punjabi language was done by William Carey, who prepared the Grammar of the Punjabee Language and printed it at the Mission Press in Serampore in 1812. Besides the preparation of his grammar, Carey also published an incomplete translation of the Bible in 1811 in the Gurmukhi script. These works outside Punjab were a precursor of the significant contribution made by the Ludhiana Mission and other Christian missionary societies in Punjab. Besides the Christian Mission at Ludhiana, the Punjab Religious Book Society, the American Tract Society and the Kharar Mission also contributed to the development of the Panjabi language and literature.

The publications of the Christian Missions can be classified into the following heads: 1. Complete or incomplete translations of the Bible. 2. Stories, articles and pamphlets adapted from the Bible. 3. Study of the language: Dictionaries and grammars. 4. Purely literary works. 5. Books written for school children and 6. works relating to the religions, people and the puranic tales of India. The major contribution of the Missions is towards the first two categories. In the works of translation, the impact of dialects, rural idiom and Persian is frequently discernible. The names of the translators have not been mentioned. Robert Leech prepared A Grammar of the Pubjabee Language in 1938. Cross Starkey wrote A Dictionary-English and Panjabee, The Outlines of Grammar and also Dialogues with Explanatory Notes in 1849. J. Newton wrote A Grammar of the Panjabee Language with Appendices in 1851. The first Punjabi dictionary was prepared by Janvier of Ludhiana Mission in 1854. Multani Glossary was prepared by E.O' Brien. J Wilson completed his Grammar and Dictionary of Western Punjabi in 1898. A Dictionary of the Jatki or Western Punjabi by Jukes was published in 1900. Shahpuri-Kangri Glossary was prepared by J. Wilson.

Purely literary works include a translation of John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress in Yisui musafir di jatra (1859), a novel entitled Jyotir-udai (1882), a collection of short stories entitled Dharam pustak vichon by Rudolf (1865), a play regarding queen Astor written by S.S. Bachint, two biographies of Jesus Christ, a travelogue entitled Asia di sail, etc. Their contribution to Punjabi poetry is insignificant.

The significant contribution of the Christian missionaries lay in giving a lead in various forms of Punjabi literature. With them began the tradition of translations into Punjabi. They introduced several foreign words in our language and diverse philosophical and subtle thoughts in our literature. Their literary adventures not only enriched our literature, but also helped in bringing forth new writers like Shardharam Phillauri, Bhai Mayya Singh and Biharilal Puri. They did away with the Hindu tradition of writing in Braj bhasha and the Muslim tradition of writing in Urdu and concentrated on the language of the people in the Gurmukhi script. Such a trend had its impact on modern Punjabi writings during the Singh Sabha Movement. Tract and pamphlet writing was taken up seriously during this movement. These missionaries brought forth new genres of literatures from the West and by introducing them in Punjabi literature, they created new consciousness among the Punjabi writers and also widened their outlook on life and literature. Though they had their own interest of the propagation of their faith, they indirectly did a great service in the domain of the Punjabi language and literature.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Rajasthani). The first missionary to work on Rajasthani was from the Serampore mission of baptists near Calcutta. William Carey and his colleagues, J.C. Marshman and William Ward, published specimens of some Rajasthani dialects like Bikaneri, Marvadi, Udaypuri, Hadauti and Ujjaini (Malava), in their survey of Indian languages published in 1816. In each specimen, the present and the past tense forms of the auxiliary verbs were shown and the text of "Lord's Prayer" was given in translation. These missionaries of Serampore also translated and published the text of New Testament in the aforesaid dialects of Rajasthani. Names of J. Robson and John Traill are worth mentioning for their efforts in creating the conditions for literary activities. J. Robson of Scotch Presbyterian Mission of Beawar published a collection of Marvadi 'khyals' under the title A Selection of Khyals or Marvadi Plays with An Introduction and Glossary from the Beawar Mission Press in 1866. John Traill, in his Memo on Bhasha Literature (1884), supplied necessary information about the sayings of the disciples of Saint Dadu Dayal and also those of the disciples of the former. He also provided an English translation of the sayings of Dadu. S.H. Kellogg of the American Presbyterian mission published in 1876 his well-known book A Grammar of Hindi Language. While dividing the dialects of Hindi in four different parts, he placed the dialects of Rajputana under the first part. He included Marvadi, Mavadi, Mairvadi, Jaipuri and Hadauti dialects in this category and mentioned the peculiarities and form of each of them. Kellogg has particularly owned that he had received invaluable assistance from W. Robb. This fact is stated in his introduction to the Grammar. In the second edition of his Grammar published in 1893, Kellogg has supplied much important and new material in the form of making necessary additions to the tables of Rajasthani dialects and his own evaluation of the same. Perhaps the most important work done by the Christian missionaries on the Rajasthani language is that of G. MacAlister. Acting under the wishes of the Government of India, the then Prince of Jaipur, Maharaja Savai Madhosingh II entrusted the work of the survey of the various dialects spoken in the state of Jaipur to MacAlister. This work was published in 1898 from the Allahabad Mission Press under the title of the Specimens with a dictionary and a Grammar of the Dialects Spoken in the State of Jeypore. In this book gives the detailed specimens of fifteen dialects spoken in the state of Jaipur and also appends a grammar and a glossary. In fact MacAlister was the first among all Indians and foreign scholars to present such a detailed and reliable survey of the Rajasthani dialects and also such other Rajasthani dialects which carry a mixture of Brajbhasha, along with their critical appreciation. The speciality of this work of MacAlister lies in the fact that he collected the entire material of his book himself. This made his work authentic beyond all doubts. It is for this reason that MacAlister's work has been treated with special importance from the points of view of folk literature, grammar and lexicon. The importance of MacAlister's work is further made conspicuous by the fact that G.A. Grierson, the famous surveyer of the Indian languages, quotes specimens and appreciation of important dialects and sub-dialects from MacAlister's book. In his Linguistic Survey of India (Part I, vo. IX) he dealt with Dangi, Dang Bhang, Kalimal, Dungarwada, four Rajasthani dialects containing a mixture of Braj; and in part 2 of Volume IX, with Dhundhadi, Jaipuri, Shekhawati, Torawati, Kathaida, Chaurasi, Rajewati, Nagarchhal and Mewati. While presenting a critical appreciation of these dialects, Grierson praised the work of MacAlister expressing his gratitude to him at a number of places.

The subject being quite obsolete in the present context, it is extremely difficult to trace out a number of studies relating to the grammar of several dialects as well as the specimens of tribal and other such dialects which they also used as a medium of translation of Christian religious books.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Sindhi). According to the recorded evidence available to us so far, it was during the 17th century that some Christian missionaries visited Sindh for the purpose of propagating their religion. They established churches in Thato, Lahiri port and in some other towns in Sindh. But they could not achieve significant success in their mission, because most of them had to face the wrath of the then Muslim rulers of Sindh. As regards the earliest book in Sindhi pertaining to Christian religion during the period of the Muslim rulers, only one work has come to light. It is a translation of the Gospel of Saint Mathew entitled in Sindhi as Mati, which was brought out in 1825 by the Serampore Mission of Bengal. Some civil and military officers of East India Company who visited Sindh during the Muslim rule and became conversant with the local language, brought out small monographs on the Sindhi language and its vocabulary. In this field, the names of J. Prinsep (A grammar of the Scindee language, Bombay, 1835), Wathen ('A grammar and Vocabulary of the Sindhi language'), published in the journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, 1836), E.B. Eastwick ('Vocabulary of the Sindhi Language', published in the Journal of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Calcutta, 1843) and R. Leech (Vocabularies of Seven Languages Spoken in the Countries of the West of Indus, Bombay) are noteworthy.

After the conquest of Sindh by Charles Napier in 1843, the Sindh region came under the British rule. Thereafter, the Christian missionaries, due to the active patronage of the new government, began to propagate their religion fearlessly. During the later half of the last century, they were able to convert a few illiterate as well as educated Sindhis to their religion. A considerable number of informative booklets and a few translations of some portions from the Bible were published in Sindhi. Apart from such religious literature, some Christian fathers and European government officers, who had studied Sindhi well, began to enrich Sindhi by their writings.

Among the European officers of the British government, the following names are worth noting for their contribution to the growth of the Sindhi language and literature. George Stack (died in December 1853). He was a captain in the British army who was later on appointed a Deputy Collector in Hyderabad Sindh. He prepared the Sindhi Grammar (Published in 1849), English-Sindhi Dictionary (published in 1849) and Sindhi-English Dictionary (published in 1855). All these works were printed in Bombay and contain Sindhi written in the Devanagari script. Stack also translated the Bible in Sindhi which was published in 1850. Stack has also the credit of being the first scholar who collected five Sindhi folk-tales and published them as specimen of Sindhi prose in his Grammar. (2) Ellis Barrow was Assistant commissioner of Sindh and in charge of the Education Department. He standardized the Arabic-Sindhi script in 1853 with the help of an advisory committee, and introduced significant reforms in educational system in Sindh. The script devised by the committee is in vogue upto the present period though certain modifications have been made in it with regard to the combinations of characters and the diacritical marks. (3) Burns translated in Sindhi the Gospel of Saint John entitled Yohan, which was published in 1853. (4) F.J. Goldsmid translated in English verse a well-known legend of Sasui-Punhu, giving with it the original text also in Sindhi verse. It was published from London in 1863. (5) Richard Francis Burton (1821-1890) was instrumental in selection of the Arabic-Sindhi characters for Sindhi. He wrote four books on Sindh in English, in which he gave a brief account of the Sindhi language, literature and folk-tales.

Among the Christian missionaries who contributed to the growth of Sindhi language and literature, noteworthy scholars were: (1) Ernes Trumpp (1828-1885) was a German missionary well-known for writing the Grammar of Sindhi published from Leipzig in 1872. It contains historical and comparative study of the Sindhi language.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-TAMIL

Prior to that work, Trumpp compiled a Sindhi Reading Book in Sanskrit and Arabic characters, which was printed for the Church Missionary Society in London in 1858. He was the first scholar who procured two old manuscripts of Shah jo Risalo (The poetry of Sufi saint poet Shah Abdul Latif, 1689-1752), and on the basis of these works published critical edition of Shah's poetry. Though incomplete, it is the first printed edition in this field. It was printed in composed Sindhi type from Leipzig in 1866. Besides, the credit for writing critical research papers on linguistic aspects of Sindhi goes to Trumpp. These papers were published in different journals of Europe. (2) G. Shert, a Christian missionary in Hyderabad Sindh, who took keen interest in the study of the Sindhi language. He was a scholar of Sanskrit, Persian and many other languages. He published in 1866 a small glossary entitled Akhara dhatu, containing etymology of selected Sindhi words developed from Sanskrit. Again, he compiled a Sindhi-English Dictionary with the help of Mirza Sadik Ali Beg and Munshi Udham Thanwardass. It was published in the newly standardized Arabic-Sindhi script by the Education Department from Karachi in 1879. (3) L.W. Seymour, another missionary scholar of Sindhi, who published a Grammar of the Sindhi language from Karachi, in 1884. (4) Father Bambridge who was instrumental in generating new socio-political awakening among the intellectuals of Karachi. He was appointed the first President of 'Msx Denso Hall Literary Society' established in Karachi in 1885. (5) Parmanand Mevaram (1866-1938) and Khemchand Amritrai (1866-1941) who were foremost prose writers and journalists in Sindhi. They embraced Christianity in 1891-1892. They played an important role in the growth of Sindhi prose and journalism in Sindh. Parmanand is also well-known for his two Sindhi-English (1910) and English-Sindhi (1933) Dictionaries, which are authoritative works in this field.

During the last century, the Church Mission Society and the Zanana Missionary Society played a significant role in propagation of Christianity in Sindh by establishing Mission schools and publishing their religious literature in Sindhi.

During the present century, 'Sindh Christian Literary Society', established in 1906 in Karachi, paid more attention to the publication of religious literature. It brought out more than one hundred and fifty books in Sindhi during a short span of time. Charles William Haskell, who was at first the Secretary of the society and later on became the Principal of Grammar School in Karachi, was one of the main writers, who translated and wrote original works on Christianity in Sindhi. In order to teach Sindhi to non-Sindhi speakers through English, he prepared a Grammar of Sindhi, which was published from Karachi in 1942.

N.F. Kotwani, a Sindhi scholar, who accepted Christianity and was a disciple of Parmanand Mevaram, took charge of the Jote, a literary fortnightly journal in Sindhi, after the death of his 'guru' in 1938. It was started in 1896 by Bhavani Charan Bannerji (Upadhyaya Brahma Bandhu, b. 1861, d. 1907) mainly for propagation of Christianity in Sindh. But, when he left for Calcutta, Parmanand became the sole editor of the magazine around 1900. Under his editorship, besides spreading Christian thought in Sindh, it also acquired a prominent place among the Sindhi literary periodicals. Father Kotwani celebrated the golden jubilee of Jote in 1946 by publishing its special volume. After the Independence of the country in 1947, the work of the Christian mission declined gradually in Sindh, which became a part of the Islamic nation of Pakistan.

M.K.J.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Tamil). The contribution of Christian missionaries to the Tamil prose tradition is considerable. Apart from the prose style which was exclusively their creation in the modern period they interested themselves in the lexical, syntactic and etymological matters, and even in the reform of the script.

Robert di Nobili who claimed to be a Roman brahmin was the first of the missionaries to contribute to Tamil prose in his Christian sermons. Much to the annoyance of fellow Christian missionaries and adopted brahminic way of life, thinking and style, in order to convert people from the higher castes. Whether he succeeded in that purpose or not he succeeded in giving Tamil a flexible prose. He belonged to the 17th century.

He was succeeded by Constantius Beschi (1681-1742) who followed in di Nobili's footsteps even with greater effect. Learning the language to perfection from Tamil pundits, he wrote a life of Christ in excellent Tamil verse imitative of Kamban, the epic poet, as well as various minor poems, long and short, on Christian themes which are still current and praised. His single creative prose work is the first continuous long narrative in Tamil Paramartha guru kathaigal. Told in a colloquial style, the stories of the guru went into the folk tradition of the Tamil, Kannadiga and Telugu people and are still current.

Beschi who had a Tamil, name Viramamunivar, and an Urdu name Ismeeti Saheb compiled the first alphabetical lexicon the Chatur Aharadi as well as grammars of the spoken and the written language in Tamil. His spelling reforms are still current like the dotting of the letters over the head and others. His sermons were said to be in chaste Tamil prose and convincingly emphatic.

In contrast to the Catholic missionaries, the Protestant missionaries did not go native but satisfied themselves with setting up printing presses and bringing out the translations of the Bible in Tamil. Ziegenbalg was the pioneer in the movement and he belonged to the early eighteenth century; by the time of Schwartz of Thanjavur, the Tamil country was dotted with English schools which did yeoman work in reviving interest in old classics and old ways of living.

The missionary work was continued ably in the nineteenth century by Mackenzie who compiled a history of South India the Madras Education Society which, under its English patrons, encouraged the writing of Tamil prose texts for native educational consumption by translators and academically trained men like G.U. Pope, Ellis, Percival, etc. Arumugha Navalar who had helped the Christian Missionaries translate the Bible in Jaffna shifted to Chidambaram and did work in promoting the Shaiva religion in the Christian manner to which he had been trained.

A Protestant Bishop of Madras, Caldwell wrote A Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Languages which perpetuated the myth of Aryan and Dravidian dichotomy-the Dravidian no whit inferior to the Aryans.

The Christian missionaries founded schools, the earliest ones being in the Thanjavur and Tirunelveli areas which regions naturally maintain a lead even to this day in Tamilnadu. The earliest school for all students to learn English was the one at Orathanadu Mukti Mambapuram which Rajah Serfojee founded in 1802; it continues to function to this day. At times of famine and other kinds of stress in society, the missionaries were active in helping the people.

K.N.S.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Telugu). The missionaries from the West promoted learning and rendered invaluable service to the literature in Telugu. The Christian missionaries were interested in spreading the Christian faith among the Telugu people and therefore, undertook the translation of the Bible and the writing of pamphlets and books relating to Christianity. There were also great scholars among these missionaries who studied Telugu language and literature and acquired competence to prepare Telugu dictionaries and Telugu grammar.

It is said that as early as about 1700 the French missionaries prepared a Telugu Dictionary (Dictionnaire Telugu) and a Telugu Grammar (Gentoo Grammar). But these two books were found to be not of much use to the Telugus.

Lexicons in Telugu had been composed in verse and the words had been compiled not according to alphabetical order but subject-wise as in Sanskrit Amarakosham under some groups such as gods (deva varga), heavens (swarga varga), sides (dig varga), sound (vak varga), human (manushya varga) etc. For the first time in the history of lexicography in Telugu, William Brown published his Vocabulary of Gentoo and English in 1807 A.D., arranging the Telugu words in an alphabetical order; but in so doing he introduced an innovation.

About after a decade Campbell published his Telugu

Dictionary. It is said that it is the first Telugu lexicon with words compiled in Telugu alphabetical order. Campbell must have acquired a fair knowledge of the Telugu language and literature to be competent to prepare a Telugu lexicon and a Telugu grammar.

J.C. Morris (1778-1858), a civil servant, mastered Telugu and served for some time as a Telugu translator to the Government. His first publication was Telugu Selections with Grammatical Analysis in which he furnished a glossary of revenue terms used in the Northern circars in 1823. He also published an English-Telugu Dictionary on the model of Johnson's English Dictionary. Under the auspices of the Board founded for the college and public instruction, the Government published it in two volumes in 1835. It was prepared, as he says in the introduction, "not only for the purpose of assisting Europeans in the study of Telugu but also to aid natives of this country in acquirement of English." Ravipati Gurumurthi Sastri helped him in the compilation of this dictionary. Morris was also the Editor of the Madras Journal of Literature and Science for some years.

His younger brother, Henry Morris, who served as a Judge in Godavari district and also as Inspector of Schools for some time, wrote a Simplified Grammar in Telugu.

C.P. Brown published a Dictionary of Mixed Dialects supplementary to his Telugu Lexicon and presented in it hundreds of foreign words that came into use in Telugu. Hundreds of English words have been used by the Telugus in their language and a great many of them found a place in Telugu literature too. C.P. Brown, in his English-Telugu Dictionary, says, 'Under the Musalman rule, Telugu, Kannada and Tamil were filled with Arabic words. At present these are retained and many English expressions are added....the Telugu used in conversation and business is becoming more and more thickly sprinkled with English words'.

C.P. Brown's Telugu-English Dictionary was published 1852. He had worked at it for about 20 years during which period he made a deep study of the lexicons published previous to him, and of the Telugu classics, many of which he published. Of these some are still known as 'Brown's editions'. The dictionary is very comprehensive; it includes prabandhas as well as shatakas from popular literature and also words in the spoken tongue along with idiomatic expressions.

C.P. Brown next prepared his English-Telegu Dictionary with the main object of helping the Telugus to understand and translate English books into Telugu. He explained the method adopted in explaining the meaning of some difficult English words. He says, "writing particularly to assist the Hindus, I have given some minute explanations which Englishmen may deem superfluous. But to the Hindu, they are advantageous."

The third Dictionary which C. P. Brown published in 1854 was a dictionary of the mixed dialect and English words used in Telugu. As he says, "it forms a requisite supplement to a dictionary of the Telugu language; and it contains only those phrases which are current among the natives."

C.P. Brown's Telugu Grammar was first published in 1840 and the second edition appeared in 1857. It excels all the previous grammars written by foreigners. For the progress of lexicography in Telugu, the work started by western scholars—particularly C.P. Brown was the source of inspiration for the Telugu lexicographers in the matter of technique and execution.

A. Galleti's Telugu Dictionary printed at the Oxford University Press in 1935 is the latest work in the field of lexicography by western scholars.

The work relating to Telugu grammar is another great service rendered by the Christian scholars to the progress of the Telugu language and literature.

It must be said that the first commendable Telugu grammar was prepared by A.D Campbell in 1816. Caldwell published his Comparative Grammar of the Dravidian Language in 1855-56.

C.P. Brown's contribution to the field of Telugu literature relate also to the improvement of the printing press and editing and publishing Telugu classics with notes, glossaries and commentaries prepared by eminent scholars of his time. Referring to the state of affairs in the matter of Telugu literature he says, "When I began these tasks Telugu literature was dying out, the flame was just glimmering in the socket," and referring to the miserable conditions of the Telugu pandits of his time, he says, "The pandits expressed to me their grief that ruling powers regarded them as useless pensioners" He clearly stated, "To benefit the Hindus was my primary object "

C.P. Brown encouraged the pandits to write the commentaries in the spoken language in which they orally rendered the meaning of the verse to the listeners. He discouraged the vainglorious exhibition of scholarship in the commentaries written by some pandits and encouraged those which could be useful to the learners. Brown's edition of Vemana shatakam is exquisite. He published Vemana shatakam with his English translation in 1829. Another important service rendered by C.P. Brown relates to his translation of the Gospel of Luke in 1832 under the caption of Luke suvarta into Telugu prose and this was rendered into Telugu verse by a Jangam (a Shaivite) poet. Brown wrote also the Telugu reader, being a series of letters, private and on business, police and revenue matters, with an English translation, grammatical notes and a little lexicon in three parts. His Vakyavali containing exercise in idioms, English and Telugu, was also printed and published in 1852.

The foreign scholars like C.P. Brown and Caldwell admired the mellifluousness of the language, and called it the 'Italian of the East'.

The Christian missionaries began writing books on the Christian faith in the early years of the 17th century. Robert de Nobili, an Italian padre (of the Madurai Mission) wore the robes of an Indian ascetic, styled himself as Jagadguru and went about preaching the Christian faith. He was well-versed in Tamil, Telugu and Sanskrit.

Benjamin Schultze, a German missionary, acquired a good knowledge of Telugu and wrote an epitome of spiritual instruction in the Holy Bible (Satyamaina Vedamlo Vunde Jnana Upadesala Yokka samkshepam). It was printed in 1746 in Germany. Another book of his was first translated by P. Malaiyappan from German into Tamil, under the caption Nuru karyangal and it was translated into Telugu under the caption of Buddhi or Kaligina.....nuru jnana vachanala yokka chinna pustakam.

The Holy Bible, containing the Old and New Testaments was translated from the originals into Telugu by the Serampore Missionaries. Parts of the Gospel were also published separately by several authors and they were printed at several presses under the caption in Telugu characters Duvuni yokka sasmatamaina vakyam suviseshamu.....mammu rakshinche karta aina yesu kristu yokka subha samacharamu. The Gospel of Mark was published by the committee founded in 1835.

The Pentateuch was translated into Telugu by the Serampore Missionaries, viz., W. Carey, J. Marshman and W. Ward. The Book of Exodus was translated into Telugu and published by a committee founded in 1835 which made use of the papers of Pritchett and Gordon. It was printed at the Mission Press, Bellary, in 1844.

Hundreds of such books were translated into Telugu and published at Serampore, Bellary, Madras, Visakhapatnam and other places.

The services rendered by Colonel Colin Mackenzie (1753-1821) to Telugu literature and history are highly commendable. He had the assistance of Kavali Venkata Borraiah, a resident of Eluru, for whom he had high regard. He collected cart-loads of material—1568 books relating to Telugu, Sanskrit, Kannada, Tamil, Malayalam, Oriya, Marathi, Hindi, Parsi, Arabic and Burmese; 2070 local records, 8076 inscriptions, 6218 coins, 79 illustrations of old buildings, 2630 pictures of sculpture etc., 106 idols, statues etc., and 40 relics of old ruins. In 1836 the Rev. William Taylor who was appointed to examine and classify them prepared a descriptive catalogue of about 570 pages. C.P. Brown noticed that many papers of Mackenzie's collections were worn out; he got them rewritten on good and durable paper. There were 62 volumes relating to local history and about 45 of them belonged to Telugu districts. Mackenzie may be regarded as the first western scholar, a Christian, who laid the foundation for research work in our country and his assistant was Borraiah, a Telugu of Eluru. The Telugu used in the various versions of the Bible, in the Grammar of Campbell and Brown, and in the dictionaries from W. Brown's to C.P. Brown's and in the commentaries of the classics, was the popular language and not the artificial classical language. This was in consonance with the tradition of writing prose as well as commentaries in popular Telugu, commencing with the prose writers of Madurai.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION-URDU

A.H. Arden followed the same method in his A Progressive Grammar of the Telugu Language, with copious examples and exercises, and in his A Companion of Telugu Reader to his Grammar.

As early as 1606, the Madurai Mission was founded by Robert de Nobili who worked among the Telugus of the Tanjore and Madurai kingdoms. Later on, the Carnatic Mission commenced its activities south of the river Krishna in the early years of the 18th century. As a result of their activities, Pingali Ellanarya of Guntur district wrote a poem of four cantos, known as Tobhya charitra and also as Sarveshwara mahatyam. Mangalagiri Ananda Kavi of Guntur district, a Niyogi Brahmin, embraced Christianity and wrote Vedanta rasayanam, a poem of four cantos, a few years after 1750. It related to the life and teachings of Jesus Christ. The Rev. George Cran and Rev. George Das Granges connected with the London Mission Society in Visakhapatnam, first learnt Telugu and they translated the Gospels in 1812.

During the first two quarters of the 19th century, the Bellari Tract Society published Christian literature for the Telugus.

The American Baptist Mission working at Nellore, Ongole, Kurnool and Hyderabad established educational institutions like the Noble College at Masulipatnam, which spread English education in that part of the Telugu country. The Noble College produced many graduates including the first two women graduates of India, Kamalamma and Sundaramma, daughters of Sivarama Krishnamma.

Heyer, a priest from Germany, came to Guntur in 1842, and opened a school for children, and later on a college was opened which is known as Andhra Christian College. Similarly schools were opened at Nandyal and Kurnool by the society for the propagation of the Gospels. The Christian Baptist Mission came to the Telugu country in 1867 and started schools at several places. The American Lutheran Church Mission also established several schools at many places. Though very few people could be converted to christianity by the activities of these Christian missionary bodies, it must be admitted that the outlook of the Telugu was widened, and that through the study of English literature at the school and college, Telugu literature was enriched by the Telugu writers who were influenced by the western culture.

Education for Telugu girls was also provided by the missionary bodies at many places.

The East India Company was first interested in starting schools primarily to get educated persons to serve in their offices. St. George Colleges were established with a motive to give the civilian officers instruction in the South Indian languages of the province of Madras. So far as Telugu was concerned, scholars like Vedam Pattabhiramana Sastry and Ravipati Gurumurti Sastry were appointed to teach Telugu. Many books were published promoting the development of vernacular literature. Thomas Munro, during the period in which he was the Governor of Madras (1820-27), organised schools in the Talukas and in the district headquarters.

MISSIONARIES, CONTRIBUTION (Urdu). Languages develop in two ways, viz through conscious efforts of top writers and linguists and through natural growth. The latter sort of development takes place when individuals or organisations make efforts to propagate certain ideas among speakers of a language, or the speakers of a language incorporate in their speech, and later on, in writing certain words or word combinations for better expression. In the propagation work, the chief agencies have been religious missions, as secular political missions are a recent phenomenon.

In the development of Urdu the works of Christian missionaries in the 18th and the 19th centuries have been of much significance. In a way it can be said that these missionaries not only propagated their religious beliefs among the masses but also made them conversant with written Urdu language and developed reading habit among them. They had ample funds at their disposal, and taking advantage of the recently developed printing industry, brought out low-cost books and tracts.

Grierson has mentioned several translations of religious books. The main translators are Benjamin Schultze and Martin, besides the missionaries of Serampore. The books mentioned by him are: 1. Translation of the first four chapters of the Book of Genesis, 2. The Book of Daniel, 3. The Books of Luke, 4. Acts of Apostles, Letter of Jacob, Gospel of Mark, Gospel of John, Revelation of John, and New Testament, all these were translated by Schultze between 1750 and 1758, 5. New Testament of Jesus Christ translated by Mirza Mohammad Farhat and other Indians, 6. Translation of the Bible made by missionaries of Serampore, 7. Translation of the Bible from Greek to Hindustani made by Martins. All these translations were made between 1745 and 1758.

Mohammad Uzair of the A.M.U. in the late forties of this century, made 'Contribution of Urdu in the spread of non-Islamic religions' the subject for his Ph.D. thesis. He has worked in great detail on the books brought out by Christian missions and missionaries and has mentioned over one hundred books. He has divided these into five categories: 1. Translations of the scriptures, 2. Commentaries on the scriptures, 3. Miscellaneous books on ethics, 4. Religious books in poetry, 5. Books meant for children.

MITHILA-MIHIR-MITHILA-MODA

Most of these books were published in Lahore and Calcutta. Some others were published at Ludhiana, Bareilly, Mirzapur and Lucknow. Most of the books of the first category, i.e., translations of the scriptures, consisted of translations of New Testament or Old Testament. In a few cases, both have been given in one volume. Then there are translations of the Book of David and the Psalms of David. One book on the Psalms was translated from Arabic into Urdu and was published by the American Methodist Press at Bareilly in 1865. A remarkable work has been Urdu translation of the Holy Bible by the Madras Bible Society, printed by the Christian Knowledge Society Press.

So far as commentaries are concerned, these are mainly on important parts of the Bible. Only one commentary on the whole of the Bible is mentioned, but its translator or place or date is not available, as the first page of the 643-page book was torn off. Among the authors of these commentaries, some important names are. Robert Clarke, Moulvi Imad-ud-Din, Joseph Avon, E.H.M. Walker, J.J. Locks and J. Alibakhsh. Among these books, special mention must be made of the contents of the Book of Exodus in the form of questions and answers. The book was written by J.J. Locks and was published at Lahore in 1928.

Among general books on Christianity, about 50 in number, mentionable are Book of Mass, published in 1928, Kitab-e-Tariqulhayat (book of the way of life) published in 1847 (in this book Christian values are proved higher in comparison with those of other religions), Aina-e-Dil (mirror of heart) and Talim-ul-Masih which is an Urdu translation of the book of Darcy, Lord Bishop of Kalohar, translated by I.U. Nasir and published at Lahore in 1908. Aina-e-Dil is a unique work. In it a picture of human body is shown with different animals occupying different limbs and in the text are given detailed interpretations of these symbols of human thought and action.

Apart from prose works comprising serious arguments and fables and anecdotes, some missionaries have also used poetry as means of propagation of their faith. There are 14 books of poetry mentioned by Mohammad Uzair. It seems the authors of these books are well-versed in the art of poetry. At least one of them, Pyare Lal 'Shakir' is fairly known to the students of Urdu literature. Then there is Kedar Nath 'Minnat', who wrote in 1928 a long poem, Zikre-Masloob, in the 'Marsia' style; it deals with the subject of the crucifixion. Three other books of poetry are written by 'Minnat'. Another mentionable book is Faryad-e-Muntazir by Moulvi Safdar Ali 'Safdar'; it is about the return of Christ. Rahmat Masih 'Waiz' is another notable poet of Christianity.

The singular service which Christian missionaries rendered to Urdu was its simplification. Certainly their language somewhat missed the idiom of Urdu in the beginning, but it paved the way for the writers of the Fort William College and later for Mirza Ghalib and Sir Sayyid Ahmed Khan to develop the balanced and charming style of Urdu prose.

MITHILA-MIHIR (Maithili). Mihir means the sun, which repels the darkness of night and casts its light all around. In 1909, under the patronage of the Maharaja of Darbhanga, a bilingual Hindi-Maithili monthly magazine was started with the name, Mithila-Mihir, suggesting its objective—to expel the darkness of ignorance by throwing light. After some time it was made a weekly. It accelerated the pace of development of both Hindi and Maithili. Its first editor was Vishnukant Jha Sastri. Yoganandkumar, Janardan Jha 'Janasidan' and Kapileshwar Jha Sastri came in succession. In 1935 Acharya Surendra Jha 'Suman' was appointed its editor. He brought out a voluminous special number entitled Mithilank, relating to the cultural, social, educational and historical aspects of the life of Mithila. He continued to bring out from time to time other special numbers. The magazine thus produced not only a vast body of valuable literature but also a number of excellent writers of Maithili literature. The magazine remained suspended for a few years since 1954, but in 1960 it was restarted from the Indian National Press, Patna, under the editorship of Sudhanshushekhar Chaudhari. In 1984 it turned into a daily newspaper, but functioned for only two years or so. In 1987 it reappeared as a fortnightly literary magazine and is running regularly. Thus Mithila-Mihir enjoys the longest life in the history of Maithili journals.

R.J.

MITHILA-MODA (Maithili). With the new light coming from the West modern Indian languages started developing rapidly. The progress in modern way in Maithili has been, however, a little slow. In 1905 Vidyavachaspati Madhusudan Jha and Rambhadra Jha started the first Maithili periodical, Maithila Hita Sadhana from Jaipur (Rajasthan). Inspired by it, Mahamahopadhyaya Muralidhar Jha, with the support of a host of Maithil Pandits in Varanasi, started a Maithili monthly, Maithila-Moda, from Varanasi. In the circle of Maithil intelligentsia it is known as Moda. It ran continuously for twenty-two years till 1927, and after an interruption of ten years, it was restarted in 1937 under the editorship of Upendra Jha, and was finally closed in 1941. It may be noted that Mithila has always respected Hindi as national language, and as such the early Maithili periodicals, Maithila-hita-sadhana, Mithila-mihir and Mithila-moda, devoted some pages to the cause of Hindi. But in 1914, when the Bihar State Hindi Sahitya Sammelan at its Bhagalpur session declared Maithili to be a mere dialect of Hindi, Mithila-Moda in retaliation removed Hindi from its coverage.

MITHYABHIMAN-MITRA, ATULKRISHNA

Developing modern Maithili prose and giving it a standard form were the important achievements of Mithila-Moda. It did not focus its attention on the enrichment of Maithili literature by producing poems, fiction, dramas etc., but its main object was to promote the cause of Maithili and to tackle the social, religious and political problems of the day. It expressed its views boldly fearlessly, and as such its impact on society was quite powerful.

MITHYABHIMAN (Gujarati) is a drama written by Kavishri Dalpatram. It is ranked high among the comic plays in the history of Gujarati dramatic literature. Kavishri Dalpatram has incorporated the elements of a farcical folk-play known as 'Bhawai', of ancient Sanskrit plays and of the western drama in this comic play.

This play is divided into eight Acts, with Jivram Bhatt as the main character. Kavishri Dalpatram has succeeded in bringing out the element of humour and laughter resulting from the predicament of a vain man with a false pride based on racial bias. Light entertainment is provided by the character of Ranglo, who is a clown, or a jester, so popular in folk-plays or 'Bhawai'. Scenes are developed on the pattern of western drama. Thus, Kavishri Dalpatram has presented a new form of Gujarati comic play in his own style, borrowing liberally from the western, Indian and regional dramatic conventions.

In the fifth Act of this play the dramatist has interwoven a farcical sub-plot. The main character of this play is Jivram Bhatt, who is afflicted with night-blindness but would not like the world to know about it. He goes to his father-in-law's house, and invites a lot of difficulties and confusions while making a vainglorious effort to hide his weaknesses and limitations. This, in a nutshell, is the main idea of the dramatic plot.

The motion of the play is accelerated with the help of characters like the frank, blunt and garrulous Ranglo, Pancho, Bijal, along with the vainglorious Jivram Bhatt, and the action is supplemented by comic interludes associated with his predicaments. The drama ends with a scene which describes the illness of Jivram Bhatt, his death, and his confession before death about his vanity and false pride. Owing to the last scene, perhaps, the drama seems to lose its hold. However, as a comic play and a farce, it has all along been received well.

MITRA, ARUN (Bengali; b. 1909) was born at Jessore (now in Bangladesh). He graduated from the University of Calcutta and worked as a journalist for the newspaper, Anandabazar patrika, for some time. Later he studied French at the Alliance Francaise in Calcutta and, on a scholarship from the Government of France, went to France to study the French language and literature. He lived in Paris for three years and obtained a Ph.D. from the France to study French language and literature. He lived in Paris for three years and obtained a Ph.D. from the Sorbonne University. When he returned, he became a Professor of French at the University of Allahabad where he taught for twenty years till he retired in 1972.

Arun Mitra is a versatile writer but he writes sparingly. He has published eight volumes of poems which include Prantarekha (The border line, 1943), Utser dike (Towards the source, 1954), Ghanishtha tap (The warmth of close proximity, 1963), Mancher baire matite (On the ground below outside the stage, 1970), Shudhu rater shabda nai (Not nocturnal sound only, 1978) Pratham pali shesh pathar (The first silt the last stone, 1981) and Khujte khujte eto dur (Come so far in quest). He also wrote a novel, Shikar jadi chena jai (If only the root could be known, 1979).

His works of translation include Stabdha samudra, Candide and Shesh sanglap.

He received the Rabindra Purashkar for Shudhu rater shabda nai in 1979 and the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Khujte khujte eto dur in 1987.

MITRA, ATULKRISHNA (Bengali; b. 1857, d. 1911) was born at Thanthaniya in Calcutta. He began with writing poems which appeared in such periodicals as Sulabha samachar, Sahitya mukur and Dut. He later edited a monthly paper named Andolan. He also edited the Weekly Vasumati for a short period. About 1872 he formed a drama association and staged Pagalini, his first play. In 1887 he joined the National Theatre of Pratap Jahori as a playwright. He worked as the Manager and a playwright of the Emerald Theatre of Gopallal Seal.

Atulkrishna wrote many mythological, devotional, historical and humorous plays the most popular of which are: Nirbapita dip (1876), Prabhas (1876), Agamani (1876), Pishachini or jantranajantra (1878), Bijaya or Pratima bisarjan (1878), Kanak pratima (1878), Ratnabedi (1880), Gopi-goshtha (1889), Uddhar sambad (1891), Phullara or Ma (1894), Bappa Rao (1905), Lulia (1907), Tuphani (1908), Hinda-hafez (1908), Rang raj (1909), Dombaj (1909), Ayesha (1909), Thike bhul (1910), Pashane prem (1910), Shahajadi (1911), Parner tan (1912), Asal-nakal (1912), Mohini maya (1912), Nandotsab, Tulsilila, Nandakumarer phansi and Balibadh.

Atulkrishna became also famous for his operas such as Adarsha sati (1876) and Namdav viday (1884). His Hiranmayi (1888), an opera based on the novel Jugalan-guriya of Bankimchandra Chatterjee, became very popular. His play Dharmabir Mohammad (1885) was staged in Dacca. But the play was proscribed because it was against the religious codes of Islam to impersonate the Prophet on the stage.

MITRA, BIMAL-MITRA, DINABANDHU

MITRA, BIMAL (Bengali; b. 1912) a very widely read and eminent novelist was born in a middle-class family at Chetla, near Kalighat, Calcutta. After obtaining his M.A. degree, he took up a job in the railways which he resigned after some years to devote himself fully to literature and music. Owing to natural shyness to appear before the public, he gave up his musical pursuit and plunged into a whole-time literary career. His first novel was Chhai (Ash) which has now been forgotten. His first significant work was Saheb hibi golam (1952), a historical romance centering round the past 'babu culture' of Bengal. This novel at once brought him to the limelight as a creative writer. He has vividly chronicled the history of long three hundred years of our country from 1690 to the present age in his outstanding fictions Begam Marie Biswas, Saheb bibi golam, Kari diye kinlam, Ekak dashak shatak, Chalo Kolkata, Asami hajir etc. Of late he has planned another ambitious novel, Ei deha (This body) which has attracted the attention of many readers as it is being serialised in a literary journal. He is fond of drawing characters from ordinary life so that common people can share their joys and sorrows. He regards fiction as a social science which should aim at liberating society from dishonesty and exploitation. His popularity mainly rests on his rare gift of spinning stories in an attractive way. As a recognition of his talents he was awarded the Sarat Purashkar by the Sarat Samity, Calcutta, in 1983. Many of his works have been translated into many major Indian languages.

MITRA, DINABANDHU (Bengali; b. 1832, d. 1873), preeminently a dramatist, was admitted into Hare School from where he obtained a junior scholarship in 1850. He then went to the Hindu College and was admitted in the fourth class. In 1855, Dinabandhu left College and was appointed Post Master in Patna. After a year and a half he was appointed Inspecting Post Master of the Orissa circle. Later he worked at Nadia and Dacca. It was a time when in the countryside of Bengal the indigo planters were causing great hardship to the peasants. Dinabandhu saw the oppression and the suffering. After frequent transfers to different places he settled at Krishnagar. Probably towards the end of 1869 he was appointed to the post of Supernumerary Inspecting Post Master in Calcutta. The British Government conferred on him the title to Rai Bahadur but denied him promotion in the service in spite of his efficiency. He had to toil hard without any rest and as a result his health broke down. He was debilitated with diabetes and died prematurely.

Dinabandhu began to write when he was at school. He came under the influence of Ishwarchandra Gupta, a noted poet of that time, who edited a periodical named Sambad prabhakar. Dinabandhu began to write poems in that periodical. But he became famous only when his drama, Nildarpan (1860), was staged. He had seen the ruthless persecution of the poor farmers by the inhuman indigo-planters in the countryside of Bengal and he felt called upon to protest. Nildarpan was relentlessly realistic and raised a storm with its scathing criticism of the indigo planters. The drama was translated into English by Michael Madhusudan Dutt and published by Reverend Long for which he was fined and imprisoned. It was translated into many other languages of Europe. His next work, Nabin tapasvini (the young hermitess) was printed and published in Krishnagar in 1863. The main plot centres round the romantic story of Bijay and Kamini but the hilarious sub-plot relating to Jaladhar-Jagadamba is much more absorbing. Biye pagla buro, a farce, was published in 1866. But his greatest comedy is Sadhabar ekadasi published in the same year. It exposed the misled young men of the time and railed at their addiction to drinking. Lilavati (1867), his next work, is a romantic comedy with a theme which concerned the enlightened urban society of contemporary Bengal. Suradhuni (1871) is a long poem with ten Cantos narrating the course of the Ganges from its Himalayan source down to its merging in the ocean. Jamai-harik, published a year later, is a hilarious farce in which the playwright contrives to present amusing situations and grotesque characters. Dwadas kavita, also published in 1872, contains short reflective poems on a variety of subjects. Kamale kamini was published in 1873.

Dinabandhu's greatness as a dramatist rests on the skill and sympathy with which he portrayed the people of his time. The bright and dark aspects of life attracted him equally. Himself an embodiment of all virtue and goodness, he took delight in depicting with broad sympathy the people who were queer, grotesque, crooked and fallen. His dramas give a faithful and realistic picture of the contemporary society, both urban and rural.

Dinabandhu, like his contemporary dramatist Michael Madhusudan, followed the Western plot-structure in his plays. He showed skill in creating intriguing situations. His characters are real beings and he portrays them exactly as they are. He had intimate knowledge of the language of the common men and the idioms different classes of people used. So the language he used in his plays is true to the character and faithful to the situation.

MIRTA, GAJENDRAKUMAR (Bengali, b. 1908) is an eminent novelist and short story writer. He received his education in Varanasi and Calcutta and joined the book-trade as a canvasser. In this capacity he travelled widely in the villages and towns of Bengal, Orissa, Bihar and Assam. His literary life began with a short story published in the weekly, Ritwik (1928). For a considerable period he was the co-editor of the literary magazine, Katha sahitya. He won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1959 for his novel Kalkatar kachhei and the Rabindra Purashkar of the Government of West Bengal in 1965 for his novel Paush phaguner pala. He visited the U.S.S.R. in 1978 at the invitation of the Government of the U.S.S.R. He has written more than five hundred short stories and about forty novels. In each of his stories something happens which leads to an artistic finis. He has written psychological, historical, comic and uncanny stories besides love stories based on unusual experiences. Of his works mention may be made of Kalkatar kachhei (1957), Upakanthey (1960) and Paush phaguner pala (1965) which form a trilogy; Ratir tapasya (1946), Banhi banya (1959), Nari-o-niyati (1955) Ami kan pete rai (1968), Ekada ki kariya (1966), Tobu mane rekho (1971) and Panchajanya (1977).

MITRA, HARAPRASAD (Bengali; b. 1917) is a poet and literary critic. His critical works include Sahitya-parikrama (1946), Sahitya-bichinta (1962), Bankim sahityapath (1936), Kabitara bichitra katha (1964), Satyendranath Datter kabita o kabharup (1964), Bangla kabye prak-Rabindra (1981) and Sahityer-nanakatha (1984). While Mitra is a perceptive critic with a rare perspicacity of thought, he is, however, more famous as a poet and at least some of his poems will endure. An ecstasy of joy pervades through his early poems (Chandramallika, Bhraman) as he creates and recreates flippant images of transitory happiness. In Pautalik (The idolator, 1941) and Chunipannar kanna (1945), he is content with the ecstasy of the moment. The world with its 'beauteous forms' delights the poet but there is no romantic discontent at their transitoriness nor is there any 'immortal longing'. In Timirabhisar (The journey to darkness, 1954) he is distressed by the disintegration of values but soon reaffirms his faith in whatever is positive and beautiful. He is more romantic in these later poems in which he seeks with an overwhelming urgency enduring sources of joy. He asserts his belief that this temporary 'exile' in darkness will end someday when there will be golden eternity ('nitya hiranmay'). The same faith is renewed and reiterated in his Ashviner pheriwala (The hawkers of the month of Ashvin, 1963), Sanko theke dekha (View from the bridge, 1968), Idaning ami (Me of today, 1980), Jhauer shabda (The sound of pine trees, 1973) and Chhabi phire dekha (Looking again at the picture, 1985).

Haraprasad Mitra experiments with Bengali verse as Satyendranath Datta did before him and almost matches the latter in rhythmic perfection. But whereas with Satyendranath, the poetic content pales beside the sparkle and rhythm, with Haraprasad Mitra, such formal sparkle is matched by a depth of feeling and a lavish richness of images. Occasionally there is a calm inwardness which reminds one of Amiya Chakravarti.

MITRA, KHAGENDRANATH (Bengali, b. 1880, d.1961), an eminent educationist and litterateur, studied philosophy at the university of Calcutta and taught at different colleges in Bengal as professor of Philosophy. For some time he also worked as an Inspector of Schools. From 1932 to 1946, Khagendranath taught at the University of Calcutta as Ramtanu Lahiri Professor of the Bengali language and literature. Since his youth Khagendranath made his mark as an essayist, novelist and short story writer. He was also an adept 'kirtan' singer of the Bengal style. He represented the Calcutta University at the International Linguistic Congress held in Norway in 1936.

FURTHER WORKS. Nilambari (short stories, Calcutta, 1912) Kaner dul (short stories, Calcutta, 1921) Mudradosh (sketches, Calcutta, 1922), Bibi hau (Short stories, Calcutta, 1926), Mandakranta (short stories, Calcutta, 1948), Sukh-dukha (essays Calcutta, 1932)

MITRA, KHAGENDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1896, d. 1978) was an eminent writer of Bengali juvenile literature. His father, Sailendranath Mitra, was a mukhtar in the Tagore estate in Silaidaha. Mrinalini Debi, his mother, died in 1900 when Khagendranath was a boy of just four years. Khagendra went to a primary school in Calcutta and then to Kusthia English High School, East Bengal. He joined the freedom movement as a result of which he was driven out from the school. He, however, passed the matriculation examination a year later from the same school. After that he went to the City College in Calcutta but soon left it in response to Mahatma Gandhi's call for the national University and qualified for the award of the Bachelor's degree. After this he toiled for many years in various jobs, and at last became the editor of the well-known literary journal, Bansari, in which his 'Rup o trishna' was published. Khagendranath also edited Pushpa patra and Panchapushpa, two literary journals and started contributing regularly to Prabasi Bharatvarsha, Mahila and Chhotagalpa etc. His writings for the children began to appear around the 30's and onwards in the children's magazines like Shishusathi, Ramdhana, Mauchak, Mas-pola etc. He himself brought out a daily children's newspaper, Kishore. Later he edited a number of children's magazines like Sonar kathi, Natun manush, Shishu-sathi, Manikmela, etc. He wrote a useful preliminary history of Bengali juvenile literature in 1958 besides a large number of children's books. He also assisted Rajshekhar Basu in the preparation of his Bengali lexicon. He himself also compiled an English to Bengali dictionary entitled Everybody's Pocket Dictionary.

Khagendranath was a very competent translator also. He translated and adapted into Bengali many books like Bulwar Lytton's The Last Days Pompeii, Victor Hugo's Hunchback of Notre Dame, Stevenson's Black Arrow, etc. Khagendranath was the recipient of many awards and honours which include the Mauchak Prize, Bhubaneshwari Medal and Giri's Memorial Medal. He was honoured with the National Award in 1975 for his children's novel, Sumanta but Khagendranath refused to accept the award.

MITRAMAZUMDAR, DAKSHINARANJAN (Bengali; d. 1957), famous writer of juvenile books, had his early education in Ulail, Dacca. His literary activities started when with his father, Ramodaranjan, he came to Murshidabad to live there for about five years. He began to contribute articles to many leading juvenile magazines including Sahitya parishat patrika and Pradip. He himself happened to be the editor of a literary magazine, Sudha, but Dakshinaranjan had to go back to East Bengal to look after the property there in Mymensing. During his ten years' stay in East Bengal, Dakshinaranjan did a very great job for the Bengali literature. Under the guidance of Sri Dineshchandra Sen, he collected and carefully arranged many of the half-forgotten folk tales of Bengal in the books entitled Thakurmar jhuli (1906), Thakurdadar jhuli (1908), Dadamashayer thale (1913) and Thandidir thale (1945, 3rd. edn.) After this he wrote many more books for children but his Thakurmar jhuli remained the best. Rabindranath in an introduction to the book thanked Daksinaranjan, saying: "Though he has replanted the words from the grand mothers' mouth in the printed types yet the freshness of the leaves remain the same as before. He has kept the language and style and that essential archaic simplicity of these stories intact, and this has proved his capability and his fine sense of literary values."

Daksinaranjan was closely connected with many childrens' magazines and literary organisations. He had also a deep love for science and he was associated with the Bengal Science Society as its Joint Secretary. He was also the President of the Committee for Scientific Terminology.

FURTHER WORKS: Khokakhukur khela (1909), Charu Haru (1912) Dada masayer thale ba bangalar raskara (1913), Saral Chandi (1914), Pujar katha (1918), Bhadra (1927), Kishorder mon (1934), Banglar sonar chhele (1935), Amal bai (1937), Sabujlekha, First boy, Lekrod, Utpal o rabi (1938), Prithibir rupkatha (1940), Amar desh (1948).

MITRA, NARENDRANATH (Bengali, b. 1916, d. 1975), novelist and a great short story writer, graduated from Calcutta University and took to journalism as sub-Editor of Anadabazar Patrika, Calcutta. He extended the horizon and added to the dimension of the Bengali short story. He had an eye for the details of everyday life of the Bengali middle class people. His stories told in a very simple style attained a great height through his sympathetic insight into the sufferings, pathos and sentiments of the characters and the faithful delineation of the social milieu. His concern as an artist has been in the changing values of the middle class Bengali life, which has been intermittently tormented by famine, war and the refugee problem arising out of the partition of Bengal. Some of his collections of short stories are: Charai utrai (1951), Narendranath Mitre shreshtha galpa (1952), Sabha parba (1960), Sandhya raga (1968) and Barna banhi (1977). Of his novels the following are the most popular: Chena mahal (1963), Headmaster (1959), Dwaita sangit (1964), Akshare akshare (1965), Angikar (1959), Anya nayak (1965), Ekti nayikar upakhyan (1960), Jal matir gandha (1973), Mugdha prahar (1965), Surya sakshi (1965) and Tin din tin ratri.

MITRA, PREMENDRA (Bengali, b.1905 d.1988), an eminent poet, short story writer and novelist, was educated in Dacca and Calcutta, took to journalism for a living in early life, then shifted to film making and finally settled down as a writer. Among the journals and periodicals he served were Banglar katha, Nabashakti, Bangabani, Sangbad, Kali-kalam, Rangmashal (a juvenile magazine) and Nirukta (a poetical magazine which he edited jointly with Sanjay Bhattacharyya). Of the films he directed particular mention should be made of Bhabikal and Kalochhaya as two popular hits. But he is essentially a literary artist. Even in his early life he appeared promising both as a poet and as a skilled short story writer as was evidenced in his first book of poems, Prathama (1932) and two noteworthy short story collections, Benami bandar (The nameless port, 1930) and Putul o pratima (The doll and the image, 1932). Regarded as one of the foremost of the young writers who grouped around Kallol, a journal of the twenties which rebelled against the Tagorean literary modes and sought refuge in neo-realism in the fashion of the post-war Western writers, Premendra soon caught the eye of the critics with his fine imaginative sensibilities and subtle analytical insight.

Although Premendra has to his credit quite a good number of novels chief among which are Pank (The mud, 1926), Michhil (The procession, 1933), Agami kal (The Tomorrow, 1934), Upanayan (1934), Mrittika (The soil, 1939), Pratishod (The revenge, 1941), etc., his fame chiefly rests on his books of poems and short stories. Of the former, notable besides Prathama are Samrat (The emperor, 1940), Pherari fauj (The deserting soldiers; 1948), Jonakira (The glow-worms, 1954), Sreshtha kabita, Sagar theke phera (The return from the sea, 1956), Harin chita chil (The deer-the leopard-the dove, 1960), Kakhano megh (Cloud sometimes), Athaba kinnar (or the Kinnaras, 1967), Nadir nikate (Near the river, 1981) etc. His Sagar Theke Phera won the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1957 and Rabindra Prize in 1958. His collections of short stories include Panchashar (The five arrows, 1929), Aphuranta (The unending, 1935), Srestha galpa, Swanirbachitagalpa etc. The stories of his well known 'Ghanada' series, however, constitute a separate category and may be treated more as skits than as regular short stories.

Premendra had at one time experimented with free verse, then switched on to the more serious variant of it, in the end landing himself in the realm to real poetry. He writes sparsely, but whatever he writes he writes with depth. Of his short stories the better known are 'Sudhu kerani' (A mere clerk), 'Ponaghat periya', (Beyond the Ponaghat), 'Sagar sangam' (The confluence of the river and the sea), 'Bikrita kshudar phande' (In the trap of perverse hunger), 'Haito' (Possibly), 'Telenapota abisakar' (Discovering the village Telenapota), 'Aina' (The mirror), 'Stove', etc.

MITRA, PYARICHAND (Bengali, b.1814, d.1883), prose writer, social worker and thinker, was educated in Hindu College (Calcutta) and came under the influence of Henry Vivian Derozio. From its inception he was associated with Calcutta Public Library and was its Librarian and Secretary from 1848 to 1873. As a successful businessman he was elected Director of various business organisations. He edited (jointly with Radhanath Sikdar) a Bengali journal, Masik patrika from 1854 to 1857. His popular social novelette, Alaler gharer dulal, written in simple colloquial prose, was serialized in that magazine. He was actively associated with various social and learned organisations like the Society for the Acquisition of General Knowledge, British Indian Association, Bethune Society, the Bengal Social Science Association, Agricultural and Horticultural Society, the Theosophical Society etc. He acted as an Honorary Magistrate and as an Honorary Justice, was a Fellow of the University of Calcutta and a Member of the Legislative Council of Bengal. He wrote many popular and scholarly articles both in English and Bengali journals, and published 11 books in Bengali and 8 books in English. Of these Alaler gharer dulal, (1858) a picaresque novel, Banaranjit (1860), biographical and moral stories, and Krishipath (1861), lessons on agriculture, deserve mention.

In the preface of Lupta ratnoddhar (a collection of the works of Pyarichand, 1892) Bankim wrote about his contribution to the Bengali literature:

"Pyarichand is the first author who introduced a language used by all the Bengalis and intelligible to all the Bengalis... He is the first writer to prove that the real ingredients of literature are available in our land. One who intends to improve the Bengali society through literature should construct it with the stories of our land. In that sense, Alaler gharer dulal should be accepted as the first in our national literature."

MITRA, RADHARAMAN (Bengali; b. 1897) a writer and a political worker with a chequered career, was born at Shyambajar in Calcutta. He obtained his M.A. degree from the Calcutta University. While he was a teacher at Etawah in U.P. he got involved in the Non-co-operation Movement. He was arrested and jailed. After release, Mitra met Gandhiji and spent some years with him as an inmate of the Sabarmati Ashram in Ahmedabad. But a change in his political outlook weaned him away from the Gandhian way of life and he got involved in revolutionary politics. He was working as a primary teacher of the Calcutta Corporation for a living when in 1929 he and a large number of other revolutionaries were arrested in connection with the Meerut Conspiracy Case and tried. The trial caused a sensation throughout the country. He was soon released. Mitra became a member of the Communist Party of India in 1938.

MITRA, RAJENDRALAL-MITRA, RAJYESWAR

Mitra is an indefatigable researcher into the antiquities of the city of Calcutta. His Kalikata darpan (1980) in two parts bear eloquent testimony to his extensive knowledge about the history of Calcutta. He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for this valuable research work in 1981. His other works include Life of David Hare, Kalikata Vidyasagar, a monograph on the life of Lal Behary Dey and an assortment of essays on various topics.

MITRA, RAJENDRALAL (Bengali; b.1822, d.1891) was born in Calcutta. His father Janmejy Mitra was a good scholar of Sanskrit, Persian and Bengali. Rajendralal was educated at different schools in Calcutta and finally he was admitted to the Medical College in 1837. He left the institution in 1841. He was one of the most brilliant students of the Medical College. He studied law for a few months. Finally he applied himself to the study of languages. In 1846 Mitra joined the Asiatic Society as its Librarian and Assistant Secretary.

Rajendralal Mitra was a versatile scholar and one of the leading personalities of the day. The publication of the Bibidharthasamgraha, a monthly illustrated magazine, was his first remarkable venture. The articles published in this magazine were both simple and educative. It was published under the auspices of the Vernacular Literature Committee. Mitra was a good writer and critic of Bengali literature. Some important works of Michael Madhusudan Dutt were first published in the Bibidharthasamgraha. As its editor Mitra started a new literary movement in Bengal. In 1863 Rahasya-sandarbha was published and Mitra was its editor. He wrote various types of articles, monographs and books in English and Bengali. Many research articles of Mitra were published in the journals of the Asiatic Society of Bengal, Royal Asiatic Society of London, Anthropological Society of London etc. He did a great work towards introducing people to the antiquities of Orissa.

Rajendralal tried his best for the development of Bengali with the help of other elites of his time. He was elected Honorary member of the Royal Asiatic Society of London for his versatile scholarship in antiquities and linguistics. He was honoured by literary organizations abroad. He was elected President of the Asiatic Society of Bengal in 1885. In 1875 he received the L.L.D. degree from Calcutta University. He was also honoured with the titles Raibahadur, C.I.E. and Raja (1885). He was elected Fellow of Calcutta University. He joined politics through the British Indian Association and later he actively worked for the Indian National Congress. He was elected President of the Reception Committee of the Second Session of the Congress held in Calcutta in 1886.

Rajendralal wrote in Bengali, Sanskrit and English. Of his works in Bengali mention may be made of Prakrita bhugal (1854), Shilpik darshan (1860), Shivajir charitra (1860), Vyakaran prabesh (1862) and Patra kaumudi (1863). In Sanskrit he edited Chaitanyachandrodaya of Kavikarnapura (1854), Taittiriya brahmana, Pt. 1-3, (1859, 1862, 1890), Agnipurana Pt. 1-3, (1873, 1876, 1879), Lalitavistara (1877) and Brihaddevata (1889-1892) of Shaunaka. Of his works in English the most important are: A Descriptive Catalogue of Curiosities in the Museum of The Asiatic Society of Bengal (1849), Index to Vols. I to XXIV of the Journal of the Asiatic Society (1856); Notices of Sanskrit Manuscripts, First Series, Vols. I-IX (1870-1888); The Antiquities of Orissa, 2 Vols. (1875, 1880); Indo-Aryans, 2 Vols. (1881); Sanskrit Buddhist Literature of Nepal (1882) and 'The History of the Asiatic Society', Centenary Review of the Asiatic Society of Bengal from 1784 to 1883 (1885).

MITRA, RAJYESWAR (Bengali; b.1917), veteran musician, singer, indologist and translator was born in Agartala (Tripura). He inherited his love for different classical languages from his father, Amarnath Mitra, and his flair for literature and music from his mother, Pratibhasundari.

He worked for Desh, a Bengali weekly, as a music critic under the pseudonym Sarangadeb. He contributed numerous articles on music and Indology to a large number of periodicals including Vishva Bharati Quarterly, Rabindra Bharati Quarterly, Vishva-vina, Jijnasa, Bhaskar, Gandharva etc. Among his original works on music mention may be made of Banglar sangit, Uttar bhartiya sangit (1970), Banglar gitikar o Bangla ganer nana dik (1975), Atulprasad Sen (1984) and Arya Bharater sangitchinta (1984). He has edited the Bengali translations of different Sanskrit and Persian texts on early and mediaeval Indian music. Of these mention may be made of Sangit shiksha (1959), Mughal Bharater sangitchinta, Naradishiksha (1984) and Ragatarangini (1984).

He has recently completed a translation of Tuhfat-ul-Muabiddia, a treatise on monotheism written in Persian by Raja Ram Mohun Roy. His works on Vedic song and Vedic culture include Vedic atijhye samagan (1978), Vedaganer riti-prakriti (1984) and Vedaganer prakrita rup (1984). His work entitled Swargalok o deba-sabhyata (1987) is a treatise on Vedic culture and tradition.

His books on notations of early, mediaeval and modern Bengali songs have been published in 4 volumes of Sangit sanrakshan granthamala (1975-1982). His Nidhubadur gan (1981) is a compilation of notations of the songs of Ramnidhi Gupta, the pioneer of the 'tappa' style in Bengali. Chittaranjani (1983) is a compilation of the MITRA, UMESHCHANDRA (Bengali) was one of the earliest dramatists in modern Bengali literature. Bidhaha bibaha (1856) was his most well-known dramatic work. It deals with the problems of the marriage of young widows. This play has a tragic ending, the first of its kind in the realm of Bengali social-drama. Sulochana, a young widow, commits suicide after she discovers that she has become pregnant. Her lover, Manmatha, runs amok unable to bear this shock. The girl's father comes to realise how unwise it was to resist their marriage out of fear for a supposedly social scandal. In this drama Umeshchandra is quite explicit in his support for widow remarriage. The play was first staged at the Metropolitan Theatre on 23 April 1889 under the directions of K.C. Sen. Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar who led the movement for widow remarriage was himself present at the performance. Umeshchandra wrote another drama, this time on a mythological theme, Sitar banabas (1861).

P.S.

MITRA, USHADEVI (Hindi; b. 1901, d. 1966) was an eminent short-story writer who lived in Jabalpur, Madhya Pradesh. Her father was Harishchandra Datta. She was closely related to Ashwini Datta of Barisal (now in Bangladesh) and poet Satyendranath Datta who were a source of inspiration to her. She wrote a novel Sammohita in Bengali. In August 1933, her first Hindi short story, entitled 'Matrtva' was published by Premchand in Hans. Her second story, entitled 'Ontim uttar' was published by Mahavirprasad Dwivedi in Saraswati. Her short story collections include Adhi ke chanda (I, II, 1937), Mahavar (1941), Nim chameli (1941), Megh malhar (1946), Ragini (1946), Sandhya purvi (1948) and Raat ki rani (1951). Among her novels are Vachan ka mol (1937), Piya (1937), Jivan ki muskan, Pathchhari, Sohani Avaj, Nasta nir and Sammohita (Translation). Her most popular and noteworthy short story is 'Samjhauta'. The themes of most of her novels and stories centre round the life and conflicts in Indian families. She shows men as exploiters and women as exploited. She received the Saksariya Award for her Sandhya purvi and was felicitated by Madhya Pradesh Sahitya Sammelan in 1965 at Jabalpur. Much of her work is yet to be published. They include a Shankhand, a collection of short stories like 'Patal puri', 'Sindhur', 'Jogiya', 'Dikshita', (Bengali). These manuscripts are in the possession of her daughter, Bulbul Mitra of Jabalpur.

MITTI KI BARAT (Hindi) is the seventh collection of poems by Shivamangal Singh 'Suman' a famous lyricist of the post-war period. It was published in 1972 and given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1974. It contains most of the poems written by the poet during 1961-70.

The poems deal with different subjects, e.g., the glory of the earth, love, eulogies addressed to great men, the Chinese aggression and a visit to Mauritius. The most ambitious poem in the collection is Mitti ki barat, which celebrates the mingling of Kamala Nehru's ashes, long preserved at Anand Bhavan, with those of her husband, Jawaharlal Nehru, and immersed in the Ganges. The collective disposal of the last remains of the two Nehrus inspired the poet to write this poem on the noblest sentiments of love.

Suman emerged as a committed progressive writer, but in his later years, his commitment did not appear to be very rigid. As he himself wrote: "How could I escape commitment, which got me recruited as a writer? Crossing fifty, I learnt that some of the movements in literature originate merely for fashion like the drain-pipe trousers." He realized that a wayfarer had to adapt himself to the ever-changing patterns of life.

He is a skilled lyricist writing in both regular and irregular rhythms. The style is always informal and undecorative. Though common words from different quarters are used freely, a few of them are picked up from the poet's own dialect. Directness of speech and ease of expression are the basic qualities of these poems.

J.K.

MIYEN INAT JO KALAM (Sindhi) is the first definitive edition of the seventeenth-century Sindhi poets' work. Ably edited by N.A. Baloch, it carefully compares and collates the two manuscripts, transcribed in early nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, and aptly incorporates a considerable volume of the poet's verse, not covered by the above-stated two manuscripts, but current in the oral tradition. The first manuscript of 1820 comprises those 'bayts' 'wais' by Shah Inat, which one Sanvan Faqir remembered by heart after about 100 years of the Sufi poet's death. That his bayts and wais were passed on from one generation to another generation speaks of his popularity. This manuscript was prepared at the instance of Mian Ummid Ali Shah, Shah Inat's great grandson. The second manuscript of the first quarter of the present century collects almost all the bayts and wais of the first manuscript plus many more of them, some of which actually belonging to the Shah jo Risala. On close scrutiny of the two manuscripts, it is found that the first is more dependable. Tapping the second source of oral tradition, as many as 47 verses of Shah Inat were recorded "from every nook and corner of the country, particularly (from the living members of the poet's family). Baloch's Introduction to the book).

Thus, Miyen Shah Inat jo Kalam presents Shah Inat's 469 bayts and 42 wais under 22 'suruds', or modes of singing: Kalyan, Jaman, Khambhat, Srirag, Ramkali, Marui, Prabhat, Dhanasri, Jatisri, Purab, Lila, Asa, Kapaiti, D'ahar, Mumal Rano, Bilawal, Desi, Sorath, Sarang, Tod'i, Kamod and Karairo. While Shah Inat preferred to call them suruda, Shah Abdul Latif, his successor, referred to them as 'surs'; both of them like other saints and Sufi poets sang their poems, that too sometimes not strictly metrical, is suruds and surs, in a kind of music which was not of rigid classical character. Lately, we have appropriated to them a new name of 'Loka-raga', in contradistinction to the 'Raga' proper. The learned editor errs when he tries to equate suruds, or for that matter surs, with the ragas or raginis of the classical system.

Essentially folk music, Shah Inat's suruds were mainly concerned with the contents of his themes about Sindhi folk-tales, traders, weavers and the monsoon rains and also about selfless seekers of the Supreme Reality. In that he adumbrated Shah Abdul Latif in particular and other Sindhi saint and Sufi poets in general. The erudite introduction to the book recounts how Latif in his teens came into close contact with the octogenarian Shah Inat and remained in touch with him till the latter's death in 1712.

Once the young Latif, caught in the conflict of the phases of 'qabz' (detraction from Reality) and 'bast' (attraction to Reality), visited Shah Inat in Nasarpur, having covered on foot a distance of 15 miles from his village Kotri in the same district. It was one occasion among many. And the latter gave him solace, saying:

Pasi d'ungara d'ara, jima halana me in hini thien majazaniyun motiyun suni pandha pachara, tun pahiri paiji pirin lai haqiqata jo hara, sighe lahandui sara, aryani Inat chae.

(Viewing the tough mountain passes, don't slacken your pace, O Sasui. It is only the worldly lovers who are seared away by the tidings of difficult paths. First, you deck yourself with the garland of Reality. Then, says Inat, Punhu will take tender care of you.)

Shah Abdul Latif felt reassured and sang:
Pasi d'ungara d'aha, Jima halana mein hini vahin, langhe laka, Latif chae, puthia kechunyi kahi, puchhi puriji Sasui, balochani bahi, una varaite vara jo, asaru had'i ma lahi, jo ankhiniun od'o ahi, so pirin parahon ma chao.

(In the face of the rough mountains, don't slow down your pace; Says Latif, pursue Punhu's path vigorously through the passes. O Sasui, feel the fire of love for Punhu and fare forward. Though He be hard, let there be great hope in you. Why say the Beloved isfar away when He is nearer to you than your very eyes?)

In the beginning, as the above-given example shows, Shah Abdul Latif's poetry had an element of improvisation, and soon after it gave place to vindication of his individual genius.

For the first time Sindhi poetry, which was essentially religious, spiritual, mystical and didactic in tone and content, mirrored the life of the people and became associated with traditional Sindhi folk music. In Inat's poems we find references to the Yogi cult of India, Gorakhnath, Sidhnath, Virnath and their place of pilgrimage, Hinglaj. There is mention of local traders, weavers and various heroes and heroines of Sindhi folk-tales. In one 'surud' praise is showered on Sindhi saints, especially Shahbaz Qalandar of Sewhan and Shah Khairuddin of Sukkur and many other saints of the lands beyond Sindh. In surud 'sarang' on monsoon rains, there are references to many places inside and outside Sindh, and as to how rains do remember Sindhi after showers in distant lands like Khurasan, Madina, Rum, Delhi, Punjab, Kech, Multan and Jaisalmer.

In fact these poems throw ample light on the rich Sindhi folklore, spiritual heritage and literary traditions. Linguistically, too, this poetical work is of immense value and importance as it can guide us to a better understanding and appreciation of Shah jo Risalo.

MIYUL-MOCHANAGADHA

MIYUL (Kashmiri), the second novel written by Ghulam Nabi Gauhar in Kashmiri, was published in 1973. It tells the story of a delicate love-hate relationship between a boy and a girl, the love at first sight and hatred caused by misunderstanding immediately after their marriage, which, therefore, remains unconsummated for a long time. However, finally they are happily reunited.

The author has deftly treated a difficult theme, and his simple language and lucid style greatly help in sustaining interest in the narrative up to the end. His handling of emotionally surcharged situation and psychological nuances leave the reader fully convinced about his deep insight into human behaviour. He draws a vivid picture of an elite society, its false sense of pride and its foibles, which result in unnecessary mental sufferings of the sensitive and innocent members of that society.

The hero, Jalil, was the son of an IAS officer, Amin Sahib. The family lived in a rented house in the posh locality of Kothibagh, Srinagar, just opposite the bungalow of Khwaja Aziz Shah, an industrialist, popularly known as 'Shah Sahib'. Mahmuda and Jalil were college students. The wives of Amin Sahib and Shah Sahib were not on good neighbourly terms. Jalil's mother, Tota Lala, suffered from inferiority complex. On the other hand, Mahmuda's mother, Bega Appa, was conscious of her superiority of birth and high family status.

Mahmuda was basically an extrovert, while Jalil was an introvert. He was unilaterally but madly in love with Mahmuda. His love was reciprocated when he saved Mahmuda from facing an ugly situation in the city bus. During the course of time, they came closer to each other and the process of closeness was further facilitated by Mahmuda's three friends, Mina, Razia and Surjit Kaur.

The matrimonial alliance between the two was bitterly opposed by Mahmuda's mother. On realising that her marriage was being deliberately delayed, and that her mother would never agree to this proposal, Mahmuda tried to commit suicide, but her father's timely intervention saved her life. The situation came to such a pass that there was no other alternative left but to get Mahmuda married to Jalil. Immediately after the marriage, Mahmuda was enveloped by a misunderstanding against her husband, but many events and episodes brought them together again after a lapse of three years. Gauhar's novel, Miyul, is a complex work. Its characters pass through traumatic situations, are mentally disturbed, bear the agonising pain of separation, but at the end they are united again and live a life of conjugal bliss.

T.N.K.

MOCHANAGADHA (Marathi) is one of the important novels in modern Marathi literature. R.B. Gunjikar, the author of this novel and a well-known Marathi writer of his time, published this novel in parts in the Vividha jnana vistara, a very important literary journal of that time, from 1867 to 1871, and in 1871, it was published as a complete novel. Gunjikar called this novel a piece of fiction. During the period in which this novel was being published, novels of fantasy and romances were quite popular among the Marathi readers. However, Gunjikar was not interested merely in following what was popular in the form of novel. His ambition was to write a novel which would reveal the great tradition, culture and glorious history of India. He used to participate in various cultural activities of his time.

With the establishment of the Bombay University in 1857, new vistas opened. Oriental writers like Chiplunakar, Rajvade and Kirtane, influenced and shaped the sensibility of the young writers like Gunjikar. Besides, he also was impressed and influenced by historical romanticism of the English novelist, Scott. This resulted in Gunjikar's turning more to historical novel, full of patriotic spirit, than mere stories of fantasy and romances. He wrote Mochanagadha in the light of this new awareness, and though it was not an instant hit, it got its due share of popularity in course of time.

Gunjikar wrote Mochanagadha on the historical background of Shivaji's times. Though the novel is based on historical time, the facts, events and the characters, except the character of Shivaji, are absolutely imaginary, and therefore, it would be appropriate to accept Narahar Kurundkar's observation that it is not so much a historical tale treated romantically as an imaginative tale with a historical bias.

The novel begins with the escape of the hero, Ganapatarao, with his friend, who were imprisoned for two years. Ganapatarao and his wife, Gangubai, suffer a lot and face many dangers and disasters; and finally, it is shown that they spend the rest of their lives in peace and happiness, when Shivaji Maharaj conquers the fort 'Mochanagadha'. Shivaji's character appears very late in the novel, and most of the part the novel is devoted to describe the dangers, disasters and distress faced by Ganapatarao and Gangubai. Besides these main characters, we come across Satyajirao, a villainous character, Koyana, a lady assisting Satyajirao in his vicious deeds and then repenting, Daulatya, wallet to Ganapatarao. These characters are portrayed in a conventional way, but they are interesting. Creation of the right atmosphere is another powerful feature of the novel. The characters are simple, straight-forward and dedicated to their principles. Their opinions are orthodox and conventional and the behaviour is typical of their time. Gunjikar has often expressed his faith in the strength of a commoner through the characterisation of Daulatya.

Gunjikar's style is simple and dynamic, and he succeeds in dramatising the situations. Through the portrayal of the miscellaneous households and depiction of petty characters, costumes and manners, Gunjkar creates the illusion of historical reality in the novel.

There is a difference of opinion among the critics of the Marathi literature as to whether this novel can be called historical or not, since the material used in it is not authentic. Kurundkar thinks this novel is one of the usual romances rather than historical. But Priyolkar thinks that it is an ideal model of historical novel. However, all accept that it is a pioneering work and it has played a role of setting a new trend in the realm of novel in modern Marathi literature. Certain techniques of novel-writing which are still popular, can be traced to Mochanagadha, like the style of a historical novel which begins with the conventional description of nature before starting with the description of actual situation, the elaboration of even the simple events, the use of light and comic characters and situations to make the novel interesting. The trend of glorifying the past through literature, which is still prevalent in the contemporary historical novels, no doubt, started with Mochanagadha.

MODERNISM (Bengali). What is broadly known as modernism is generally applied to the works of the late 19th and 20th century Bengali Literature, which marked a departure from the canons of representation of the mediaeval age. During the first half of the 19th century, Bengali prose attained remarkable maturity. The first Bengali novel and the first Bengali drama were written in the fifties of this century. Modern Bengali poetry came later. The Renaissance in the 19th century Bengal contributed much to the modernistic view-point of the new writers. The prevalence of a new outlook on life and literature turned out to be a distinctive feature of modernism.

Madhusudan Dutt, a poet and dramatist of an outstanding calibre, first showed the beckon light of modernism. In writing heroic poems, epics and sonnets, Madhusudan virtually initiated the modern age in Bengali poetry. He also emancipated Bengali poems from the shackles of 'payar', the old fashioned rhyme and introduced blank verse. Some later poets imitated Madhusudan and wrote blank verse until lyric poems came into prominence. There was a kind of rationalism inherent in the circumstances and it was a by-product of the Bengal Renaissance. Madhusudan revolted against conventionality and recreated such traditional images as Radha or Ravana only to establish the claims of modern outlook.

Modernistic attitude was also manifest in prose writings in the second half of the 19th century. Pearychand Mitra, who wrote under the pen-name of Tekchand Thakur produced the first Bengali novel, Alaler gharer dulal (1858). It was Bankimchandra Chatterjee who not only widened the horizon of modern Bengali novel but also stimulated later novelists. In many ways, Bankimchandra laid the foundation of modern Bengali literature in prose form. Most of his novels, both in content and in form, bore brilliant marks of modern outlook, couched in rationalism. What was initiated by Raja Ram Mohan Roy in the first half of the 19th century was further chiselled by Bankimchandra Chatterjee and Rabindranath Tagore.

It was Rabindranath Tagore who infused new blood in Bengali as well as in Indian Literature. Tagore's fabulous variety of creation widened the range of literature. He initiated psychological novel delving deep into the human heart. He also created a new form of poetry known as prose poems. Although many signs of modernism are manifest in Tagore's writings, a group of young writers questioned his world-view and his mode of writing and did not consider it sufficiently modern. Yet Tagore with his ever-innovating power of creativity produced works which bore marks of modern idiom or style and even of outlook. Tagore, for instance, wrote novels like Chokher bali Chaturanga, and Ghare baire which show psychological insight, suggestive description and a new innovative technique of story-telling. Again in writing verse in prose form and plays wrapped in symbolic suggestiveness he displays trends of modernism seen in world literature.

During Tagore's life time, especially in the twenties, a group of young writers started a new movement in literature. Some of them revolted against the Tagorean attitude to truth and beauty. In dealing with the problems of life, some of them showed signs of originality and new approach. There was much confusion regarding the terms 'traditional' and 'progressive' as two opposing groups were there to support their own points of view. In this connection Tagore opined that it was the creation of a new form that mattered irrespective of the varieties of content. Thus modernism, as Tagore explained the term, essentially meant a bend in the stream of literature and the concept is both chronological and idiational. In this sense, an overall change in mood and temperament, in style of writing and in the manner of outlook was evident in the literature of the nineteenth century Bengal. What the post-Tagorean writers contributed to it was a new spirit.

The hall-marks of the post-Tagorean Bengali Literature are what may be called qualitative changes. The process started almost with the advent of the 'Kollolians' in the thirties. The cream of young writers of this age started a new movement. As the writers brooded on human predicament they searched for a new mode of expression. The language changed according to the change in popular usages of images and words. The poems of Jibanananda Das, Premendra Mitra, Buddhadev Bose, Sudhindranath Dutta, Bishnu De, Amiya Chakravarti and Samar Sen amongst the poets of the thirties, bear testimony to this fact. The poets of the later decades searched for new idioms of poetic expression. Among the poets of various moods and style, Sukanta Bhattacharya,

MODERNISM-DOGRI

Bimal Ghosh, Subhas Mukherjee, Dinesh Das, Manindra Ray etc. on the one hand and Nirendranath Chakravarti, Alokranjan Dasgupta, Sunil Ganguli, Sakti Chatterjee, Shamkha Ghosh on the other may be remembered in this context. Of course, there are a number of other powerful poets whose contribution is also worth mentioning. Broadly speaking, some of these poets tend to become either ideologically committed or arrogant in tone. Some others respond to the inner call of their poetic urge and examine human condition in their own ways. There are diverse currents and cross-currents of poetic activities in this period and the whole spectrum of modern Bengali poetry is permeated with this sporadic creativity.

Like the poets a galaxy of writers of novels and short stories widened the horizon of the post-Tagorean Bengali literature. The writers of the thirties or of the later decades were not only conscious of their social milieu but also responsible enough to forge ahead with the task of new creativity mainly in terms of intellectual probing. The task was not easy because the writers had to find some other ways out where the magic spell of Tagore as well as Saratchandra Chatterjee would not be felt at all. So the new writings of the period were but skilful evocation of social crisis and reality treated with artistic sensibility. Some writers like Jagadish Gupta, Nareshchandra Sengupta and many of the Kollolians were trying to dig out new ways of depicting paranoiac obsessions of the individual. While hoping for a prompt remedy for the social crisis of the post-war society, the later writers projected contemporary social reality in diverse manners. The works of Tarashankar Banerjee, Bibhutibhusan Banerjee and Manik Banerjee stand distinctively apart from each other. Their major concentration was on both men and nature. The saga of struggle in the middle and lower strata of society is set against a mixed urban rural background. Aspects of urbanism, the perspective of psychological aberration or signs of moral degeneration—all these were recurrent features of the later novels. Some prominent writers like Banphul, Satinath Bhaduri, Dhurjatiprasad Mukherjee, Jyotirindra Nandy, Samaresh Basu and many others still creative today such as Annandashankar Ray, Bimal Mitra, Bimal Kar, Amiyabhusan Majumdar, Sunil Ganguli and Shirshendu Mukherjee have kept the process alive.

The upward journey of Bengali play was not up to the mark in post-Tagorean period. There were old-fashioned plays written mostly against historical or puranic background till Tagore infused a new quality by his many-dimensional plays rich in suggestive meaning. Although a new wave of dramatic movement swayed Bengali literature in the forties, Bengali drama suffered a set-back. There was no dearth of experiments on the Bengali stage. They are still going on in search of new possibilities. There are only a few playwrights such as Utpal Dutta, Badal Sirkar and Mohit Chatterjee who have tried to keep Bengali drama apace with the modern line of progress.

Modern Bengali literature appears to be a surging confluence of thoughts, ideas and artistic creativity. Its modernism is a part and parcel of the modern literary movement of the country.

MODERNISM (Dogri) Bulk of the Dogri literature is conventional, both in subject and in treatment. Dogri poetry has not yet shunned idealism, romanticism, love and praise of Dograland, and didactic and reformative tendencies. Dogri fiction and drama are no different and offer a mixed bag. Kehari Singh Mdhukar among the major poets, and Madan Mohan Sharma among the major fiction writers, were the first to strike a non-conventional and modernistic note in their respective works, so far as their choice of subjects and the treatment are concerned, in the sixties and early seventies of this century.

The poet Madhukar's modernism was, however, confined to the search for the new images, a few streaks of Dadaism and surrealism, and a cynical, disturbing stance in some poems of Dola kun thappeya (1963). It was Charan Singh (1941-1969) who set a new trend of modernistic poetry in Dogri. With an analytical, scientific approach to the problem of life, he questioned the existing social values, searched for some moorings in the ceaseless flux of life and pointed to the crisis of social norms, and all this tested on his personal experiences, in concrete images. He was also the one who used free verse as a powerful medium of poetic expression. In a poem 'Baahan' (The unruly crowd), he sees life as a marketplace and compares the human crowd with the crowds of words, "echoing like a meaningless noise." Life is an old drum tied round one's neck which one has to beat every moment. His modernism is reflected even in his imagery drawn from the contemporary situations as in the poem 'Akhbar' (Newspaper). Two other significant Dogri poets of modernistic sensibility are O.P. Sharma 'Sarathi' and Shiv Ram 'Deep'. Ghazals of the former in his collection Partaan (layers) and some poems and ghazals of the latter in Gamalen de cactus (Potted cactus) are remarkable for their expression of the anguish of modern man. After them have come a few young poets like Virendra Kesar with his ghazals in Lava. These poets exhibit modern sensibility and appear influenced by Sarathi. There are also some others who can be called fake modernists, whose modernism is limited to titles of their poems, and their sensibility is conventional.

Modernism in fiction appears with Madan Mohan Sharma's short stories in Dudh, lahu te zahar (Milk, blood and poison, 1971). Dogri short stories and novels published earlier were broadly concerned with the petty domestic issues, problems of the rural poor and the middle class urban families, rural-urban divide and uplift of society and so on. They were in the tradition of Munshi Premchand in Hindi and Urdu, combining realism with idealism and social reform. But then elder short story writers like Madan Mohan Sharma and Ved Rahi and newcomers to the field like O.P. Sharma 'Sarathi', Om Goswami, Chhatrapal and Bandhu Sharma went in for unconventional subjects and experimented with new techniques of storytelling. In their fiction, a discerning reader can trace out well-guarded statements about the decay of the old moral and religious order and the anguish of the modern man leading a purposeless life. They see human beings caught in the cobweb of inhuman environment and they traverse the dark alleys of the human action and behaviour. Short stories in Madan Mohan Sharma's Dudh, lahu te zahar and Nayak (Hero), Ved Rahi's Aale (Calls), Sarathi's Sukka barud (Dry gunpowder) and Lok gai lok (People galore), Goswami's Nhere da samundar (The ocean of darkness) and Sonne di chidi (The bird of gold), Chhatrapal's Tapu da adami (The man-an island), Bandhu Sharma's Parshame (Shadows) and Keengare (Peaks) display modern sensibility. These short story writers have been followed by others like Chaman Arora, Lalit Magotra and Manoj who have written some fine short stories in the new tradition.

In the field of novel, O.P. Sharma Sarathi can be called the harbinger of modernism. Four of his five novels starting with Nanga rukh (Churning of the city) break a new ground in Dogri novel both in the choice of subject, and in matter and technique. There are no conventional situations and characters, plot or narrative. There is symbolism, Kafkaesque situations and atmosphere, deep probing into the working of society and metaphysical questions. And there is a new style and new technique of expression.

In Dogri drama, two names stand out, viz. Madan Mohan Sharma and Mohan Singh. Madan Mohan Sharma's two plays Janaur (The beast) and Ik parchhama badali da (A shadow of a cloud) and Mohan Singh's two plays Kala suraj (The dark sun) and Panja Kalyani (The five reformers) show innovativeness of approach, keen observation of human behaviour and reaction, and acute social awareness. The theme of Janaur is truly unconventional, particularly for orthodox Dogra society; it tackles a challenge thrown to all the social forces by a middle-aged cripple who has developed an incestuous feeling for a young girl brought up by him. The symbolism, however, is deeper and wider than the situation dramatised in the play and points to the animal instincts harboured in the heart of a man. Panja kalyani of Mohan Singh, a street play, a 'Nukkad'-theatre, is close to the plays of the absurd technique-wise. Its characters, the five reformers, remind one of the two tramps of Waiting for Godot. Through their antics, the playwright surveys the progress of Indian society and throws light on different aspects of our present social life and also shows us our truth. These players, regale and pinch the readers and viewers and jolt them into thinking and seeking answers to the basic questions.

A good piece of performing art, it is also a good piece of reading.

Ma.M.S.

MODERNISM (Gujarati). In Gujarati literature, after Narmad's literary experiment, modern era, the product of the British education and English literature, went on for about a hundred years with its reformatory and Gandhian forces at different stages. It was during the sixties, Suresh Joshi set modernism forth in various ways. The continental models, instead of English ones, became dominant. Violations of traditions, formal innovations and excessive experimentations took hold of the whole affair. Associative logic took place of linear logicity and square reasoning. In short, he strove to make a shift from ideational construction to verbal construction. Imagerization and fantasization were the two axes of his writings. He reduced his short stories and novellas to a minimal plot and his essays and poems to the imaginal strips. The main hunt was for pure literature.

In the field of poetry, the ideals of the Symbolist poets were active then. The experience was not expressed in the language but the language was sought for the new experience. New appetite for pure accidents and randomness looked for the various experimentations. Gulam Mohammad Sheikh gave spatial dimension to the language; Sitanshu Mehta engaged himself in surreal patternings; Labhashankar Thakar relied much on rhymes and recklessness. Even the most traditional song and ghazal went though a radical change at the hands of poets such as Adil Mansuri, Rajendra Shukla, Anil Joshi, Ramesh Parékhi.

In fiction, Madhu Rai, Kishor Jadav, Radheshyam Sharma and others tried to focus sharply not on content but on construction. Linear narration, logical and sequential system, and unilateral reality were violently negated. There was much demand for psychic time, fragmental collage, allusive patternings and symbolic recurrence.

The same was the case with the drama. Besides eliminating content and sequential logic it aimed at absurdity and incongruity. Labhshankar Thakar insisted on the visual and aural impact; Adil Mansuri made drama a voyage through imagination; Chinu Modi, in his own way, experimented in the verse-form; Mahesh Dave dramatized the inner world and Shrikant Shah undertook a challenge to disburden reality through nonreality.

It was obvious that criticism turned to formal and structural analysis. Biographical and historical fallacies were condemned. The thematic approach was suspended. The reader was declared the co-creator. At last, the new linguistic critical model emerged. Chandrakant Topiwala, Suman Shah, Shirish Panchal contributed in this direction.

MODERNISM—HINDI—KANNADA

MODERNISM (Hindi). As a concept, the word modernism has three main denotations. The first meaning pertains to the relativity of contemporaneity and signifies the work of a thinker or creative artist who holds new values and gives new direction to contemporary life by breaking off from blind beliefs and traditions of yester years. In this sense Kabir could be considered 'modern' in the context of the traditions of his time that he challenged. Or, if we take an example from the remote past, Valmiki set forth the trend of modernism against inherited traditions when he composed his very first 'shloka'. Thus we can say that every age has its own modern thinker or seer and his modernism is related to the spirit of his time.

The second denotation of the term 'modernism' is related to the advent of modern science. The primary tenet of science is the premise that the universe is created not by any supernatural power but has emerged out of the struggle inherent in Nature. The impact of this belief on the thought of subsequent times has been very profound. Nietzsche, for instance, proclaimed, 'God is dead'. The faith which man reposed in God and in the religions created by him was shaken and a state of crisis or upheaval appeared in the domain of values.

A new pattern of life-style was brought about by the growth of the press and later industrialization. The machines, along with the spread of literacy, revolutionized the world-view of mankind. This made literature deal with a wider social life. It is because of this that Bharatendu Harishchandra is considered the propagator of modernism in Hindi literature, for he reflected in his writings the contemporary social and cultural milieu and the new outlook. Before him the poetry of 'Ritikal' was generally feudal in its character but in his work one can discern the impact of the new upsurge in social life. It is also remarkable that in the early development of modernism in Hindi literature, the spirit of the Renaissance was also at work. As time advanced the national spirit too embraced the reformist and the revivalist movements along with that of the Renaissance. In due course the national spirit grew into the larger movement for national independence. In modern Hindi literature all these trends have simultaneous existence.

It is to be noted that in Hindi literature, spanning from Bharatendu to Chhayavad, the tradition of modernism does not stand in opposition to the vital values of Indian traditions. This literature depicts the reality of life as well as it lays down ideals for it. Such a form of modernity is apparent in the poets of the Dwivedi Age and Chhayavad Age, and in the fiction of the Premchand Age.

Another form of modernism may be seen in post-Chhayavad poetry and in post-Premchand fiction. The influences of Gandhi, Darwin, Marx, Freud, Sartre, etc., may be found in the writings of this era. A new modernistic trend began to evolve under the influence of psychoanalysis and existentialism. The insignificance of human existence, the significance of the moment, alienation, are some of the characteristics of this trend. But such a trend is confined only to a section of modern poetic stream. Most of the writings in poetry and fiction choose broad and healthy segments of society wherein an attempt is made to show idealism, even while depicting a stern social reality. This modernism is not totally cut off from old traditions, but it reinterprets them. Perception of beauty in life as well as faith in the future of man are the main characteristics of this modernism.

T.N.B.

MODERNISM (Kannada) was a protest against the excesses of the Navodaya age like mysticism and emotionalism. The modernists sought to fuse thought and feeling and explore experience objectively. They were more introspective and earthly in outlook and more complex and subtle in expression.

The early modernist poetry was heavily reminiscent of Eliot and other English modernist poets both in tone and in technique. The poems puzzled the readers. This led the critics to examine the parallels between the ethos of the west and that of India which had produced this kind of poetry. Many people think that modernism came only as a blind imitation, but others have justified it as the natural product of the disenchantment of post-independence India. Some have seen it as a break from the tradition, but some as the continuation and concentration of elements in earlier literature.

It was V. K. Gokak who inaugurated the modernist (Navya) movement in Kannada literature in his address delivered at the Kannada Literary Conference in Bombay in 1950. He spoke about the need for change in the form and content of poetry and illustrated his point through examples. But it was M. Gopala Krishna Adiga who really set the trend of modern poetry and became a model. Ever since the publication of his poems like 'Himagiriya kandara' (1952), he remained a powerful influence on the entire movement. Adiga's poetry deals with big issues of life like man's relation to the earth, the relation of the present with the past and search for meaning in life, but throughout his poetry there runs the tension between the divine and the human. His early poetry has greater concentration of expression and tightness of structure. Of late, he has become relaxed without losing his intensity.

A large number of younger poets was immediately drawn to the movement. B.C. Ramachandra Sharma, K.S. Narasimha Swamy, A.K. Ramanujan, Gangadhar Chittal, Lankesh, Chandra Shekhar Kambar, Chandrashekhar Patil, K.S. Nissar Ahmed, H.M. Channaiah, Sumatindra Nadig, K.V. Tirumalesh, Aravind Nadkarni, H.S. Venkateshmurthy, B.R. Lakshmanrao among others widened the scope of modernist poetry and brought a great variety of interests, style and tone. The earlier tenseness gave way to ease. It could now accommodate metrical patterns, satire and playfulness also. Some poets like Channaveera Kanavi and G.S. Shivarudrappa tried to synthesise the best in the Navodaya and the modernist trends.

Apart from poetry, another form in which modernism found its full expression is fiction. The major western influences here were existentialism in world-view and stream of consciousness and fantasy in technique. Camus, Kafka and D.H. Lawrence served as models. In Kannada fiction, problems like alienation, the conflict between the old and the new, the tension between the mind and the heart, the difficulty of communication, strained human relationships etc. appeared in their various manifestations. Language and form were subjected to experimentation, and they acquired greater sensitivity and sophistication. Social awareness was subordinated to a preoccupation with the self. The image of the excessively sensitive hero, not sure of himself and always groping in the dark for the meaning of life, was established. The realism of the Navodaya age disappeared. The movement did not produce many novels, but some of them were of high standard. U.R. Anantamurthy (Samskara), Yashwant Chittal (Shikari), Shantinath Desai (Mukti), Giri (Gati, sthiti), Lankesh (Biruku) A.K. Ramanujan (Mattobhana atmacharitre) and Kamarupi (Kundure motte) were the important novelists. The short story, on the other hand, was much richer in several respects. Most of the novelists mentioned above were also accomplished short-story writers. Anantamurthy, among them, was a major figure and was highly influential. K. Sadashiva, Ramachandra Sharma, Shanthinath Desai, G.S. Sadashiva, Raghavendra Khasnis, T.G. Raghava, Poornachandra Tejaswi and Giraddi Govindaraj also enriched the form by exploring human relationships with an intense feeling for life. They often employed poetic methods. The short story became complex and acquired a new dimension. However, in the later phase, fiction in general began to acquire greater social consciousness as is evident in the writings of Ananthamurthy and Chittal.

In drama, two major influences were apparent the 'absurd' and the 'angry'. Girish Karnad explored man's existential absurdity in his plays like Tughlak. The absurd drama proper had a short life, but produced some interesting plays. Lankesh, Kambar Patil, N. Ratna, Chaduranga, Chandrakant Kusnoor and Arya wrote some plays which are still popular on the stage. Lankesh wrote some plays in angry rhetoric also, questioning the established middle-class morals. Besides Tughlak, which is translated into almost all the Indian languages, the other successful plays were Sankranti (Lankesh), Hayavadana (Karnad) and Appa (Patil). In the later phase of Shriranga, we have several plays which belong to the modernist movement, if not to the absurd. His Kelu Janamejaya and Kattale-belaku are remarkable for their technical innovation and self-consciousness.

The Movement scored another major success in criticism. In the beginning it followed the approach of New Criticism and the influence of Eliot and Leavis was obvious. It gave importance to the organic form of the work and analysed the complex structure of the experience as embodied in language. Brilliant explications of old and new works were produced. Revaluation of earlier writings, including the classics, went hand in hand. But very soon it developed wider social and cultural concerns also. Kirtinath Kurtkoti, though not a modernist, did the pioneering work. Anantamurthy and M.G. Krishnamurthy raised important social and cultural issues. And in the hands of critics like G.S. Amur, Shanthinath Desai, G.H. Nayak and Giraddi Govindaraj, the tradition of serious criticism was firmly established. Many younger critics like D.R. Nagaraja, K. V. Narayan, H.S. Raghavendrarao and T.P. Ashok brought in fresh outlook.

On the whole, the modernist movement in Kannada may be said to have created its own form and refashioned language to express its new sensibility. The language, especially, increased its expressive power many-fold. But some times modernist writers tended to be elitist and obscure, thereby alienating the common reader. They also some times created the impression of blindly imitating western literary trends. Recently a few reactions seem to have set in. However, modernism as a literary concept has become deep rooted in Kannada.

Gi.G.

MODERNISM (Konkani). In Konkani literature, the manifestation of modernism is discernible in the works brought out only after 1946. Modernity crept into Konkani literature under the impact of the epoch-making event of the freedom struggle. The liberation movement electrified the atmosphere of the region and the writer's contacts with the reality of life became more alive. The features of strong social awareness and the sense of complexity are evident in the sphere of Konkani poetry. No doubt the process has been slow. This process of modernism is clearly evident in the poetic works of B.B. Borkar, R.V. Pandit and M.L. Sardesai.

B.B. Borkar's (1910-1984) Painjanam (1960) is a peculiar example which displays the sense of complexity and the traditional pattern and form of poetry. M.L. Sardesai's (b. 1925) Goem tujea maga khatir (1961) brings a fresh content and a new direction to Konkani poetry. He has endowed Konkani literature with the picturesqueness of imagery and freshness of sentiments. Sardesai's Zaiat zage (1964) contains poems of socialistic character, expressing discontent at the existence of remnants of the slavery and ignorance in spite of the advent of freedom.

R.V. Pandit's (1917) five collections of poems struck entirely a new note in 1963 compiled in Ailem toshem gaillem (I sang as I felt), Mhajem utar Gavdyachem (My words are the words of Gauda), Urtolem tem rup phartolem (What will remain will take a new form), Dhartarechem kavan (The song of the earth) and Chandraval (Oh, Moon, Oh Moon.).

MODERNISM-KONKANI

The verse of these three poets has created a new rhythm and also a new vocabulary. The strong sense of social awareness creeps into their poetry, setting aside erstwhile predominant aesthetic values, yet the musical quality remains.

It appears that the modern poet has given a new definition to poetry in as much as on one hand it depicts the reflection of the society and on the other it has turned inwards. This is especially true of Pandurang Bhangī (b. 1923) whose collection Distavo (The vision, 1977) displays the trait of the metaphysical pre-occupation, with images often erudite and personal. The poems bring out all the suppressed and hidden desires of a tormented soul.

Sardesai's Zaio-zuio (1947) introduces a new form of epigrammatic verses into Konkani poetry. The title Zaio-zuio suggests a string of poetic flower-like thoughts. The collection has widened the range of subjects of Konkani poetry. The poet has brought under the compass of poetic vision the varied subjects like the transcendental power of the poet, power of words, poetry and different facets of love. The satirical bent of the poet is apparent in his later collection of poetry, Pissolim (Butterfly, 1978).

Prakash Padgaonkar (b. 1948), who made his debut in 1976 with the collection of poems Uzvaddachim pavalam (Steps of light), writes fully in a modernistic vein. These poems are the reflections of the infinity of creation and the littleness of man in it. Padgaonkar strikes a note of originality and fascinating imagery. In his poem 'Vascayan' (1977), the poet gives a heart-rending description of the unwieldy city of Vasco. He has enriched the modern Konkani poetry with his collection entitled Hanv monis Ashvatthama (I am that man Ashvatthama) which won him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1986. It portrays the predicaments of modern man who is seeking elusive relief for his unmitigated plight. Written in a pessimistic vein, varied metaphors provide food for thought.

Thus, it appears that after 1970's, modernity has been taking a concrete shape in Konkani poetry. Experimental poetry, which took the shape of 'new poetry' later, has abandoned all traditional metres. Now the poets do not adhere to any discipline of rhythms. The poet, P.N. Nayak (b. 1952), who believes in such a credo, came out with a collection of his poems, Ga Ami Rakhane (1976). He shows empathy for the downtrodden who have been exploited. His poetry abounds in metaphors and suggestivity. It is free-verse marked by the simplicity of direct expression. The poet has created both an idiom and a form suitable for the reflection and expression of contemporary life. The sense of newness expressed in his poetry comes from a feeling that it is written by one whose vision and music are free from glints and echoes of the works of other poets. Moreover, there is an absence of conscious literary effort in the choice of material.

The same sense of revolt is seen in the poems of Nagesh Karmali (b. 1933) who has brought new vigour in Konkani poetry. His is a poetry of revolt and social relevance. In his Zorgot (1979) and Sanvar (1979), he struggles for social order and social revolt. Complexity of theme and powerful diction have made him a modern poet of great significance.

R.B. Velluskar's (b. 1947) new experiments in verse have attracted attention of the critics and readers. His Morpankham (Peacock feathers, 1979) is a significant contribution to modern poetry in which the poet presents pictures of rural life and nature. The second collection, Matee (1983), has certainly raised the standard of Konkani poetry. There are 51 poems on a single theme. The poet has narrated the woes of the labourers and the suppressed who are closely linked with the soil. The collection has proved that free verse can be impressive and pleasing. His recent collection Mormaraya (1987) displays metaphysical strain and complex symbolism. The poet has turned inward to probe the inner recesses of the mind. Like his previous two collections, it is a valuable addition to modern Konkani poetry.

Madhav Borkar (b. 1954) writes in the manner of Pandurang Bhangī. In his Uzvaddacho pran (The soul of the light, 1978), he uses bold comic symbols. Though the poet has no patent philosophical purpose, his poems are filled with metaphysical conceits. Bhangī's second collection Odrustanche kalle (Flowers of fate, 1982) has earned him the title of a front-rank modern poet. It is poetry of solitude. For him poetry is not action, but introspection. What is important in his poetry is both a symbol and a mood.

There have been a host of poets writing on modern themes of strong social awareness. Significant among them are Olivinho Gomes, Tomazinho Cardozo and U.N. Bhembre. Their works are in free verse. Influence of modern sensibility is evident from the use of terse images and evocative words in their poetry.

Konkani writers turned to the novel only after 1970's. Only a few of them write in a modernistic vein. Prominent among them is P.N. Nayak (b. 1952). His outstanding work is Achcheva (Turmoil, 1977). Though a regional novel, it concentrates on bringing into focus the way of life in a limited area without sacrificing the fictional appeal. The novel is based on the distinct change in the life of Goan peasantry during the last 25 years, after the exploration of iron and manganese mines. The turmoil in the life of these village folks depicted in this novel is universal in character. In his second novel Bambar (1977), Nayak aims at depicting the eccentricities, vulgarity and primary urges of the unlettered in a naturalistic manner. His novels are schematic, constructed to allow maximum exploitation of themes and concepts.

MODERNISM-KONKANI

Pankhlo (1977) written by Tukaram Sheth attracted many readers. Though written in the traditional form, it deals with social and psychological issues. The novel sets a trend of reconciling the claims of individual consciousness and social awareness.

Karmelin (1982), the Sahitya Akademi award (1983) winning novel by Mauzo Damodar (b. 1944), describes the fate of Goans outside the country. It has an unmistakable ring of authenticity. It is realistic portrayal of social and psychological problems. The quality of heightened realism invites analysis of content rather than of form or styles. There are no radical experiments in Konkani novel as we notice in poetry.

Chandrakant Keni (b. 1934) with the collection of short stories Dhortari azun jietali (1964) laid the foundation of modern Konkani short story. He portrays not only the characters of Goan life but the universal traits of human character. In his second collection Ashad panvali (1973), his craftsmanship is evident. However, fully in a modernistic vein is his latest collection Vhonkolpavani which has been given the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1988. In this collection, Keni probes the hidden realities of life and ponders over the human condition.

Another writer of 70's is Shila Naik. Her collection Oli sanj (The moist evening 1973) has also been written in a realistic vein. The stories reveal her empathy for fellowmen. In some stories she betrays her ability of writing in the impressionistic vein. She has widened the range of subjects of the short story in Konkani. For craftsmanship and virtuosity Mauzo Damodar may be singled out. His collections of short stories Ganthan (1972) and Jagranam (1975) display an unadorned style and a deep interest in psychological probings.

One of the women writers of significance in Konkani literature is Meena Kokodkar (b. 1944). Her collection of short stories Dongar chauvalla (The Hill is green with new foliage, 1976) is known for sincerity. Some of the stories are ironic in tone. They demonstrate stylistic variety equalled by few modern Konkani writers. P.N. Nayak has enriched the Konkani short story too. His two collections Pishantar and Muthai (1977) are realistic in tone. There is a fundamental seriousness in his short stories. The stories in Kavaso (1978) by Jaymala Danayat (b. 1947) deal with complexity of modern life, especially the social problems being at the centre of her stories. However her stories lack artistic appeal.

The credit of adding a new dimension to the Konkani short story goes to A.N. Mhambro (b. 1938) His satirical pictures and ironical tone have made his stories memorable. His humorous and absurd stories in the collection Panaji atam mhatari zalea won the critical acclaim. It also won him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1987. Uttam kannia zhelo (1980) by Francis Saldanha (b. 1939), depicts common folk-life, whereas N. Shivdas (b. 1949) deals with social problems in Goan society in Galsari (1981). He displays a keen insight into human nature.

Both the collections are marked by precision of words and vigour of style.

Human life is the basis of Man oddata voddana (And the mind hesitates, 1984) by Olivinho Gomes (b. 1943). Though many stories in this collection are in the traditional form, at least one story 'Makadapan' shows a slight variation in technique. The emotional content is present in his stories as implicitly as the germ in a grain of wheat.

There have been many short story writers who have enriched the short story in Konkani. Some representative stories are collected in the Sahitya Akademi publication Konkani katha sangraha (1985) edited by Chandrakant Keni. Most of the stories in this collection deal with complexity of life. Some of the significant writers in this collection are Arun Singbal and Subhash Bhohe.

Prabhakar Tendulkar's (b. 1934) Katha ghons (1986) and Gajanan Jog's (b. 1952) Rudra (1986) have contributed to modern prose in Konkani. Their prose is marked by lucidity and is full of charm and gusto.

It appears that the short story in Konkani is the most popular form of literature. In fact, the short story has become "the news bulletin of our lives". However, the Konkani short story strongly rooted in identifiable locations and social gatherings has not reached a broader psychological or a more articulate expression of feeling.

The Konkani idiom did not attract the stage talent till the 70's. However, Christians have developed their theatre craft in Konkani independently, partly in imitation of the Western music and English movies. There are quite a few dramatists who have been contributing to modern drama. But there are only two major dramatists, P.N. Nayak and N. Shivdas.

Nayak's contribution to Konkani drama lies precisely in his belief that the chief function of the dramatist is the confrontation of reality. With his heart-rending, blood-curdling story of incest and murder in Raktakhev (Bloodshed, 1978) and Rakhon (Protection 1980), he has established an existential drama. He is committed to examine the social or psychological problems of man rather than the metaphysical ones. Nayak, with his plays and collected one-act plays compiled in Chourang (1982), has brought renewed vigour in a theatre which a decade ago was fading into insignificance. N. Shivdas, in his Pisantt (The mad woman, 1979), has presented a theme of neurosis. His psychological probings show his keen perception of human nature. Ramkrishna Zuwalkar, Ashok Kamat and Dilip Borkar are some of the modern dramatists. Though they have a straight-forward story based on the traditional principles of drama, in their themes they appear to be modern. It is certain that Konkani drama is undoubtedly showing signs of a growing desire and ability to go further.

The Konkani writers today work in a realistic mode for the most part, and are not exceptionally innovative in form or style.

MODERNISM-MAITHILI-MALAYALAM

MODERNISM (Maithili) in Mithila and consequently in Maithili literature came late and developed sluggishly. The infiltration of western literature has been rather slow in Mithila. It was as late as the early 20th century when Harimohan Jha and Vaidyanath Mishra Yatri (b.1911) first introduced modernism in Maithili literature, the former by wit and humour and the latter by satirical and serious writings. They were followed by a host of writers who had a new vision and a new vigour, fostered by the rapidly changing social, economic and political life. They have influenced even their older contemporaries to some extent. Rajkamal tops the list among the modernists. With younger writers, modernism has become a passion. It is yet strange to note that modernism in Maithili goes side by side with traditionalism. Even presentday Maithili writers are producing Mahakavyas on the thousand-year old style of Magha and Sriharsha, such as Ekavaiparinaya by Kavishekhar Badarinath Jha, Krishnacharita by Tantranath Jha, Radhaviraha by Madhup. Even lyrical compositions in the modern form suffer from the ornamentation in language, and are locked up in the poetic conventions of the past. Modernism has not yet succeeded in replacing traditionalism.

MODERNISM (Malayalam). The forties of the 20th century saw the beginnings of modernism in Malayalam. This was the time when the movement of Progressive Literature also started. While this latter trend involved a concentration on the common man and a social and economic revolution, modernism was concerned with man and society in general. It was also concerned with new ways of expression.

C.J. Thomas wrote his plays in the modernist mould in the beginnings of the forties. His play Ayiratti orunutti irupattetil kram irupattiyezhu (Crime 27 in 1128) was a play using the Brechtian technique of epic theatre. We also find in it a character who was more a witness than a participator. Shabdangal (Voices, 1948) by Vaikkom Muhammed Basheer is the earliest Malayalam novel that is modern in outlook. It narrates the story of a disillusioned ex-soldier who has contracted venereal disease and suffers from the modern loneliness of spirit. Since Shabdangal a few more novels have appeared with the modernist imprint. Alkuttam (The crowd, 1970) by Anand, Khasakkinte itihassam (The epic of Khasak, 1969) by O.V. Vijayan are among the most talked about of the modernist novels. M. Mukundan, Kakkanadan and a few others have also incorporated modern approaches to life in their novels and short stories.

The strongest manifestation of modernism was evident in poetry. Largely modern poetry has come to mean that on which the influence of T.S. Eliot, Ezra Pound and others of their school has come to be felt. Broadly speaking the modern poet is characterised by a dissatisfaction with the world, society and the moral decline that one sees around. This leads to irony. In expression the modern poet indulges in private imagery, broken diction and a verbal restraint almost amounting to non-communication. Such features have led to the criticism that modern poetry is obscure. It is also the claim of the modernist critic that the communication which the modern poem gives is not solely dependent on the expressive part of expression; it is also dependent on what is invoked by the symbols, pauses and so on. The modernist poet also uses expressions that are intended to shock the reader into awareness. And in this awareness some, at least among the moderns, see the sanity of doubt, the insanity of ideologies, the ever-deepening decline, the pervading sense of gloom and the sense of death as a solution. In Mrityupuja (The worship of death, 1967), K. Ayyappa Panikkar writes: "Glory to you, Death. Come, Death with your simple love". His Kurukshetra (1951) is a powerful indictment of society using the pricks of irony.

While poets in the modernist school exhibit certain common characteristics there are shifts in their vision and the language. N.N. Kakkad invokes a sense of nostalgia with his symbols taken from folk and religious lore. Among his works are: Shalabhagitam (The song of the butterfly, 1957), and 1963 published in 1970.

Madhavan Ayyappattu also uses symbols from the past to convey a contemporary condition of searching, of nostalgia and fulfilment. His collection Jivacharithrakurippukal (Biographical notes, 1969) is an example. In Vishnu Narayanan Nambutiri the impact of the present with India's past creates only a sense of optimism. His Svatantryatteppatti oru gitam (A song about freedom, 1968) and Pranayagitangal (Love songs, 1970) convey this optimistic spirit.

Sugata Kumari is a modern poet with a difference. Her poems are imbued not with cosmic griefs of the normal modernist poet but with a sense of an anxious search for the truth and the lyrical expression of hopes, disillusionments, fears and delights accompanying such a search. Her work Muttuchchippikal (Pearl-shells, 1961) is well-known.

M.N. Palur, a resident in Bombay, is ironical about the modern progress he sees around. He is critical of the hypocrisy in modern life. Pettittontan (The coward, 1962) is a collection of his poems.

The poet K. Satchidanandan has registered a movement in his poetic life. His earlier poems show the well-known marks of the modern poet, like a sense of doom, death wish and inwardness. But he has moved on in a later phase to commitment to extreme political action. In his revolutionary fervour even normal prosodic restrictions have been set aside and he writes poems without metre. Atmagita (The hymn of the self) and Anchu suryan (Five suns) are among his collections. K.G. Sankara Pillai is another young poet who belongs to the extremist persuasion.

MODERNISM-MARATHI

M. Govindan is a modern poet who combines the idiom of the folksongs to a modernist vision. Among his works are Jnanasnanam (Baptism, 1957), Arangettam (First appearance, 1978) and Oru Ponnannikkarante man-orajyam (Ruminations of a man from Ponnani). Cherian P. Cherian, A. Ramachandran, Attur Ravi Varma, D. Vinayachandran, Katammanitta Ramakrishnan, K.V. Ramakrishnan (b. 1935) are among the modernist poets. Katammanitta Ramakrishnan is a popular poet who frequently recites his own poems. He combines a folksy idiom with images from religious lore. His poems are noted for their strength. Katammanittayute kavitalak (Poems of Katammanitta, 1981) is a selection of his poems. G. Kumara Pillai has written mostly in the category of lyrical poems; he has also written some poems in the modernist style. Kunjunni specialises in poems which look like limericks, but they are enlivened by a modern sensibility.

MODERNISM (Marathi). There are two terms in Marathi for 'modern': 'arvachin' and 'adhunik'. The terms 'abhinava' or 'nava' are sometimes used for the new. But arvacheen is modern in time, as juxtaposed to 'prachin' but adhunik is modern in concept as opposed to the traditional. Though renaissance in Marathi literature was ushered after 1818, with the decline of the Maratha rule and the establishment of the British Raj, it took a long struggle for the concept of modernism in literature to get acceptability. It was a corollary of social respectability to many scientific and rational beliefs. The nineteenth century was a period of polemics and the debate between the Shastri-Pandits and neophytes went on for decades. Vishnushastri Chiplunkar and Lokahitavadi, Agarkar and Tilak were good examples of these two conservative and radical positions, categorized in political terms as the liberal and moderates on the one hand and extremists on the other. The extremists were strongly Hindu revivalists. So though the latter advocated revolutionary tactics against the British misrule, their social credo inclined towards a non-changing, and sentimental, back-to-the-past, status-quoism. So in Tilak, Savarkar and the like, one may find traces of modernism, but their basic thinking was traditional. Jyotiba Phule or Rajwade were more modern.

In literature, if we go by the titles of some important works of literary criticism in this transitional period, one comes across such works as: Arvachin kavita compiled by C.S. Gorhe (1903); Adhunik kaviyitrincha sphut kavita sangraha (Anthology of poems by modern poetesses, 1922) compiled by Saraswatibai Bhide. Adhunik kavipan- chak by G.T.M. Adholkar (1921); Abhinava kavya Prakash by R.S. Joag (1930); Adhunik Bharat by S.J. Javadekar (1934); Adhunik Angla vangmaya by B.M. Gore (1938); Adhunik Marathi kavita by B.S. Pandit (1940); Adhunik sudharak by S.M. Mate (1941); Arvachin panchakanya by B.G. Naik (1945).

A serial collection of modern poetry—Abhinav karyamala was published in four parts; in 1909 G.G. Lele edited the first volume, in 1912 N.V. Tilak, in 1915 N.C. Kelkar; and the last one was edited again by L.G. Lele in 1923.

While 'modern' was a temporal nomenclature, as an antonym to ancient or medieval, the term 'New' was more generic and indicative of a break-through. So in the late forties of this century there was a movement ushered in called Nava-mata-vad (Neo-ism). This was a reflection of the new morality, neo-realism, new poetry and new criticism movements in the west. To define their radicalism in a sharper manner the Marxists called their literary advocacy of change as 'Purogami' (Progressive) movement. Some titles of books published from 1920 to 1950, beginning with this Nava or Nave (New) adjectived prefixes, are as follows:

Navajivan (a social drama) by K.N. Asnodkar (1921); Navajivan (a novel) by M.V. Joshi, 1923; Navapushpakar-andaka (short stories) by V.M. Joshi (1924); Navayugacha purvaranga (life of Lala Lajpat Rai) by S.K. Phadke (1931); Nava zamana (a feminist play) by Mama Warerker (1946); Nava namuna (a novel) by V.K. Nerurkar (1948); Navi rajwat (a novel) by S.K. Shukla (1949); Nava prayog (a novel) by Sane Guruji (1950); Nava rang (a play) by N.D. Tamhankar (1936); Navin kalpana (a play) by N.V. Kulkarni (1942); Navi malavat (poems) by Sharatchandra Muktibodh (1949); Nave jag (novel) by P.Y. Deshpande (1941); Navi kshitijen (translation of Sharatchandra's Shesh prashna) by S.B. Shastri (1936); Navya Guggoshthi (collection of light essays) by N.S. Phadke (1937); Nava lene (collection of light essays) edited by P.A. Chitra (1948).

Now most of these works are in the genre of poetry, fiction, drama or belles lettres declaring their 'newness' so specifically, sometimes loudly and sometimes to distinguish themselves from the 'dated' ones. In criticism, the term modernity is vaguely mystic and not cliché-ridden. Modern poetry uses new figures of speech borrowed from English, called 'Nave alankar'. Modern poetry is more realistic, advocating social reform and revolution. Modern poetry swims against the current; when poetry was too subjective, it preached objectivity, when it became too much committed, it propagated the necessity of freedom of the individual. Modern poetry does not care for traditional moral taboos and so frank and sometimes even repulsive. Modern poetry became a tool in the hands of angry young Dalit poets.

Modern Fiction—both novel and short story—broke away from the familiar plot and character based structure, the lengthy descriptions of nature or social milieu. It re-interpreted the past and touched upon those points which were neglected. It mentioned the unmentionable. It analysed the class-structure of the society and delineated the reaction of the individual to society and vice versa. It probed into the unconscious of the protagonist. It was written in stream-of-consciousness style. It became an in-depth study of a region or a sub-caste or outcaste environment. It employed a new language, a new dialect in dialogues, or a new idiom of an unrecorded group or community. It did not rely on the good old formulas of suspense and a sweet end. Sometimes it showed the futility of the much-cherished values from H.N. Apte to Bhalchandra Nemade. From Hadap to S.N. Pendse there is such a change.

Marathi drama broke away from the traditional musical drama, the Shakespearean dovetailing of the comic relief scenes in between the high tragedy, the mythological folk entertaining theatre. It indulged in social problems of dowry, child marriage, prohibition, nationalist movement, inter-cultural dialogue, socialist protest, feminism, mammon worship, distortion of socio-political motivations, perversity, absurdism, sexual abnormality and existential dilemma and many such modern questions handled by Ibsen, Shaw, Chekhov, Pirandello, Genet and Sartre—which served as models for Warerkar, Atre, Bedekar and Rangnekar, Vijay Tendulkar, Mahesh Elkunchwar, Anil Barve and C.T. Khanolkar.

In the field of short story, Gangadhar Gadgil, Aravind Gokhale, P.B. Bhavé, Vyankatesh Madgulkar and K.J. Purohit 'Shantaram' were the pioneers of the new short story movement in late thirties. The traditional story was more of a tale or a rigmarole or a character-sketch. The importance of the interaction of the movement and the milieu was recognized by these new writers. Y.G. Joshi had given a conversational style and V.K. Ghorghade had added freshness and spontaneity to the story no doubt. But the old O'Henry—like twists at the end advocated by Phadke and the Chekhov-like tragi-comic ambivalence mixed with a fable like sentimentality shown by V.S. Khandekar were no more relevant after Gangadhar Gadgil's probe into unconscious motivations. The dark world of the unpredictable and the fatalistic impenetrability of coincidence was explored by G.A. Kulkarni, the superb master of this craft.

Modern criticism passed through all the stages of the Gandhian, Tolstoyan moralistic criteria to Marxist socialist belief in creating a new social order through writing. After the last great World War II the linguistic analytical critics and the existentialists also entered this arena of aesthetics. While Kaka Kalelkar and Vinoba Bhavé were in the line of V.M. Joshi in the category of moral preacher as writer, D.K. Bedekar, Lalji Pesndse and Sharatchandra Muktibodh took the socialist, purposeful stand of writer as a leader of change. B.S. Mardhekar, W.L. Kulkarani, Prabhakar Padhey and Madhav Achaval took a formalist position. There were many other critics and writers who had an independent stand, like Surendra Barlinge, R.B. Patankar and T. Sardeshmukh.

The concept of modernism, thus, passed through much scrutiny and re-interpretation during the last five decades, partly influenced by the historical processes in the formation of a new Maharashtra state and partly by the shifting demand on the part of the common reader's ever growing, zigzag taste. Passing through the romantic and the revolutionary phases it is now heading towards rationalism, more objective, scientific and universal neo-humanism.

MODERNISM (Nepali). Modernity in Nepali literature is a much debated subject. Scholars like Basudev Tripathi, Churamani Bandhu, Dilliram Timsina, Krishnaprasad Parajuli and Yajnaraj Satyal consider Lekhnath Poudyal as the pioneer of the modern period beginning in 1918, while there are others like Ratnadhvaj Joshi, Ishwar Baral and Keshavprasad Upadhyay who regard the publication of Balkrishna Sama's Mutuko vyatha (129) as the beginning of the modern period. In the opinion of Mohanraj Sharma and Taranath Sharma, however, the modern period begins only after 1950.

Modernism, set against medievalism, requires an attitude which is mainly secular and humanistic. It is important to keep this point in mind while dealing with the question of modernism in Nepali literature.

Lekhnath's poems, Kavi-kavitalap (1912) and Kalika vilasi (1905) mark a clear departure from the tradition of eroticism of the works of Lekhnath's immediate predecessors. Lekhnath outrightly condemned this eroticism as 'bhanrua gramin shringar'. In his Versa-vichar (1918) he denounced the poetic style of his predecessors in the following way:

Heri nasakanu garī parakhāl bare bare
Nepālī kavīle khutta kateka varṇa jhain lare

This voice of rebellion against what preceded was instantly echoed by other poets like Dharanidhar Koirala and Mahananda Sapkota. Both of these poets expressed their dissatisfaction about the ways and conditions of life which were highly valued by the poets of the preceding era. They not only rejected the literary practices of their predecessors, but also criticised the social evils and unwarrantable customs prevailing in the society. The rebellion against such practices serves as the crux of the subject-matter in the poems collected in Dharanidhar's Naivedya (1920) and Mahananda's Manalahari (1923).

Modernism, as remarked by Percy Gardner, is based on the evolution of science and critical method in history. It does not demand that the great truths borne by the tradition should be given up, but says that they should be considered afresh in the light of the growing knowledge and restated in a way suitable to the intellectual conditions of the age. This very quality forms the rock-bed of works of poets and literatures like Lekhnath, Dharanidhar, Mahananda, Balkrishna Sama, Guruprasad Mainali, Suryavikram Jnavali, Roopnarayan Sinha, Parasmani Pradhan and Rudraraj Pandeya.

A tendency to depict objectively the reality in literature in all genres is evident during this period. Writers and poets had a new vision which led them to appreciate literature as a form of art. Unlike the literature moralism, superficial romance, and imaginary world of the devotional and erotic poets and writers of the earlier period, this period developed an objective outlook to depict truth and fictional reality in literature. Notwithstanding the inherent idealistic didacticism and ethical concerns, the literature of this period developed more sophisticated genres. Spiritualism was cast adrift in the plays and poems by Balkrishna Sama who made an attempt to mould several spiritual themes into a flesh-and-bone reality in his works like Prahlad and Kaikevi.

Lakshmi-prasad Devkota was an all-embracing poetic personality. He emerged during the first phase of the modern era which begins in 1918 and ends in 1950. The themes of his works range from the ancient Aryan culture and civilization to the latest scientific discoveries made by the West in the 19th and 20th centuries. On the one hand he was an antiquarian and a pioneer of Romanticism in Nepali, and on the other, one of the most vehement critics of the blind traditionalism and its followers. The early years of the modern period in Nepali saw a torrent of diverse trends in different genres of literature. If there were fiction-writers like Guruprasad Mainali, Pushkar Shamsheer, Balkrishna Sama and Rudraraj Pandeya who followed the principle of idealistic realism, there were also poets, essayists, fiction-writers and playwrights like Lakshmi-prasad Devkota, Yuddhaprasad Mishra, Siddhicharan Shrestha, Prem Rejeshwari Thapa, Roopnarayan Sinha, Balkrishna Sama and Bhimnidhi Tiwari, who embraced romanticism or a blend of romanticism and realism. Sinha's social realism in his short stories is heart-stirring, yet as a novelist he is a romantic visionary.

The influence of Freudism marked the distinction of Bishweshwarprasad Koirala as a short-story writer. He published his first psychological short-story in Nepali in 1934, the very year in which Mainali appeared as the first successful writer of modern short fiction. There also appeared a number of literary critics like Ramakrishna Sharma, Ishwar Baral, Ratnadhoj Joshi, Hridayachandra Singh Pradhan, and Yadunath Khanal.

The novels by Bangdel and the plays and poems by Gopalprasad Rimal are quite significant as avant-garde literature.

After 1950 the literary writers and poets were free to express themselves. As a result, the voice of rebellion and an urge for the social reorganisation grew more persistent in their works. This was the beginning of the second phase of modernism which lasted for nearly a decade (1950-59). If the influence of Freudism was marked during the first phase, the second phase was marked by the influence of Marxism, specially in the field of poetry and fiction. This trend was called 'progressivism'. In the novels of Hridayachandra Singh Pradhan, Khargabanadur Singh, Muktinath Timilsina, and Tulsiram Kunwar and in the earlier poems of Vijaya Malla and Bhoopi Sherchan economic inequalities and discriminations were the main themes. Vijaya Malla had already tried his hand on these themes in his play Baulaha kaziko sapana, and Bashu Pasa in his Kisan ho and Samaj. But the trend of psychoanalysis in fiction and erotic psychology in poetry still persisted. The plays of the Malla brothers and the short-stories of Poshan Pandey, Bhawani Bhikshu and Govinda Gothale exhibited this trend. The idealistic depiction of social realism was evident in the novels of Achha Rai Rasik, Leelbahadur Chhetri, Indra Sundas, Shivakumar Rai, Krishnachandra Singh Moktan and Leeladhwaj Thapa, and in the plays of Balkrishna Sama and Bhimnidhi Tiwari, all of whom basically belonged to the earlier phase.

A majority of authors in this phase challenged the sanctity of prevalent socio-cultural norms, beliefs and values. A disregard for formative order and structural unanimity was noticed especially in novels and poetry. Novels and short-stories shifted from the descriptive and plot-oriented styles of narratives to the essayistic persuasiveness. Sex was no more a taboo. Rimal had already taken the Whitmanian outlook towards sex in his poems written in the earlier phase. This prompted many younger writers to follow suit. However, the 'humane anarchism' of Kampf was not evident in Nepali literature until 1959, or the end of the second phase. Despite the challenges against the traditional norms and values (socio-cultural as well as literary and aesthetic) a few poets and authors still followed the classical forms and styles. In order to suggest an immediate revolution and change in the society the writers and poets paid little care to the aesthetic aspect of their works. The most important point to be noted about the poets like Lekhnath, Somnath Sigdel, Devkota and Balkrishna Sama in their penchant for epic poems. Devkota is regarded as the first original writer of an epic in Nepali. Somnath published his Adarsha raghava in 1948. Sama's epic poem Chiso chulho was published in 1958. Lekhnath also tried his hand on epic writing and published his Tarun-tapasi in 1953. All these epic poets, except Somnath Sigdel disregarded the epic norms prescribed in the ancient Indian poetics, so much so that Lekhnath even could not call his Tarun tapasi a mahakavya and instead called it a navyakavya.

The modern era in Nepali literature entered the third phase of its temporal progression after 1960.

MODERNISM-RAJASTHANI

In the field of poetry Mohan Koirala, Bairagi Kainla, Ishwar Ballabh, Jagadish Shamsher Rana and Bhoopi Sherchan emerged as the trend-setters, while the major contributors in the realm of novels were Vijaya Malla, Indrabahadur Rai, Parijat and Shankar Koirala. Short story was given a new mould in this phase by writers like Gothaley, Ramesh Vikal, Poshan Pandey, Prema Shah, Balkrishna Pokhrel, Indrabahadur Rai, Ganusingh Gurung and Shankar Lamichhaney.

The most significant change was seen first in poetry and then in fiction and literary essay. The traditional metaphors and symbols were replaced by new and unforeseen expression, especially in the poems by poets like Mohan Koirala and Ishwar Ballabh. Deliberate obscurity, symbol-hunting, and use of ambiguity not as a trifle but as a grace are the most remarked stylistic features of these poets. Punctuations, connectives and diacritics are often omitted, syntax broken and sequences jumbled up in their writings. The usual prosodic patterns are broken with the use of long and prosaic lines, and more and more references are drawn from the poet's personal rather than the universal world.

In fiction, the tradition of plot-oriented and factually descriptive techniques were replaced by more analytical and character-oriented ones. Some influence of the Joycean method of an apparently disjointed but internally coherent narrative and an influence of European existentialist thought was also evident in Vijaya Malla's Anuradha (1961), Indrabahadur Rai's Aja ramita chha (1964) and Parijat's Sirisko phool (1965). In short stories the shift from the narrative to a persuasive method was more prominent. The writers turned more towards the internal world of individual characters, and hence were more psychologically involved. Ramesh Vikal combined the two different but equally prominent traditions of social realism and psychoanalysis in the short fiction. Parijat, Prema Shah, Pushkar Lohani, Kumar Jnavali and Harish Bomzon were well-known for their efficient handling of Satyra and nymphomaniacs, while Ganusingh Gurung, Kumar Nepal, Prem Thapa, Tana Sharma, Dev Kumari Thapa, Daulat Vikram Bista and Indrabahadur Rai chose to deal with other social and psychological aspects of humanity.

With the spurt of the third-dimensionalist movement (tesro ayam) in 1961 Nepali prose in general and short fiction in particular acquires a new prose style which is unique in itself. Actually Indrabahadur Rai is the chief of the third-dimensionalist trio. Despite its influence on several younger writers, the prose style of the 'third dimension' has remained as a distinctive feature of Rai's writings. Shankar Lamichhaney is especially remembered for his introduction of science-fiction in Nepali. Gaunthaliko gunr is a collection of his short science fictions which are stylistically interesting and thematically symbolic and experimental. Lamichhaney as a modern writer is also unrivalled in the field of literary essay. He is an elitist in literature. Others in the field of literary essay are Balkrishna Pokhrel, Taranath Sharma, Indrabahadur Rai, Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, Ramlal Adhikari, Nagnendra Sharma, Rajnarayan Pradhan, Ballabhmani Dahal, Churamani Bandhu, Bhairav Aryal and Janaklal Sharma, Dilliram Timsina, Balkrishna Pokhrel, Churamani Bandhu, Mahananda Sapkota, Ballabhmani Dahal, and Taranath Sharma are better known for their works in the field of linguistics and philology.

In the field of drama Vijaya Malla appears again as a trend-setter. His Jiundo-vash (1961) is the first successful use of a blend of psychoanalysis and symbolic depiction of social realism. It also bears some traits of Beckettian absurdism, at least in one of its characters, Urmila. The presence of an apparently unnecessary character, Professor Radhakrishna, shows the author's reliance on the rationalist concept of literature. Other mentionable playwrights who have written during this phase are: Basu Shashi, Basu Pasa, Kumar Ghising, Tulasi Apatan, Leelabahandur Chhetri and Virendra Subba. Literary criticism also fosters more prominently in the works of critics like Indrabahadur Rai, Krishnachandra Singh Pradhan, Bashudev Tripathi, Taranath Sharma, Dayaram Shrestha Sambhava, Anandadeva Bhatta, D.P. Adhikari, Dilliram Timsina and Guma Singh Chamling.

The third phase of modern Nepali literature ends and the post-modern period begins with the emergence of fiction-writers like Dhruvachandra Goutam and Bishweshwarprasad Koirala, Mohanraj Sharma, Kishore Pahari, Gupta Pradhan, Malsyendra Pradhan, and Arya Lamichhaney; playwrights like Mohanraj Sharma, Dhruvachandra Goutam, Asesh Malla and Avinash Shrestha; poets like Norzang Syangden, Manprasad Subba, Rajendra Bhandari, Jeevan Theengh, Avinash Shrestha, Vimal Koirala, Hem Hamel, Minbahadur Bista and Norden Rumba; and literary essayists and critics like Kishore Nepal, Sanubhai Sharma, L.D. Rai Mikkholey, Rajendra Subedi, Mohanraj Sharma, Abhi Subedi and Keshavprasad Upadhyaya.

MODERNISM (Rajasthani) may be taken to have emerged out of anti-British feelings which gradually developed into the spirit of nationalism. It was much before the treaty of 1818, entered into by the East India Co. with the Rajput princes that people had known of the British policy of trade and commerce to the disadvantage of the country in general. This was voiced by Shankardan Samaur, a charan poet of foresight and vision. He warned the people of the evil intentions of this trading community. Earlier Asiya Bankidas, the renowned scholar and poet from Jodhpur, had given a clarion call to the people, Hindus and Muslims alike, to unite and oust the British from the land. The gradual development of these feelings was to be seen in the spirit of nationalism during the first war of independence. Shankardan praised national heroes like Tantia Tope. Kushalsingh of Asop killed a British officer while defending his fort and Suryamall Misran wrote Vir satsai inculcating the spirit of heroism among the common masses. Dungaji-Jawarji, Ratan Rana, Nathusingh Devra, all rebels, as also the chieftains of Salumbar and Kothariya, who helped the anti-British elements, received the goodwill of the public in general. Folk-songs, Dingal poems and ballads composed in their honour are still recited with usual gusto on occasions of public enjoyments and festivals.

But real modernism, on the other hand, was ushered in by the introduction of the modern scientific approach and the new educational policy of the British. Telegraph (1851) and railway (1854) were the two major inventions which attracted the common man towards the British and a spirit of awe was generated in them. Added to this were the well organised and properly trained British soldiers fully equipped with the latest arms and ammunition of warfare. The British policy of education from beginning to the uppermost level, more oriented towards the administrative system, was made applicable by Charles Wood. The combined result of this, together with the submission of the States to the East India Co. under the treaty of 1818, proved the last straw on the camel's back. The public in general now came in the grip of these foreign rulers. Though attempts were made by nationalist heroes like Swami Dayanand to boost up the morale of the masses, but the influence was more in the field of religion than that of politics. His Arya Samaj was more of a social reform movement especially directed to oppose the 'Sanatan Dharma' and discourage idol-worship. He did attempt to bring the ruling princes under his influence and also succeeded in having his sway over the princes of Udiapur, Shahapura, Jodhpur, etc., but the poor man fell a prey to the vested interests and was subjugated by them. He had earlier sent scholar-politicians like Shyamjirishna Varma to England to get in touch with the British at home.

The wave of nationalism showed itself more in the love of land. Strangely enough, this was generated by a British agent, Col. James Tod, who wrote the first epic of new Rajasthan under the title Annals and Antiquities of Rajasthan. This gigantic work not only prompted scholars all over the world to know of and write about Rajasthan, but also encouraged local scholars to follow his footsteps. Histories of Kaviraj Syamaldas and G.H. Ojha are two such notable examples. There was another spirit of social reform brewing in the merchant community that migrated from the mainland for better prospects in Maharashtra, Bengal, etc. 'Purdah' system, dowry, future-trading, illiteracy, child-marriage, old-age-marriage, wasteful expenditure, love of their own language, etc. were their main targets. This was done through dramas, stories, novels, articles and social gatherings. The availability of printing presses at the start of the 20th century made it possible to produce such literature. At home, another scheme was launched in the scholarly fields of ancient literature and grammar. While the missionaries' contribution cannot be belittled, the work done by L.P. Tessitori and George A. Grierson is to be hailed. These scholars were responsible for bringing out catalogues and edited texts together with the first ever linguistic survey of the land. Local scholars like R.K. Asopa were also fully awake and gave us grammar and course-books of the language. It was this spirit that further developed into scholarly pursuits and love of the language. S.K. Parik, Ramsingh Tanwar, N.D. Swami, Motilal Menariya and Udairaj Ujjwal are some such names who worked in these fields.

Apart from nationalism, love of land and its language and social reform movements, there was more stress on politics which resulted in ousting the British and their protectorates. But real modernism in literature showed itself in the form of opposition to all exploitation, dignity of labour, awakening of human feelings in all walks of life, logical thinking, scientific way of living, avoidance of all superstitions and obsolete ways of life, etc. Anti-feudal poems describing their atrocities and exploitation were composed by the poets like Rewatkar Charan who also talked of revolution by the peasantry. Sumanesh Hoshi was another veteran poet. In the political field such songs were sung by the masses in Udaipur region. Anti-capitalist poems and stories were widely written by a host of writers. Murlidhar Vyas, Narsingh Rajpurohit, Premchand Rawal, etc. were some of them. Songs of dignity of labour were sung by Ganeshalai Vyas, 'Ustad' and Gajanan Varma. 'Ustad' also advised to dispense with all superstitions, avoid the parasites and adopt scientific methods. Writers in general adopted logical thinking and described human feelings. This is apparent from the fact that the subject of literature shifted from the gods and kings to the common man, and his doings and shortcomings found place therein. A sympathetic attitude for the poor, the have-nots and the down-trodden section of the society, was displayed in the literature of the later half of the 20th century. K.L. Sethiya, Meghraj, 'Mukul', Annaram Sudama, Naruram Sanskrata are some of these writers. A beginning in this direction was made by Umardan Lalas of Jodhpur who had made the famine-stricken rural masses as his subject and described their lot in his extra rich vocabulary. He had also exposed the misdeeds of the hypocrites in the religious and sectarian fields. Human feelings were prominently displayed in stories and novels. R.D. Shrimali, Yadavendra Sharma 'Chandra', Narsing Raj Purohit, Baijnath Panwar, MD. Vyas and Annaram Sudama are some writers worth mentioning. The respective works are Salvatain, Hun Gori kin piva ri, Amar chunadi, Ladesar, Varasganth, and Badhati anwalai. Mulchand Pranesh, in his Ukalata antara, Sila Sans and Chashmadith gawah, and

MODERNISM-SINDHI

Naruram Sanskarta in his Gyohi and Ghar ki Gaya also did the same thing. To keep pace with the scientific way of living, they have made use of scientific inventions and other such articles in their similes, metaphors and other literary devices.

This introduction of science in day to day life gave a logical way of thinking to creative writers. Every action must have a reason behind it and this basic thought was the driving force. Nothing was taken for granted and an indepth search of reasons behind all happenings was every writer's concern. This helped them expose corruption in all walks of life and also the evils binding the innocent people. Annaram Sudama has done so in his Mewai ra runkh and R.D. Shrimali in his Salawatan. Education also opened new vistas of knowledge and did not remain limited to the traditional ones. Newspapers brought the world of news at one's doors and it was no more necessary to rely on rumours and gossips. Air-travel minimised waste of time and so also did the modern communicating instruments. Living habits and recreative facilities also underwent a drastic change which revolutionised all parts of the world. All this resulted in the changed outlook of the creative writer. Ramniwas Sharma, Yadavendra Sharma 'Chandra', Sanwar Daiya K.D. Barath and R.N. Vyas have displayed this outlook in their stories. The constant business of an average man in the race of modernism and the consequent loss of all identities have been the subject matter of treatment by the new poets who are so engrossed within themselves that they harp on their own woes and have no time to look into other people's hearts. A feeble note of cursing the sorry state of affairs may be guessed from their writings. Thus modernism which was a welcome thing in the beginning, is becoming sore both to the writer and the reader. But unavoidable as it is the modern writer has to face the same. Poets are more prone to it than the prose-writers. Nand Bharadwaj, Tej Singh Jodha, G.S. Sekhawat and B.L. Vyas are some such prominent poets. But the inescapable truth is that modernism has given a jolt to the average Rajasthani writer and kept him away from the hackneyed subjects and obsolete expressions.

MODERNISM (Sindhi). Modernism in Sindhi literature covers, at its broadest, the period of about 100 years from 1843, when the British annexed Sindh to their empire, to 1947 when India became independent. What follows thereafter may be loosely labelled as post-modern or contemporary. At its narrowest, the historical epoch called 'modernist' may span about 37 years from 1915, when Gandhiji returned to India from South Africa and assumed the Indian national leadership, to 1947 marking the end of British empire in India. In spite of this simple time-bound exercise of historical block-making, we can see that it could (as well) be complexly timeless, as in the case of Shah Abdul Latif, who (like Kabir of Hindi literature) is still relevant to the contemporaneous situations and shows modernist trends 1843-1915: During the phase, prose emerged as a powerful means of literary expression and Sindhi literature came to deal with many a subject of physical sciences and social sciences. Kauromal Chandanmaal Khilnani (1844-1916) published many books in discursive and non-discursive prose, the first among them being Pako pahu (1862), a book making a strong plea for women's education. Pribhdas Anandram wrote a history of India in 1863 and Narayan Jagannath, a Maharashtrian settled in Sindh, produced a book on the geography of Sindh in 1865.

The first stirrings of modernity were felt in this phase. Sadhu Hiranand (1863-93), a co-disciple with Swami Vivekananda at the Ramakrishna Mission, Calcutta, returned to Sindh in 1884 and took over as the editor of Sindh Sudhar. A staunch nationalist, the Sadhu did not connive at the wrong doings of the alien rulers. At the same time, he edited The Sind Times in English, in which also he wrote in 1884, "It is estimated that the exploitation of India by Nadir Shah did not exceed 32,000,000. That exploitation did not occur every year, while now India has to pay about 45 million annually to England. That India is poor cannot be denied. That her poverty is due to this annual depletion of her resources cannot be gainsaid..."

Like other parts of India, Sindh throbbled with nationalism. Among the delegates who attended the very first session of the Indian National Congress held at Bombay in 1885, were Dayaram Jethmal and Udharam Mulchand from Sindh. On their return to Sindh, they wrote fine pieces reporting the events at the Congress, in Sindhi.

By the year 1885, it may be observed, English education (in no way it was Anglicism) found its way into some quarters of Sindh: life and letters. The people in Sindh did not have to spend or waste time to come to realise that the Auglicists among the English educated elitist classes in the country unknowingly halted the pace of our march towards independence and also that the English education could be used as a means of fighting against the British imperialism on its own familiar ground.

A great quartet of essayists Kauromal Chandanmaal Khilnani, Mirza Qalich Beg (1853-1929), Dayaram Gidumal (1857-1927) and Parmanand Mavaram (1865-1938) produced original works and adapted books from Sanskrit, Hindi, Persian and English in Sindhi. Kauromal wrote, besides Pako pahu mentioned above, extensively on the Panchayat system, health, agriculture and folklore in a style which was at once simple and stately. The other three authors also did everything through letters to raise the Sindhi cultural life.

The novel and the drama, the two major genres, came to be established during the modernist phase. Zinat

MODERNISM—TELUGU

(1890) by Mirza Qalich Beg, Ajib bhet (1892) by Pritamdas Hakumatrai, Choth jo chandu (1909) by Lalchand Amardinomal (1885-1954) and Anand sundrika (1910) by Bherumal Maherchand (1875-1950) were the great novels which entertained and educated the people and dealt with the Sindhi life in general.

It was with the establishment of D.J. Sindh college Amateur Dramatic Society in Karachi in 1894 and other dramatic societies in various parts of Sindh thereafter that the Sindhi drama graduated from its popular forms of Ramlila, Raslila and Bhagat to its sophisticated ones of one-act, three-act and five-act plays. But interestingly enough, the new sophisticated forms would have age-old revivalistic content based on the two epics of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and the Puranas Kauromal Chandanmal's Ratnavali (1888), Jethanand Bhiryai's Nala Damyanti (1894), Lilaramsingh's Harish-chandra (1895) and Rama-banavasa (1898), Gangasing Advani's Shakuntala Dushyant (1898), Thakurdas Nagwani's Chandravali (1907) and Kishinchand Bewas's Bilva Mangal (1908) were based on the Sanskrit, Hindi and Urdu works, which in turn were founded on the common national memory.

In the field of poetry, Shamsuddin Bulbul (1857-1919) deserves a special mention for his digs at the 'English jackets, pantaloons, cheroots and shaving of beards'. In his satirical way, he composes in Sindhi one line wherein he talks of whisky and lapdogs, and quotes from Saadi in Persian in another line in his Karima Natural. H.I. Sadarangani translates as follows the first few distichs from this work:

Bring me half a pound of the best whisky,
O Generous One, have mercy on our condition.
I am trying my best to travel to foreign lands,
Except thee, there is none to listen to our plaints, Lest these Mullas confuse and confound us, protect us from the wrong path.

1915-1947: Jethmal Parsram's Chamraposh jun akha-nyun (1923) is a great modern work in which social evils are exposed. Amarlal Hingorani's short story 'Ado Abdul Rahman' (1930) raises the people above the narrow confines of caste and creed and fosters the view of 'unity of being'. Mirza Nadir Beg's short stories 'Achhut' and 'Inquilab' are sensitive commentaries on the Sindhi life in the 30's. The 1942 'Quit India' movement opened up new vistas of experience for our writers. Sard Ahun (1942), Registani Phul (1944), Pirah Phuti (1945) and Sindhi kahaniyun (1947) are collections of short stories replete with modern ideas in their portrayal with sympathy for the poor farmers and labourers. The majority of Sindhi writers during that period were progressive in outlook.

As for the novels, Shevak Bhojraj's Ashirvad (1933), Guli Sadarangani's Ittehad (1941), Asanand Mamtora's Shair (1941), Tahilram Asudomal's Dukhan puthyan sukh (1942), Ram Punjwani's Asanjo ghar (1946) and Chandia jo chamko (1947) may be described here chiefly. Ashirvad is based on the experiences which the writer had during his participation in Gandhiji's Satyagraha movement, Ittehad and Shair portray the inter-community and intercaste matrimonial alliances of the heroes and heroines in love—love, which is incorruptible by the narrow religion and hidebound creed. Dukhan puthyan sukh narrates the story of an enlightened 'Zamindar' (Landlord), liberal in his attitude towards the workers on his lands. Asanjo ghar depicts the 'free but partitioned' India. Chandia jo chamko concerns itself with the mercenaries trying to bring the nationalists into hardship.

Khanchand Daryani's plays Gulab jo gul (1920), Motie ji mukhri (1923) and Zamane ji lahar (1929) seek to ameliorate the lot of women and establish new values in the society. His other plays Maya jo andh (1928), Bukh jo shikar (1932) and Zamindari zulm (1927) raise their formidable voice against the feudal way of life and the exploitation of the labour class. M.U. Malkani's Batai, a short play, deals with the new relations between farm owners and farmers in the new socio-political conditions. His Aulad (1932), another short play, advocates the need of having smaller families.

Jethmal Parsram is the first major prose writer who wielded his mighty pen to propagate modern ideas. He, like Gandhiji, wrote in a simple and direct manner in his eagerness to reach the largest number of people. During his times, modernism meant humanism in its broadest sense. And humanism was not any different from Gandhism.

Kishinchand Bevas and Hundraj Dukhayal are the prominent Sindhi poets who have written extensively on Gandhiji and his ideas. The Karachi Congress Session in 1931 resolved that Gandhiji alone should represent the Indian people at the Second Round Table Conference in England. Gandhiji followed up the resolution and visited England. Wherever he went in that country, people were impressed by his simple and sincere life and thought. Bevas wrote a poem "Vir vilait mein" on his visit. In another poem, 'Sabarmatia jo sant', written earlier in 1929, he says "you need only point your finger, and the sixty-six crores of eyes will look in that direction".

MODERNISM (Telugu). Modern (or modernist) literature in Telugu may be said to have been a direct or indirect product of the trend of modernism in the West.

Telugu literature was mainly influenced by the British Romantic poetry (including its Victorian and 20th century versions), Eliot, Pound, Joyce, Virginia Woolf, the Russian Realists and the French Symbolists. The influence of the other movements and artists has been negligible in varying degrees.

MODERNISM-TELUGU

Referring to the impact of the post-Impressionist art exhibitions in London and Paris, Virginia Woolf declared, "in or about 1920 human character changed". Curiously in the same year, Telugu literary history took an important turn: Gurajada Appa Rao published his Mutyala saralu, a successful experiment in native ('deshi') metres, and wrote the first ever short story in Telugu. A humanist, social reformer, scholar and educationist, he was a writer of great calibre with an uncompromisingly modern outlook. His writings like Kanya shulkam are at once topical and universal. Gurajada is rightly hailed as the harbinger of modernity in thought and expression into Telugu writing. It was in the same year 1910 that Rayaprolu Subba Rao, pioneer among Telugu romantic poets, published his first work. Sri Venkata Parvateesa Kavulu, who were on the threshold of modernity, were also active then.

After Gurajada, it was the Romantic trend (Bhava kavitvam) that found a favourable climate in Telugu literature. Considering the then socio-cultural condition and the influences acting on the literary scene—the Indian Renaissance, nationalism, Gandhian thought, Bengali literature—we can understand how Telugu literature was destined to flourish under a romantic star. The Romanticists—Rayaprolu, Devulapalli, Viswanatha, Adavi Bapi Raju, Basavaraju Appa Rao, and a host of others sought after novelty in more than one way. The subjectivity of their writings provoked the later 'progressive' writers to allege, wrongly though, that they were escapists lacking in 'social consciousness'. Their essentially romantic traits are due to a blend of English, Bengali and native influences. In deference to the changing literary fashions and needs, many formalistic innovations were effected. New forms like the 'khanda kavya', 'geya kavita', 'vachana kavita', serial novel, radio drama, scenario, skit, essay, book-review, have been increasingly popular.

After 1935, our writers have all too readily succumbed to the 'west winds', including Communism. Extremely opposite ideologies and understandings are represented by great novelists like Unnava Lakshminarayana (preaching socialism and social reform), Adavi Bapiraju (a proud celebration of the past glories) and Viswanatha Satyanarayana (prescribing religious and social revivalism). Modern trends like realism, surrealism, dadaism, futurism, imagism, symbolism, impressionism, psychoanalysis, behaviorism, the stream of consciousness technique have all found faithful echoes in Telugu literature. The major poets of the post-Depression period have exploited modern science and industrial situation to discover a new methodology of poetry for portraying the new predicament of man. Arudra's Tvamevham and Byragi's Nutilo gontukalu represent our modern poets' successful attempts to "recreate for his age the image of man", which, as Allen Tate put it, is the chief duty of the artist in any age. Among the novels which convincingly depicted the decline and fall of the disinherited middle class man, Gopichand's Asamardhuni jiva yatra and Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastry's Alpajivi are representative of the existential dilemma of the protagonist incapacitated for action and forced to a resigned acceptance of the futility and the absurdity of life. The stream of consciousness technique came in handy here, for tracing the inner workings of their minds.

Modernism, whatever its fruits in the West, can have its bearings in India on an entirely different plane, due to the already existing cultural patterns and traditional systems here. Even though many 'isms' were transplanted into our literature, the craze of westernizing our society soon met with counter movements of revivalism and Sanskritization. Tripuraneni and Tapi Dharma Rao aspired for a rational, casteless society, while the advocates of neo-brahminism like Viswanatha pleaded for a return to the sanity and security offered by the traditions of the past. A young rebel like Sri Sri challenged the concepts of apparent peace and security in the feudal and capitalist societies. "The whole of the past is drenched in blood/or else in tears." His Mahaprasthanam (1949) inaugurated a new era in Telugu poetry, putting the crown on the head of the factory worker and the farm tiller. Undoubtedly modern in temperament and outlook, he yet employed classical diction and traditional rhythms in his poetry. Nevertheless, with an absolute control on the musical word, he employed traditional devices with new associations and effects. Like Gurajada, he is rightly called 'Mahakavi'.

Among the followers of the ideology of Sri Sri, however, we find a tendency to merely politicize poetry, depicting not human experience per se, but the Marxian analysis of the experience, which is the staple food of their poetry. Most members of the 'progressive' and 'revolutionary' groups (Arasam and Virasam), thus, do not hesitate to sacrifice poetic values like brevity and suggestivity to the dubious ideal of taking poetry to the masses. 'Vachana kavita' is their preferred form, as it is apparently free of all traditional rules and restrictions. Of late, some of them like 'Gaddar' and the late 'Cherabandaraju' have been returning to traditional folk-forms like the song and the street play to spread 'praja sahityam' or people's literature among the illiterate masses. In some respects, this is in tune with the post-modern trend in the West (e.g. the Movement poets, the Group poets, the Camp poets, etc.)

The digambara (nude) poets of the 1960s succeeded in administering a shock to the readers by giving free expression to their unbridled contempt and disgust for all settled social, political and religious institutions. But soon their unqualified emotion and bitterness were found repulsive and unpoetic, so the wave receded.

Apart from the 'committed' poets who insist on the poet's class-consciousness, there are quite a few individual poets producing competent modern poetry. Notable among these are Ismail, 'Ajanta', Seshendra Sarma and Mohan Prasad, experimenting with forms, expressive modes and devices like the image and the symbol. More than the experiments, their outlook towards life and poetry proves them modern.

The novel, as it grew popular with time, also acquired newer dimensions characteristic of the contemporary life in Andhra. Innumerable journals serializing mediocre novels perpetuate this trend. Telugu novelists and readers seem to be content mostly with the traditional idea of a novel as an interesting story well told. Innovations in technique are seen in the writings of Naveen, Vaddera Chandi Das, Kesava Reddy and Lata. As regards the themes, the novel comes close to the realities of the work-a-day world and hence contemporaneity is a prerequisite. Yet, there are thousands of fanciful, sentimental pseudoscientific and pseudo-historical novels. Some novels memorable for their veracity, artistic viability and commercial success are Chivaraku migiledi (Buchchi Babu), Apaswaralu (Sarada) Kollayi gattitenemi (Maheedhara Ramamohana Rao), Bali pitham (Muppala Ranganayakamma), Chillara Devullu (Dasarathi Rangacharya), Prajala manishi (Vattikota Alwar Das), Daga padda tammudu (Balivada Kanta Rao), Govulostunnayi Jogratra (Rachakonda Viswanatha Sastry) and Himajwaal (Vaddera Chandi Das).

The short story in Telugu, now seventy-five years old, is rich in both variety and quality. Some of the best Telugu short stories reach international standards, but many of them remain hidden from the rest of the world, as they are never translated. Drama in Telugu, which is gradually defeated by the cinema, largely conforms to traditional norms. Recently, of course, there is an attempt to translate and follow other Indian playwrights like Badal Sircar, Vijay Tendulkar and Girish Karnad. Other literary forms like the essay, the biography, the autobiography, the travelogue, are occasionally handled and do not have many votaries. Especially in modern literary criticism there is an alarming paucity in Telugu. If proper attention is paid to create truthful and reliable criticism, it may check the excess of the popular trends and help fill in the lacunae in weak genres.

K.G.S.

MODERNISM (Urdu) gained momentum as a literary movement in Urdu in the mid-1950's at the time when the Progressive Writers Movement had begun to decline as a creative force. The widespread disillusionment and disenchantment with the role of ideology in literature that followed the partition of the subcontinent led writers to question all preconceived ideas and manifestos, in fact, regimentation in any form. Rejecting the overtly political literary concepts of their predecessors, younger writers especially regarded socialist realism, the favourite literary doctrine of the Progressives, as defective and insufficient. In their rejection of alien literary doctrines these writers initially sought to revitalize indigenous traditions. Defining their modernism by quoting Mir, Ghalib and other classical poets, they set themselves the initial task of readjusting to their own tradition in order to equip themselves to meet the challenges of a new sensibility.

These younger writers of the post-Independence period valued intellectual freedom above everything else and believed that the writer should not be subjected to any external controls. Advocating the autonomy of the arts, writers calling themselves moderns, rebels and radicals entered into long debates with 'Progressive' writers on the nature of the creative process and the role of literature in society. These discussions of the purposiveness and aesthetics of literature, in which the moderns argued that neither content nor specific themes determine the quality of literature and that writers must be free in their choice of subject and form, ushered in a new era in Urdu literature dominated by the modernists. As they opposed organizational structures, the modernists neither formed an association nor issued manifestos. However, because they popularized new trends and deeply influenced the literary scene around them, they functioned, in fact, as a literary movement.

The modernists regarded the writers of the Halgh-e arbab-e zaug (The Lahore Group) of the 1940's as their precursors, and particularly sought inspiration from the poetry of Miraji and Rashid. Contemporaneous with the Progressive Writers Movement, the Halgh had included among its active members, in addition to Miraji and Rashid, such writers as Yusuf Zafar, Qayyum Nazar, Majid Amjad, Mumtaz Mufti, Tasir and Mukhtar Siddiqi. These writers were especially influenced by Freudian theories and by such French symbolist writers as Baudelaire, Mallarme and Rimbaud. Emphasizing the promotion of new language, new forms and new themes, these writers took their lead from Rashid and especially fostered the development of free verse, Azad nazm, in Urdu. Through their influence, even the Progressives, who had originally branded experiments with free verse as formalistic and decadent, were forced to adopt it. Following Makhdum, whose poem "Andherā" (Dark), was the first free verse Progressive poem, other Progressive poets eagerly adopted free verse, and it became a popular form in Urdu.

The Halgh writers and the Progressives initially had seen themselves as pursuing common aims: both groups adopted a rebellious stance toward traditional literature, and both encouraged new experiments in literature. In the earliest period, Rashid and Miraji were even included among the Progressives. However, as the political character of the Progressive Writers Movement became clearer, and as it became more closely associated with communist ideology, Progressive leaders raised increasingly frequent objections to the writings of Halgah members. Halgah writers became the targets of Progressive criticism, were openly denigrated by Progressive critics and were characterized as insane and reactionary.

The centre of the Halgah had been in Lahore and the Punjab had generally been its sphere of influence. A substantial part of the Punjab, including the city of Lahore, became a part of Pakistan, while the main centers of Progressive influence, viz. Lucknow, Delhi, Bombay and Hyderabad, remained in India. When the reaction against the domination of literature by political ideology began in 1955, the demands for intellectual and literary freedom arose strongly in both countries. As the number of writers espousing these demands increased, they recognized the similarities between their ideas and those of the Halgah writers. Consequently, Rashid, Miraji and other individualist writers, who had had to endure the Progressives' bitter tirades, now were not only acceptable but were hailed as the setters of new trends.

Despite their common commitment to intellectual freedom and their rejection of external constraints on literature, the writers and critics who initially came together in the Modernist movement represented disparate points of view and espoused quite different definitions of modernism. For some, modernism meant neo-classicism and neo-spiritualism. For others, it was characterized by poetry expressing social concern in any angry tone. Yet still others regarded it as a mode of neo-lyricism which promoted poetry and fiction in a personal idiom.

Urdu literary critics and the journals for which they wrote, in both India and Pakistan, played an important role in clarifying and integrating these various elements into a coherent movement. One of the earliest proponents of modernism in Pakistan was Muhammad Hasan Askari (1913-1978). He was supported by older scholars like Maulana Salah-ud-Din Ahmad and Said Abdullah and younger writers like Salim Ahmad, Nasir Kazmi, Intizar Husain, and Wazir Agha. Articles promoting the cause of modernism initially appeared in such journals as Adabi duniyā (Lahore), Sawerā (Lahore), Adab-e-latīf (Lahore), Nusrat (Lahore), and Sa-t rang (Karachi). As the movement gained strength, Wazir Agha's journal Aurāq (Sargodha) played an important role in the modernist cause in Pakistan. Journals in India participating in the new movement included Sabā (Hyderabad), Saughat (Bangalore), Talāsh (Delhi) and Kitāb (Lucknow). The well-known literary scholar A.A. Suroor also patronized the new tendencies as did such critics as Khalil-ur-Rahman Azami, Baqar Mahdi, Varis Alavi, and Balraj Komal. Shams-ur-Rahman Faruqi, through his influential journal Shabkhūn (Allahabad), played an historical role in spreading and popularizing modernist tendencies, and many new writers became known through this journal.

With the general acceptance in the early 1960's of the need for intellectual freedom and literature freed from the constraints of slogans and political manifestos, critics and writers in literary journals began to consider anew the nature of literature and the uniqueness of the creative process. As these writers began to agree on the need for artistic freedom, the negation of sole emphasis on content and attention to all aspects of literary expression, modernism began to coalesce as a distinct movement. The movement was particularly popular among poets, and those who distinguished themselves in it include Nasir Kazmi, Ibn-e. Insha, Jamiluddin Aali, Khalil-ur-Rahman Azami, Suleman Arib, Balraj Komal, Qazi Salim, Munir Niazi, Baqar Mahdi, Muhammad Alvi, Saqi Faruqi, Wazir Agha, Zafar Iqbal, Iftikhar Jalib, Shahryar, Mahmud Aiyaz, Amiq Hanfi, Mohd. Alvi, Shams-ur-Rahman Faruqi, Kumar Pashi, Mughni Tabassum, Zubair Rizvi, Zahidah Zaidi, Nida Fazli, Adil Mansuri and Salahuddin Parvez. In addition, Akhtar-ul-Iman, Munibur Rahman and Khurshidul Islam, who had all begun writing prior to the rise of modernism but had been ignored because of their extreme individuality and subjectivism, were accepted by the modernist movement. Akhtar ul-Iman, in particular, greatly influenced the modern nazm poem.

With the exception of a few many of the above poets composed ghazals. The 1960's in fact saw a revival of the ghazal and besides writing nazms also, modern poets experimented with classical styles and modes to express a new sensibility. Casting a spell over the entire decade, Nasir Kazmi was the acknowledged leader of this new group of ghazal writers. Others in the group included Khalil-ur-Rahman Azami, Ibn-e Insha, Zafar Iqbal, Bani, Shahryar, Hasan Naim, Mohammad Alvi, Shakel Jalal, Salahuddin Mahmud and Shaz Tamkanat. Such rising young poets as Bashir Badr, Zeb Ghor, Nida Fazli, Bimal Krishna Ashk, Prakash Fikri, Bashir Nawaz and Sultan Akhtar also played a significant part in bringing a new imagery and personal tone into the ghazal. So strong and compelling an influence did the ghazal become during this period that even such senior Progressive poets as Ali Sardar Jafri, Makhdum Muhiuddin and Jan Nisar Akhtar could not remain unaffected by it.

Similar development took place in fiction. Qurrat-ul-Hyder, who had begun writing in the early 1950's, began writing novels with tremendous creative energy under the modernist influence, quickly emerging as one of the premier voices of the new era. Other writers of modernist novels include Abdullah Husain, Intizar Husain, Bano Qudsiya, Anwar Sajjad, Anis Nagi and Salahuddin Parvez. The many modernist short story writers include, in Pakistan, Intizar Husain, Anwar Sajjad, Rashid Amjad, Khalidah Husain, Masud Ashar, Ghulam-us-Saqlain Naqvi, Ahmad Hamesh and Muhammad Mansha Yad; and in India, Balraj Mainra, Surendra Prakash, Devendra Issar, Ram Lal, Jeelani Bano, Jogindar Pal, Iqbal Majid, and Balraj Komal. Many of these writers not only encouraged the development of the symbolic and allegorical story, but some of them also experimented with the use of mythology and a dastan-like style for the expression of a modern sensibility.

Though essentially similar to the modernist movement in Western literature, modernism in Urdu contains some elements not explicable in terms of Western influences. The first is the interest of many modernist Urdu writers in India's traditional literature. Urdu writers since the middle of the last century have tried to integrate Western, Islamic and Indian ideas into a new value system. Continuing this trend, many modern writers, however much they may refer to imagism, symbolism and existentialism, also draw heavily on Hindu, Buddhist and Islamic sources. Amiq Hanfi and Adil Mansuri, for example, synthesize Islamic and existentialist thought in their work, while Krishan Mohan, Kumar Pashi and Nasir Shahzad seek inspiration from Indian mythology.

Secondly, the rise of modernism must be considered, at least partly, as a response to the domination by the Progressives of the pre-Independence period. Arguing for art as an expression of the individual rather than as an instrument of social reform, modernist writers have increasingly felt that the romantic idealism and relatively simplistic literary techniques of the Progressives have not been able to answer the challenges posed by social change in the post-Independence period and the growth of an urban industrial society. They have therefore shifted the emphasis of literature away from an attempt to reform society towards an expression of the author's inner feelings and search for meaning. In thus exchanging socio-political concerns for human existential concerns, modernist writers have sought to correct the Progressive' over-emphasis on society, the family and the group, and have focused instead in their writings on the individual self, and its own interior and introspective processes.

Focus on individual concerns does not mean, however, that modernist writers are divorced from social reality or the processes of social change. On the contrary, the moderns maintain that their relationship with society is more dynamic and meaningful than that of their predecessors, because their involvement with it is voluntary and self-chosen. They argue that any relationship with society not based on individual freedom destroys creativity and is therefore harmful to the art. They further believe that the primacy of the individual is fundamental to literature and that the only authentic portrayal of society is that viewed through the individual.

Modernism thus inaugurated a fundamental psychic revolution in Urdu literature which incorporated a new vision of complex reality and a new approach to imagination and creativity. Having changed their point of view, many modern writers aim in their writings at a metaphysical revelation that will reveal an illuminated, unified vision of life. Integrating in their writings the invisible world of the spirit with the world of physical sense, they attempt to see both sides of life at once: the spiritual supercharges the physical with creative energy and delight, revealing a new reality in which the moderns enthusiastically pursue their search for life's meaning.

The most common criticism levelled against modernism is that it represents the individual's sense of loneliness and desire for death, negates social commitment, over-emphasizes intellectual freedom and leads to unhealthy introspection. Critics further suggest that, in addition to ignoring the hopeful aspects of life and the future, modernism is so vast and flexible that it represents no single ideological point of view. Wazir Agha answers the charge of ideological flexibility by suggesting that "this criticism is the product of minds who prefer the habit of remaining blind followers to the achievement of intellectual freedom." The supporters of modernism further claim that the road to intellectual freedom is difficult, dangerous and poorly paved. Writers must remain uncommitted so that they can freely experience the pain of experiment and use their creative energy. As A.A. Suroor describes it, Modernism is a way of seeing and living life freely. It is not a fixed, closed trend but is rather a collection of rebellious attitudes towards preconceived notions and predetermined ideas. It goes beyond human loneliness, disillusionment and struggle with life and also shows human greatness and sings of freedom. There is a sense of humanism in it. The representative literature of modernism is truly interested in opposition to ideology, attention to the individual, self-realization, individual loneliness and human psychology. Consequently, we must change the old literary traditions, discard outmoded language, give language new tone and colour and use symbols. Unless we free ourselves from the grasp of fashion and formulae and attune ourselves to the modernist spirit, we will never find our way out of the labyrinth of the present age.

By way of justifying their own existence, several Progressive critics have tried to call Modernism an extension of Progressivism and to accommodate it to their own political point of view. As the Progressives had initially branded modernism a sick and reactionary movement, calling it an extension of Progressivism, they struck most writers as a matter of literary expedience. Hence this view gained little ground.

Some writers believe that modernism has played out its role in Urdu literature and is now declining in influence. The reinterpretations of socialist realism now being presented lend weight to this claim. However, supporters of modernism view it as an enduring trend of literary dissent, which has brought about an atomosphere of freedom of expression in Urdu literature, resurrected literary values and emphasized the importance of style and expression in the creative process. The rebellion of the modernist writers may have lost its youthful sharpness and force. Nevertheless, as characterised by one of its exponents: "Modernism will always remain meaningful for those people who have made freedom of thought and expression their ideal."

MODI, CHINU (Gujarati; b. 1939) is a modern poet. Though his early collection Vatayana did not make much impact on the readers, his later collections reveal him as a poet of distinction. His unusual predilection for ribald language seems to be the obvious result of his over emphasis on erotic themes. All the forms of poetry which he has exploited reveal murkiness of disappointed love. In his 'ghazal' the poet has introduced a new patterning of four couplets 'Kswanika' in which 'Kaphia' of the initial couplet should be unfailingly repeated in the last couplet to produce an effect of unison. Besides poetry, he also wrote in other literary forms.

His first novella Saila Majhumdar, which reappeared as Bhavachakra in extended form is the story of a woman who wants to get her identity accepted by the two men not because of her femininity but because of her being what she is. Bhava-abhava (1969) reflects his search for identity with a modern image of Buddha as the central figure. His Lila Naga (1971) deals with the complex problem of sexuality. Gandhari Ankhe pat is his recent journalistic fiction based on Emergency. His short stories are marked by the use of folk and medieval narrative technique blended with metrical couplets.

As a playwright, Modi creates varied situations of non-communicability, non-audibility and non-visibility leading to the projection of significant dramatic experiences in his collections like Dayalanam pankhi (1967), Call-bell (1973, which is a collection of verse-plays).

His critical series on four of his contemporary poets are interesting in their subjective contents. His critical method is thoroughly impressionistic elsewhere.

FURTHER WORKS: Ksnona mahelman (In the palace of moments, 1972); Khanda kavya (1973); Urnanabha (The spider, 1974); Darpanani galiman (In the alley of mirror, 1975); Sapita vanamam (In the cursed forest, 1976).

MODI, MADHUSUDAN CHIMANLAL (Gujarati; b. 1908, d. 1974) was a researcher, editor. He passed his B.A. Degree examination from Fergusson College, Poona in 1926, followed by the M.A. with Sanskrit and Vedant-shastra as main subjects. Later on he obtained the degree of L.L.B. from Ahmedabad in 1932.

Besides attending to his business, he also gave private tuitions to children. In collaboration with Ratilal Mohanlal Trivedi, he founded the New Education High School at Ahmedabad, in 1938. Impressed by his substantial contribution to the subjects like Prakrit and Apabhramsha, the Bombay University had granted him recognition as a Teacher for the Post-Graduate Classes which were started in Gujarati Vidya-Sabha in 1939, and consequently he started the P.G. teaching work. He also founded Nutan High School in 1952, and Vidyanagar High School, in 1953. Later on he became a partner in a Straw Board Factory at Bilimora.

His valuable contribution to research relates mainly to Apabhramsha, and Old Gujarati to some extent. Gurjar Rasavali (1st ed. 1956, 2nd ed. 1980) is one of his works which he co-edited with B.K. Thakore and M.D. Desai. Next comes Vasantvilas which he edited. It gives us fair appraisal of his editing abilities and richness of language. Likewise, his Hemsamiksha is also a volume offering valuable help to students. He was a profound scholar of the Medieval Gujarati language and literature, and his contribution to the editing of the Medieval literary works, is significant.

He has edited two books on Apabhramsha namely Paumasiricharito (1947), and Neminahcharito (1972), in collaboration with Harivallabh Bhayani. Chhakka-moovessa is his independently edited research work. In the same way, his other volumes namely Apbhramsh Pathavali and Bhavnasandhi Prakran closely acquaint us with his deep knowledge about Apabhramsha. Scientific outlook, precision in interpretation, and profound sense of understanding of the ancient languages are the characteristics of his editing and research work, in the field of Old Gujarati and Apabhramsha. He is renowned at the national and international level for his significant contribution to the field of Indology.

MODI, RAMLAL CHUNILAL (Gujarati; b. 1890, d. 1949) was a researcher of medieval Gujarati literature, editor and historian. He studied upto matriculation at Patan and later on served as a head master in education department of Baroda State for many years.

Patan-Siddhpurno Pravas (1919) is a volume written by him following the pattern of a report of travels, and describing the particulars of the two ancient cities and the surrounding areas and old places. His book Dwashraya-Kavyaman Madhyakaleen Gujarati Samajik Sthiti (1942) speaks of his deep study and research. A character-sketch of Jadunath Sarkar drawn by him was published in Vismi-Sadi (1918). This character-sketch was also translated into Marathi later on. A collection of similar essays and other research articles concerning the medieval literature, History and Archaeology have been published in two parts by M.S. University of Baroda, under the title R.C. Modi Lekh-Sangrah. His profound knowledge of the subject, and his method of logical argumentation based on his exhaustive study of the subject, bear ample testimony to his proficiency as a scholar and researcher.

In Bhalan, Uddhav ane Bheema (1945), (2nd Ed. 1966), he has made an elaborate effort to discover and present the details in connection with the life-history and respective literary contributions of these three medieval poets, with proper evaluation of their compositions.

He edited Be Nalakhyan (1924) based on the original manuscript of doubtful authorship of a poet belonging to medieval era. He has also prepared a volume titled Jalandhar-Akhyan (1932) in which he has edited stories in Gujarati from medieval times. This book contains tales of Jalandhar by Bhalan, Vishnudas and Shivdas. At the same time, he has also written a comprehensive essay on the original story of Jalandhar viewed through a comparative perspective.

For his prolific contribution to the field of Medieval Gujarati Literature, History and Archaeology, he holds a prominent place among writers and scholars of literature.

MOGARE, GANGADHAR RAMCHANDRA (Marathi; b. 1857, d. 1915) was a pioneer of satirical poetry in Marathi and worked in the Royal Asiatic Society Library, Bombay for a few years. He was a renowned scholar of ancient and modern European Literature.

He began writing poetry in 1884. His poetry has been brought out in seven volumes, under the common title Mogaryanchi phule. His elegy written on the death of the Shivaji Maharaj of Kolhapur, entitled Maharashtra jan vilap (1884) has been the first of its kind in Marathi literature. His literary career coincided with major changes in the trends of Marathi literature. This is reflected in his works. Even though he used Sanskrit metrical forms, he chose as his themes, people and events from everyday common life. This was a distinctive feature of his poetry. He contributed to the creation of a congenial environment for modern Marathi poetry. His satirical poetry is full of penetrating humour, but it never gets aggressive; nor does it violate decorum.

G.M.P.

MOHAMMAD BAKSH (Punjabi; b. 1831) was a 'kissa' poet and author of Saiful Maluk, published later in 1941, by Haji Malik Din Muhammad, Lahore. Najam Hussain Sayad writes that it is strange that a village of Ihelum produced such a great poet. The 'kissa' was composed in March, 1864, during the month of Ramzan when the poet was 33 years old. Accordingly, in view of Sayad's calculation the date of birth of the poet should be March 1831. Among the kissa poets, he is perhaps the first conscious poet. In his kissa, he has raised and answered literary questions like: What are words? What are meanings? What is their mutual relationship? What is the function of a poet and his art in the cycle of life? What is the function of literary criticism. From this it can be inferred that the poet must be well-educated. He was deeply religious man and passed his days in singing God's praise. His preceptor was Hadi and his teacher was Shah Gulam Muhammad. His was a brief family of a brother and a sister. He lost his parents in early childhood.

Saiful Maluk is his only writing consisting of 9128 'baits'. Description of life right from birth to death, detailed realistic description of the interior lives of gods and goddesses and all kinds of living beings is given. The kissa provides some of the best examples of highly imaginative and poetic art.

He has been an objective critic of almost all the preceding Punjabi poets, and this criticism is indeed, a major contribution.

P.S.K.

MOHAMMAD HASAN (Urdu; b. 1926) is a leading Marxist literary critic and playwright of Urdu. He was born in Moradabad, and after receiving his school education in his home town, he completed his LL.B. and Ph.D. degrees from the Lucknow University. He started his teaching career at Lucknow in 1953, but soon moved to Aligarh Muslim University, and taught there as lecturer from 1954 to 1963. He worked as Reader in Urdu at Delhi University from 1963 to 1971, and then moved to Kashmir University as Professor (1971-75). He was awarded the Jawaharlal Nehru Fellowship for research in Urdu from 1973 to 1975, and since 1975 has been a Professor of Urdu in the Centre of Indian Languages, Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi.

A disciple of Ihtesham Husain from whom he received his training at Lucknow, Mohammad Hasan has remained in the forefront of the left literary movement for the last thirty years; nonetheless, he has criticised the shortcomings of some of its leaders, and emphasised artistic values. He has been editing the quarterly, Asari Adab, for the last many years wherefrom he has launched many an attack on some of his contemporaries. Stridency apart, he has yet to strike a balance between artistic values and the use of literature as a vehicle for social change. Author of several books in Urdu, English and Hindi, he visited U.K., Canada and U.S.A. a number of times. A recipient of Humsab Ghalib Award, and Sahitya Kala Parishad Award, he is President of All India University Urdu Teachers Association, and Vice-President of All India Janwadi Lekhak Sangh. He has also been a columnist of the Daily Statesman, the Nav Bharat Times, the Qaumi Awaz, Urdu Blitz, and a number of other newspapers. His best known works are Delhi me Urdu shairi ka fikri-o-tahzibi Pasmanzar, Adabi tanqeed, and Adabi samajiyat.

MOHAMMAD IQBAL—MOHAMMAD QULI QUTB SHAH

G.N.

MOHAMMAD IQBAL (Urdu; 1877, d. 1938) came of a poor family of Sialkot. His father, Sheikh Natthu (Noor Muhammad), was a very religious man of Kashmiri extraction; his mother Begum Imam Bibi was, too, a devout lady. He was the second son, and the name of his elder brother was Sheikh Ata Mohammad. He passed the B.A. examination in 1897 and took Masters degree in Philosophy in 1899. He left for higher studies abroad; he was awarded a doctorate in Philosophy on his research-dissertation Development of Metaphysics in Persia (Published in 1908) by Munich University in 1907; on the same research-project he was given a Certificate of Research by Cambridge University in 1907. Besides, he qualified as a barrister in London. He taught Arabic at the University of London before his return to India in 1908. He set up as a barrister at the Punjab High Court, Lahore. For a year or so, he served as part-time lecturer in Philosophy at the Government College, Lahore, but soon he gave it up to devote himself to legal practice. He practised as a barrister until 1934. Chronic bad health prevented him from pursuing his profession any longer.

The three years' stay in Europe, Germany and England had far-reaching impact on his outlook, and his poetry began to tend towards concern for the Islamic world. The poetry written by him before going to Europe saturated with nationalism. The first stanza from his poem 'Himalaya' runs:

Ae Imala ae fasil-e kishwar-e Hindostan
Chomta he teri peshani ko jhukkar asman
Tujh men kuch peda nahin derina rozi ke nishan
Tu gardish-e sham-o-sahar darmiyan
Eh jalwa tha kalim-e Tur-e Sina ke liye
Tu tajalli he sarapa chashm-e bina ke liye

(O Himalaya, O Rampart of India,
The sky bends to kiss your forehead.
You do not look time-worn.
In the midst of time's passage you continue to be quite young.
There was an epiphany at the Sinai for Moses, You are Divine Splendour for the seeing-eye.)

His 'Tarana-e Hind' is almost a national song which begins with the famous couplet:

Sare jahan se achcha Hindostan hamara
Ham bulbulen hain iski eh gulsitan hamara.

(Better than the whole world is our Hindustan We are its nightingales and it is our garden)

Returning from Europe, he, shaken by the tragic disintegration of Muslim states, began to sing of Islam, and nationalism became his bete noire. Shakwa, Tulu-e-

Islam, Khizr-e Rah, etc. were written after 1908; despite his concern for the Muslim world, his poetry struck the humanist note. He began to focus on Asia's being exploited by Europe.

In 1923, he surprisingly accepted a Knighthood perhaps because of his being under the influence of the Aligarh Movement which, amongst other things, stood for cooperating with the British. In December 1926, he was elected to the Punjab Legislative Council. In course of time he became a spokesman of Indian Muslims. He participated in two Round Table Conferences, in 1931 and 1932. He was the President of All India Muslim League, Punjab Branch. Presiding over the annual session of the All India Muslim League in 1930, he advocated a sort of loose Federation with Muslim majority regions of the North-West India forming an autonomous unit. A letter contributed to The Times of India (June 22, 1933) by A.A. Suroor, Director, Iqbal Institute (Kashmir University), gives the impression that Iqbal had no reservations about the proposal for the creation of Pakistan. He was a great poet, advocating a life of struggle, adherence to active virtues and struggle against exploitation. His works include: Asrar-e-Khudi (In Persian, Lahore, 1915); Rumuz-e Bekhudi (In Persian, Lahore, 1918); Payam-e Mashriq (In Persian, Lahore, 1923); Bang-e-Dara (In Urdu, Lahore, 1924) Zaboore-e Ajam (Persian, Lahore, 1927); Six Lectures On Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam (Lahore, 1930); Javid Nama (Lahore, 1932); Musafir (Persian, Lahore, 1934); Bal-e-Jabra'el (Urdu, Lahore, 1935); Masnavi: Pas chi bayad kard ae aqwam-e sharq (Lahore, 1936); Zarb-e-kalim (Urdu, Lahore, 1936); Armughan-e Hejaz (Urdu-Persian, Post-humously published, Lahore, 1938); Baqiyat-e Iqbal (Poetry, not published) (ed.) Numai; Letters to Attiya Begum (ed.) Attiya Begum (Bombay, 1947); Stray Thoughts (ed.) S.A. Vahid (Lahore, 1960); Stray Reflections (ed.) MOHAMMAD QULI QUTB SHAH (Urdu; b. 1565, d. 1611) was the most illustrious king in the line of Qutb Shahi dynasty. His father, Ibrahim Qutb Shah, died in the year 1580, leaving behind three grown-up sons, the eldest being Husain Qutb Shah, whose claim to the throne was by-passed in favour of Mohammad Quli Qutb Shah, who was only fourteen and odd years old, and not twelve years as claimed by Tarikh-e-Firishta. He was a contemporary of Akbar the Great and Shah Abbas Safavi (of Iran). According to Tarikh-e-Firishta, he became "enamoured of a public singer of the name Bhagmati to whom he assigned one thousand cavalry as an escort and being dissatisfied with the impure and the unhealthy ecology of Golconda (the then capital city of the kingdom), he founded a magnificent city at the distance of eight miles from it, which he called Bhagnagar after his favourite mistress. In the later part of his life, he changed the name of the city to Hyderabad. The historic monument Chaar Minar was also built by him. He was a great patron of learning and a connoisseur and lover of fine arts, especially architecture, calligraphy, music and poetry. He composed poems in Telugu, the regional language of his kingdom, in Dakhni Urdu, his mother tongue, and in Persian, which was the court language of his times. His poems in Dakhni Urdu single him out as one of its outstanding poets. His poems betray his deep interest in the Indian festivals like Holi, Divali, Basant and others like Jashn-e-Navroz and Id-e-Milad, and also his love for the flora and fauna of the country. His poems cover a wide range of topics, erotic, spiritual and mundane. In the diversity of topics, he is comparable to Nazir Akbarabadi, an Urdu poet belonging to a much later period, and in his love for his subjects, irrespective of religious denominations, he is comparable to his contemporary, Akbar the Great. He was a strong protagonist of the indigenous composite culture which was evolving itself fast during his reign. He patronised Telugu, Dakhni and Persian poets alike, who were attached to his court.

MOHAN ALOK-MOHAN KALPANA

He enjoys a unique position in the history of Dakhni Urdu literature in that he is the first among the Dakhni Urdu poets whose anthology of poems, comprising ghazals, masnavis, qasidas and other literary forms, exists to this day. It was compiled by his nephew, son-in-law and successor, Mohammed Qutb Shah, according to whom the anthology contained as many as fifty thousand couplets in Dakhni Urdu. The anthology was edited and published by Mohiuddin Qadri Zore in 1940. His Dakhni Urdu ghazals, though fashioned after the pattern of the Persian ghazal, are Indian in content, containing inter alia allusions to Hindu mythology. These ghazals also bear the impact of the Persian ghazal writer, Hafiz Shirazi. His reference to the Persian poets like Anwari, Khaqani and Nizami in his poems shows his deep study of Persian ghazal and other literary forms.

The poets attached to his court were: (1) Shaikh Ahmad Gujarati who joined Mohammad Quli Qutb Shah's court at the latter's invitation and presented to the king a Dakhni Urdu masnavi entitled, Laila Majnun, and composed yet another Dakhni Urdu masnavi entitled Yusuf Zulaikha some time between 1580 and 1588. The historical importance of the masnavi lies in its being second in chronological order among the so far discovered Dakhni masnavis, the first being Kadam Rao Padam Rao composed by Nizami of Bidar; (2) Mulla Wajhi who, during his earlier career, was attached to Mohammed Quli Qutb Shah's court and became subsequently the poet laureate at the court of Abdulla Qutb Shah. He composed his famous Dakhni Urdu romantic story, Qutb Mushtari (1609), basing its plot on the love affair of Mohammed Quli Qutb Shah and Bhagmati. The heroine of the masnavi is, however, an imaginary figure, the Princess of Bengal instead of Quli Qutb Shah's real lady love. The basic purpose of Wajhi in composing Qutb Mushtari was to extol the heroic deeds of his king against supernatural background. The king died two years after the masnavi was composed.

MOHAN ALOK (Rajasthani; b. 1942) was born at Kishanpura, district Churu (Rajasthan). He has brought out three sections of his poems, but he is more known for Ga gita (1981) which earned him the awards from Rajasthan Sahitya Academy, Udaipur and Sahitya Akademi, New Delhi in 1983. Dankhalo (1977) his first book on satire, was serialised in a local daily and proved very popular with the readers. His latest book is Chit maro dukh nai (1987 down with the sorrows) which also contains some fine pieces of commendable composition. Alok is essentially a poet, not only advocating the cause of the down-trodden, but also laying bare our own deformities and the general degradation and crisis of morals in the present day society. His approach is both satirical and serious. He feels more at home while using satire. While writing in a sympathetic and serious tone, he creates pathos and deep understanding of the topic under consideration. He has also experimented with metres and the various styles of expression. His language, though a bit colloquial at places, conforms to the standard form. He has also been honoured for his poetic excellence by a number of Institutes and the government of Rajasthan.

MOHAN KALPANA (Sindhi, b. 1930) entered the field of Sindhi literature with a short story entitled 'Atamhatya' (suicide) in 1948, but later, he acquired the popularity as a novelist. His first novel Awara was published in 1954. He has more than a dozen novels to his credit, the popular among which being Lagan (1954), Aurat (1956), Zindagai (1957), Pathar jo jigar, menu ji dil (1958), Runja ain pachha, (1966), Jalavatni (1974), Kanu ain Samund (1981).

MOHAN SINGH–MOHAN SINGH

He has to his credit four collections of short-stories: Mohi nirmohi (1961), Chandni ain zahiru (1964), Farish-tan ji dunya (1966) and Uha shama (1981). Of these collections, the second and the fourth were reproduced in Pakistan in 1971 and 1982 respectively. The collection of his story stories entitled Uha shama was picked up for Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1984.

Other genres of Sindhi literature in which he has successfully produced works are reportage, children's literature (novel), biography and letters.

His autobiography has been published in Sindh (Pakistan) in 1985. Kalpana has proved to be a good poet also. He has been composing poems for the last three decades. The collection of 'new' poems, Jahaza je dekte (1983) was one of the works awarded by the Ministry of Education in 1984.

A well-known early writer of new poetry, Mohan has a feeling that what he expresses is nearer the life, or life itself, the life lived by him, enjoyed by him.

His prose writings cover subjects like love, sex, love for his motherland, revolt against poverty, difference and ill-will created by religion, caste and creed etc. He has also been editor of newspapers and periodicals from time to time and is connected with many organisations aiming at the development of Sindhi language and literature.

MOHAN SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1905, d. 1978) was born in Mardan (Pakistan). He, however, belonged to the village Dhamial, near Rawalpindi (Pakistan). His father was a doctor in the Civil Hospital. Mohan Singh passed his matriculation examination in 1923. In the same year, he was married to a beautiful girl, Basant. But after four years Basant died and Mohan Singh was involved in an emotional crisis because of this personal tragedy. He had already started participating in the poetic symposia and the tone of his verses was religious and social. But after the death of his wife, he cried out the anguish in his poetry. He became a romantic poet. In 1929, he married another girl, Surjit Kaur. At that time, after passing the examination of Munshi-Fazal, he was a teacher of Urdu-Persian, in a high school. In 1930, Mohan Singh left the job and joined Oriental College, Lahore, to do M.A. in Persian. From 1933 to 1939, he taught Persian language and literature in Khalsa College, Amritsar. There, Teja Singh, Sant Singh Sekhon, Gurbachan Singh 'Talib' became his friends and Mohan Singh studied Blake, Keats, Shelley, Wordsworth, Browning and other English romantic poets. He was influenced by Oxford Book of English Ballads, and later he wrote ballads in Punjabi.

In 1940, he turned to be a lecturer in the Sikh National College, Lahore, but after some time he left the job and started a firm, Hind Publishers, and decided to promote the literary standards of Punjabi publications. In 1939, he had already started his famous literary Punjabi monthly, Panj darya. In 1947, the partition again disturbed his plans, and he shifted his business to Amritsar. For survival, he faced many odds. For some reason again he shifted his business to Jullundur, but he could not get success in the competitive market. He closed down the firm and sold out the magazine Panj darya. For some time again he became the teacher in Khalsa College, Patiala, but, later, he was appointed Professor Emeritus in Punjabi Agricultural University, Ludhiana, where he died.

Mohan Singh was a major poet of the romantic-progressive movement in the Punjabi language, and his poetic works include Save patar (1936), Kasumbhra (1939), Adhvate (1944), Kach sach (1950), Aawazan (1954), Vadha vela (1958), Jandre (1964), Jai Mir (1968), Nanakayan (1971), Buhe (1977).

Mohan Singh also translated into Punjabi language Edwin Arnold's epic Light of Asia, Greek classic King Oedipus and Novels like Godan, Nirmala, Pingh and some other writings in prose. He wrote another book Gad-pad rachna, which deals with grammar of the language and grammar of the poetry.

Mohan Singh was a major force in Punjabi poetry after 1935, and in the next 25 years he influenced the generations of Punjabi poets. He created new norms in Punjabi poetry and created the language of new metaphors. He is, therefore, considered as the most important Punjabi poet after Warisshah.

MOHAN SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1899), better known as 'Divana', is a versatile writer, a research scholar, a critic, a linguist, a short story writer, an essayist, a dramatist, a poet, a free thinker and literary giant, who, apart from Punjabi, writes in English, Hindi and Urdu also. He started his career at Lahore by editing a cultural fortnightly in English, The Message of Hindustan (1918), in which appeared his original interpretations of Vedanta. He obtained a post-graduate degree in English (1924), and was awarded Doctorate in 1931 by the Calcutta University for his research work 'Characteristics and Tendencies of Modern Urdu Poetry'. A rare distinction of D. Litt (1932) is also to his credit for his research in the history of Punjabi literature. He had been a journalist, a school teacher, an accountant, a translator, before getting the lecturership in S.D. College at Kanpur (1925-28), and then at the Punjab University (1928), where he subsequently held Punjabi Chair. After his retirement from this MOHANTY, ARTABALLAVA (Oriya; b. 1887, d. 1963) was born at Naganapur of Cuttack district. He passed his M.A. in Sanskrit from Calcutta University in 1914 and joined Ravenshaw College as a lecturer. He began his literary career right from the time he joined the college. His chief contribution to Oriya literature are the books he edited for the Prachi Samiti. He retrieved countless palm leaf manuscripts of old works from remote villages, edited them painstakingly and published them. These works include kavyas, kavitas, treatises on 'chhanda' and 'chaupadi koili' and a host of other things. It is through his efforts that much of ancient Oriya literature which had almost been lost and forgotten, was retrieved and brought to limelight. He also removed many literary disputes regarding the authorship and dates of many important old works.

In addition to editing ancient kavyas and lyrics, he also edited Madala panji, the temple chronicles of Jagannath Puri, inscriptions and copper-plates. He was also the first to recognize Oriya writers' contribution to the Brajaboli literature and to trace the origin of Oriya literature to Charyagiti. His discovery of Rudrasudhanidhi is another remarkable achievement. It is an ancient Oriya prose work tinged with rich poetic qualities. He also edited Sarala Mahabharata unparalleled in Oriya literature. Mention must also be made of his remarkable discovery of Santha literature of the 16th century, kavya literature of the 17th and 18th centuries and the literature of the Mahima cult. Besides he also wrote a number of essays in Oriya and English on the religion, culture and literature of Orissa.

The books edited with elaborate scholastic introductions by him include Rasakallola (by Dinkrishna Das), Lavanyabati (by Upendra Bhanja), Mathuramangala (by Bhaktacharan Das), Sasi sena (by Pratap Ray), Rama bibha (by Arjun Das), Rukmini bibha (by Karitka Das), Prema panchamrita (by Bhupati Pandit), Bidagdha chintamani (by Abhimanya Samanta Singhar), Sashi rekha (by Padmanav Sri Chandana), Khadanga bhagabata kadha-danga (by Dinbandhu Das), Jagamohan chanda (by Dinakrishna), Rasabaridhi, Madala Panji, Stuli chintamani (by Bhima Bhoi), Gurubhakti gita, Usha bhillasha (by Sisusankara Das), Gopi bhasha (by Danai Das), Purnattama chandradoya (by Brundavati Das), Parache gita (by Dwarika Das), Nishdha raj, Narayana sattakam, Gopal-charitamrittam (by Jagannath Das), Bata abakasha (by Balrama Das), Premabhakti brahmagita (by Yasobanta Das), Brahma sankoli (by Achyutananda Das), Rahasya manjari (by Dev Durlava Das), Siba sirodadaya (by Yasobanta Das), Chautisha madhuchakra, Brihat nardiya puran, Tatamata gita, Srtinishedha gita (by Bhima Bhoi), Chatura binoda (by Brajanath Badajjena), Nala charita (by Madhusudan Das), Mahima dharma pratipadaka, Chautisha (by Bhima Bhoi), Bhajana mala (by Bhima Bhoi), Jayakrishna bhagana, Sadhgati, Prachina gadya, Padyadarsha, Chaitanya bhagabata (by Iswara Das), Nirguna mahatma (by Chaitanya Das), Bishnugarva purana (by Chaitanya Das).

Mohanty was awarded the titles of Vidya Bhushana by Andhra Research Society, Raibahadur by the then British Government, and Padmashri by the Government of India for his life-long devotion to and research in Oriya literature.

MOHANTY, BALAKRISHNA (Oriya; b. 1900, d. 1950), the best among the Oriya opera writers of the present century, was born in the village Palasol in Cuttack District. He studied upto Class IX, married at the age of 17 and devoted himself entirely to music, songs and drama. In 1921, on the Kumarpurnima day, he founded an opera Party called 'Jayadurga Natyamandali'. His first opera 'Vijayavasanta' which was staged by his own party in the village got wide appreciation. He wrote a number of social musical plays like Sushilamalati, Amaravilasa, Vasantamallika, Nirmalaprabha and Kumudakedar etc. alongwith a few mythological works like Banaparajaya, Rukminiparinya, Khandavadahan and Sri Ramavanaga-

MOHANTY, BANSHIDHAR (Oriya, b. 1924) passed his M.A. in the first class from the Utkal University. He took to teaching and in 1970 became the first Professor of Oriya in the Utkal University. Mohanty is well-known for his scholarship. Besides writing books on the literature of Orissa and her literary traditions he has retrieved many lost manuscripts and published them. Among his works are Orisare Boudharma, Sri Jagannath, Sahitya o samskriti, Abhibhasana, Oria bhashatattwara bhumika, Oria bhashar utapati o kramabikasha, Oria sahityara itihasa (3 Vols.), Orisar adibashi samskriti, and Rasakallola parichaya. Those of his writings are marked by insight and literary flavour.

MOHANTY, GOPINATHA (Oriya, b. 1914), celebrated novelist and short story writer received the Jnanpith award in 1964 for his novel Mati matala. He lived mostly in Koraput district, a tribal area of Orissa and many of his novels bear testimony to his intimate knowledge of the tribal life.

A visionary at heart, Gopinatha Mahanty, through his writings propagates his ideas about social amelioration and spiritual regeneration. Amritara santana, Paraja, Dadi Buddha, Apahancha and some other novels successfully capture the rhythm of the tribal lives in all their innocence, sufferings and celebrations. Exploitation by money-lenders and the petty government officials coupled with frequent natural calamities always haunt their existence. Yet with a supreme faith in life and in its beauty, the innocent tribals untainted by the pernicious influence of modern civilization dance in the lap of primordial nature in a sublime ecstasy of creation. Paraja heralds a new revolutionary awakening when the shrewd money-lender Ramachandra is killed by the exploited tribal. Apahancha carries the message of a social revolution that will consummate through the spread of education, collective farming and the like. This theme of a new awakening is further treated in Siba bhai, Mati matala and in many other novels. The tribal setting is perfectly drawn showing him as an intimate observer of the hills and forests, of the wild nature in its ferocity and fascinating beauty and of the poetry that is in their unpretentious living. Nature is endowed with a spiritual character: it is at once the protector and the destroyer. The tribals live in an intimate kinship with nature, an eternal mysterious presence that conceals many wonders of creation.

The ideal of community life that Tima announces in Apahancha is treated again in Mati matala. A monumental work on Orissa's rural life, this novel describes in realistic detail the total transformation of two villages by means of various socio-economic projects and above all by a perfect reciprocity of human relationship. The community spirit that nurtures the root of the tribal existence prompts in this novel a beatific vision of humanity. Tantrikara, another novel of Gopinatha calls for such awakening against the enemy attack. Harijana is the moving tale of the sorrows and joys of life in a sweepers' colony. Danapani is a bitter tirade against the mad pursuit of material affluence which kills in the process all time-honoured values of life. Through the degeneration of Balidatta, the novelist exposes the ugly insides of the urban life. His other novel, Laya bilaya, written against the backdrop of a family's short tour of three days to Puri moves to a psychological plane. In Laya bilaya and Rahura chhaya the novelist dives into the depth of human mind.

In all his novels and short stories Gopinatha Mahanty unfolds vistas of human experiences. A staunch believer in the sunny side of human existence, his writings always convey an unflinching faith in man. In the delineation of village life his novels belong to the rural tradition which has been enriched by Fakir Mohan and Kalandicharan. For the realistic description in his novels he banks upon the immense wealth of the tribal or rural vocabulary. He understands the delicate nuances of language and is always experimenting with its possibilities. He communicates the intense feel of life through his minute observation and innumerable word-pictures. His writings mark a landmark in Oriya literature because for the first time he presents a new reality, the reality of tribal existence, hitherto unsung.

J.K.B.

MOHANTY, GURUPRASAD (Oriya; b. 1924), eminent poet, studied English Literature at Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and taught in several colleges. Presently he is the Principal of B.J.B. College, Bhubaneswar. He is regarded as a pioneer of modern Oriya poetry. Along with Sachi Rautray he virtually launched the Modernist movement in Oriya poetry in the early 50s. His first collection Nutana kabita (1955) came out eight years after Sachi Rautray's Pandulipi (1947), and the two remain the earliest examples of the effort to change the course of Oriya poetry. His only other collection so far is Samudrasnana (1970) which won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1973.

What was so very striking about Nutana kabita was its bold experimentation with the form and technique of verse. Its manner was strange and awkward. Quite deliberately it dispensed with the method of presenting an emotion directly or developing an idea chronologically. It was puzzling. It was not surprising, therefore, that the book met with much hostile criticism. But by 1960 its worth was being recognised by most young aspiring poets. And a decade thence Mohanty's reputation was firmly established.

Mohanty's style is modern in its assimilation of several influences, mainly European. For example it is witty and dramatic in the manner of the seventeenth century English Metaphysical poets. It substitutes the musical form for the narrative form, as the nineteenth century French symbolist poetry. Mohanty is a city poet like Alexander Pope. His attitude to life is sophisticated and ironical. At least three of his poems—'Gobara Ganesha' 'Kalapurusha' and 'Akrura ubacha'—are clearly modelled on Eliot's 'The Love song of Alfred J. Prufrock,' 'The Waste Land,' and 'The Journey of the Magi' respectively. The themes are similar, and the manner is unmistakably that of Eliot. Their derivativeness notwithstanding these poems have been very popular. Few modern Oriya poets have composed lines of such evocative charm and beauty. Yet it is the Eliot-connection which has remained an unresolved issue in Mohanty's poetry. When 'kalpurusha' is claimed by some to be a distinctively Oriya poem, the validity of its use of the post-War mentality is questioned by others.

The chief appeal of Mohanty's poems perhaps is in their lyricism, their pictorial quality and their verbal melody. Mohanty is pre-eminently a poet of love. The theme of love runs through the entire gamut of his poetry like a connecting thread. In the early poems love is presented as a gross physical passion and the poet's attitude to it is ironical. The experience gives rise to visions of man's sinfulness and his fear of death. In 'Kalpurusha' the decline of love as a value is closely linked with the sickness and sterility of human civilisation in the modern times. His sonnets, some of the best in Oriya literature, look at love in the context of time and contemplate it as a means of the soul's redemption. The last two poems of Samudrasnana—'Sidhua' and 'Keum ghasa Keum balichara'—resolve all contradictions in a vision of the timeless beauty of the river Sidhua. The fear of death is rendered unreal and time is transcended through love.

MOHANTY, KANHUCHARAN (Oriya; b. 1906) in sheer volume and popularity stands head and shoulder above the other novelists of modern times. He has written more than forty novels and about fifty short stories during the last five decades and is still actively engaged in writing.

His novel Ka (1956) received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1958. This book has been translated into Hindi. His other masterpiece, Sasti, has also been translated into Hindi and Bengali. Two of his novels Abhinetri (1947) and Ka have been filmed in Oriya. Many of his novels like Ha anna, (1935), Tunda baida (1944), Shasti (1946), Jhanja (1950), have been dramatized and staged. His most popular and outstanding novels are Ha anna, Baliraja (1931-32) Adekha hata (1943), Tunda baida, Shasti and Jhanja.

Kanhucharan was born at Sonepur, now in the district of Bolangir, where his father served under the ruling chief. He graduated in 1929 from Ravenshaw College, Cuttack, and joined Government service in 1930. After retirement he worked as Secretary of the Orissa Sahitya Akademy for about a year and a half. He now lives at Rajabaicha in Cuttack.

He knows Bengali, Hindi and English. Most of his novels deal with love, the eternal triangle of love, and with devotion and sacrifice. He deals with contemporary issues such as social planning, revolt against feudalism, untouchability, womanhood, famine, etc. He aims at universal brotherhood and of a classless society imbued with the spirit of secularism and neutrality. His language is simple lucid and full of human touch. He made many experiments with technique. Besides, his novels also depict a few social problems such as the problem of rehabilitation of the refugees. He wrote a monumental novel named as Tamasa tirc (1967) based upon his experiences at Baster and Koraput.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels Palataka (1930), Nispati (1932), Swapna na satya (1933), Duniya ra dau (1934), Olta palata (1937), Parakiya (1938), Udandi (1939), Pratikhya (1938), Bhalapaibara sesakatha (1944), Managaharana tale (1946), Milanara chanda (1951), Sarbari (1952), Pari (1954), Bajrabahu (1959), Tathasthu (1963), Dheop dheoka (1964), Baga baguli (1964), Itiha (1967), Chhutile ghata (1968), Managane papa (1969), Manamanthana (1970), Angana (1971), Kahibakulaja (1973), Ajnuhen audine (1973), Maya barta (1978), Satyabati (1980), Taraka (1980), Short Stories: Epari separi (1946), Antaraya (1947), Chora chahani (1947), Mumantra jane (1968), Swapna (1968), Tarangara tale (1969), Mamatara maya (1972). Poem: Manasi (1932).

J.K.M.

MOHANTY, SURENDRA (Oriya, b. 1922), novelist and story writer, was born in Cuttack. He gave up his studies to join the Quit India movement. In his works he deals with a variety of human experiences ranging from the mundane to the metaphysical. In his works he shows an intense awareness of life in all its elemental beauty and truth. His short stories depict the plight of man suffocating amid the vulgarities and the pseudo values of modern civilization. They focus on this dehumanizing aspect of civilization where man is alienated from his society and self. There is great material prosperity but there is also spiritual poverty. There is unemployment and exploitation, hypocrisy and disillusionment. These are the themes of his novel Hamsagiti (The swan's song) The supreme good is not in denial, but in an affirmation of life and stories in Kabi o nartaki (1975), Maha nirbana (1965) and other collections propound that life is to be lived in truthfulness and free from religious and social pretensions. A haunting sense of loneliness underlines his themes as he unfolds the agony of the individual locked up in the ghettoes of commercial transactions or of the jaundiced vision of religion.

Written against the background of the freedom movement and of the subsequent times Andha diganta (The dark horizon, 1964) is the epic saga of the selfless struggle of the teeming millions in the obscure villages of Orissa. It debunks the politicians. The disillusioned end of Nidhi Dasa, a silent soldier in the freedom struggle, stands for the plight of a nation betrayed by its leaders.

Nala shaila (The blue mountain, 1969) is a historical novel based on the trials and tribulations suffered by the Oriyas during the nightmarish rule of the Mughals. It presents the determined efforts of a humiliated king, Ramachandra Deba, to save the presiding deity of the nation, Lord Jagannath, from the Mughals.

Satabdira surya (1970) is a biographical novel based on the eventful life of Madhusudan Dasa and his dynamic role in reviving Oriya nationalism. The nineteenth century Orissa is presented in historical detail. Kulabrudha (1978) as a sequel to Satabdira surya traces the life history of Madhusudana to his death in 1934 and presents him as the champion of a renaissance in Orissa.

Surendra Mohanty has written a history of Oriya Literature and a number of essays on religion, philosophy, literature and various other topics. His is a broad canvas encompassing diverse experience of life, of the agony and ecstasy of existence. The unique dramatic appeal of his works springs from the hypnotic quality of his language and the compulsive nature of his themes. His language moves from the lilting rhythm of the rustic vocabulary to the sonorous music of the Buddhist prayers.

MOHI, VASDEV (Sindhi; b. 1944) was born at Mirpur Khas (Sindh), now in Pakistan. His full name is Vasdev Vensimal Sidhnani. He obtained his M.A. degree from the Gujarat University and joined the Central Government. Presently he teaches in a school at Dubai.

Mohi emerged as an important poet among the new breed of poets during the early 1970s. With his very first collection of poems Tazad (Contradiction, 1975), he succeeded in drawing attention of the serious poetry lovers. In his poems, the infusion of satirical approach and sarcastic observations on socio-political-cultural topics resulted in the emergence of the mind pouring out pieces of poetry which could move even a lay reader as much as these could provoke the intellectual reader with their impact and intensity. Tazad was followed by yet another collection of his sensitive poems, Subah kithe ahe (Where is the morning, 1984).

Mohi, undoubtedly, is an expert in using the appropriate language required for satirical expression. Instead of imposing any of his whims or idiosyncrasies, he attempts at portraying confrontations with the harsh realities of modern life in his poetry. His poetry cannot be labelled as inspired by an particular ideology. He rather tries to search realities through his probings of the deeper layers of experiences.

Mohi's other works include a translation into Sindhi of a Japanese novel, The Key by J. Tanizaki, under the title Satal atma (1968). He also edited an anthology of poems entitled Vajuda jo khandahar (1976). Apart from writing poetry, he has tried his hand at writing one-act plays and short stories. For a number of years, he remained in close association with the 'Drama Workshop'—a unique drama group of Ahmedabad which had successfully staged a number of experimental plays in Sindhi.

MOIRANG NINGTHOURAL LAMBUBA (Manipuri) is a chronicle of the kings of Moirang. The date of composition is uncertain. The book contains the names of the kings, their conquests, and the important incidents which took place during their reign. The entries seem to have been made by the pundits of the royal Court, the actual composition spread over a long stretch of time covering the reigns of all the kings whose chronicle the book is. It is written in prose and the script in Meitei. The first part of the book, edited by Dinam Bhogeswar Singh, was published in the Bengali script in 1982. The second part is yet to be published.

Apart from the historical materials, the book contains many anecdotes associated with many place names and these are valuable material for the cultural history of Manipur. The book, read in conjunction with the Cheitharol kumbaba, gives a fair knowledge of the history, society and culture of old Manipur.

MOITRA, RABINDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1896, d. 1935), poet, story writer and playwright, was the youngest son of a clerk at Rangpur Court. Bharatkosh notes the dates of his birth and death as 1898 and 1932 respectively.

Even before the Non-Cooperation movement he gave up his studies and began to work for the uplift of the common man, especially the Santhal labourers of North Bengal. He worked for these people till his death. The life of the common man has been drawn with sympathy in Rabindranath's writings. We get to know such people as are near the soil and are of the soil in his writings which are bereft of cheap romance. Of his books of stories Mebarkahini, Third Class (1928), Dibakari (1931), Udasir math (1931), Parajay, Bastabika (1932), Trilochan kavriraj (1933) and Niranjana (1948) deserve mention. His novel, Mayar jal (1932), is remarkable for its compactness. Ghritakumbha, a projected novel, remained incomplete because of his untimely death.

Rabindranath Moitra's fame and popularity, however, rest on the humorous play, Manmoyee Girls School (1932). A complex problem of conjugal life has been ably tackled in a humorous manner and the problem finds a solution. This is one of the most successful plays in Bengali.

Initially he had written poems too. Sindhusarit (1926) indicates his poetic talent. Although he is satiric in his humorous writings he does not mean to hurt just for the sake of hurting. The underlying sympathy is the most important single factor in all his writings.

MOKASHI, DIGAMBAR BALAKRISHNA (Marathi; b. 1915), a short story writer and novelist, was born at Uran (Maharashtra), and educated up to matriculation. His maiden story 'Ananta' was published in 1940.

Although Mokashi belongs to the mainstream of the 'new' short story that undoubtedly endowed a new dimension on the medium, he has kept his own personal identity, carving a niche for himself. Simplicity of theme and depiction could be said to be his forte. Direct in expression, his language is naturally bereft of ornamentation and fake lyricism. Many of his short stories could easily find a place in any anthology of representative Indian short stories. Perhaps his most outstanding story 'Amod sunasi ale' is a typical Mokashi story wherein he has portrayed its protagonist's helpless confrontation with life and death, hurting his self-respect despite the fact that he had seen through their game by the insight acquired from a devoted study of 'Jnaneshwari'.

Mokashi has written five very interesting novels, including Sthalayatra (Arranging marriages, 1958); Dev chalale (Gods are moving out, 1961), English version, 1972; Anand owari (The Search, 1974); Purushala anek gunhe maph (Men can commit any number of crimes, 1974); and Kamasutrakar Vatsyayan (1978). The former depicts Vatsyayan as a common man interested in everything concerning human life. Anand owari handles a philosophical theme in the form of a search undertaken by Sant Tukaram's brother for the missing mystic. It is apparently reminiscent of Par Lagerquist's Nobel Prize winning novel Barabbas, so far as style and technique are concerned.

Mokashi has also written for children, and a couple of books on Technology for common man. His book 'Palakhee' (The Palanquin, 1964) is an interesting account of the experiences of his journey from Pune to Pandharpur along with a group pilgrims.

MOLESWORTH, JAMES (Marathi, b. 1795, d. 1872). After the British arrived in India, lexicography acquired great importance with regard to Marathi language and literature. The compilation of a dictionary consisted of bilateral functions: Marathi into English, and English into Marathi. The process helped the British to learn Marathi and the natives to learn English. Molesworth's contribution to build up a lexicography of this type is valuable.

Molesworth was baptised on 15th June 1795 in Surrey. He was educated at Exteter (Devon). After education, he joined army. He was appointed as linguist in the 9th Regiment of the Native Infantry. In his military career he rose to the rank of captain and retired in England in 1837.

The foreigners felt the need of learning Marathi during the 19th century. It was out of this need that the work of writing Marathi grammar and compiling a Dictionary was undertaken. They were required to study Marathi for two reasons: 1) for missionary work and 2) for the purpose of administration and for creating an army of native administrators.

There were two other dictionaries of Marathi available before Molesworth: they were Maharashtra Bhashecha Kosh and Panditi Kosh. Both the works were abstruse and verbose. At Sholapur in 1822 Molesworth compiled a glossary with the help of Thomas Candy. In 1824, he submitted to the Bombay Government a scheme of Marathi Dictionary and undertook the work himself. Molesworth was assisted in the compilation of the Dictionary by the Candy brothers for ten months beginning from April 1826. Afterwards, the Candy brothers were ordered to join military service. In 1828, after Thomas Candy retired, at his request Molesworth was associated with the compilation of the Dictionary. And with Candy's help, Molesworth published the Dictionary (Marathi-English) on behalf of the Bombay Education Society. Forty thousand words were included in the first edition. The second edition was published in 1857; and in it the number of words rose to sixty thousand. This edition contained 920 pages of lexical items. In this edition, words from Arabic, Persian and Hindustani, most commonly used, are given from the point of view of etymology, gender and form. Some words which were peculiar to certain regions of Maharashtra were shown with asterisks.

Actually, Maharashtra Bhashecha Shabdakosh was published in 1829 even before Molesworth's Dictionary. This was of course Marathi-Marathi—a monolingual dictionary. These works were compiled at the instance of Shiksha Mandali and even though the works were assisted by the pundits, Jagannathshastri Kramwant, Sakharamshastri Joshi, Balshastri Ghagave, Gangadharshastri Phadke, Ramchandrashastri Janhavekar, Dajishastri Shukla and Parashramshastri Godbole, the whole credit of compiling the Dictionary goes to Molesworth.

It seems that the work on Maharashtra Bhashecha Shabdakosh and Marathi-English Dictionary was undertaken simultaneously. This was done by Molesworth and his assistants. Maharashtra Bhashecha Shabdakosh was not at all compiled independently by the Pundits; in fact, it was completed for Shiksha Mandali under the leadership of Molesworth and Candy brothers. This was made quite explicit in the Preface to the second edition of Marathi-English Dictionary. Molesworth had contemplated English-Marathi Dictionary along with Marathi-English Dictionary. Accordingly, he started the work also, but the responsibility was carried out by Candy.

MOLLA, ATUKURI (Telugu). Nothing is definitely known about the date or life of Molla who is one of the earliest poetesses in Telugu. Tallapaka Timmakka, the author of Subhadra Parinaya, and the wife of Padakavita Pitamaha Annamacharya, is said to be the first Telugu poetess. Molla stated in one of her verses of the Ramayana that she is the daughter of Atukuri Kasayya (Kesana Sethi) who was a great devotee of Shiva, who was very much liked by his relatives and who was fond of worshipping the 'Shaiva Gurus' and 'Jangamas'. She did not say anything about her husband or family life. Critics are of the opinion that she might have lost her husband in her early age, and afterwards remained unmarried spending her time in devotion to God. Some hold that she lived in the court of Krishnadevaraya and composed some verses on him. As those verses are not available, we do not know how far this opinion is true. Molla did not refer to her caste also, but as the word 'Kummara' (which means potter) is generally added before her name, we may conclude that she might have belonged to the potter caste. It has been stated in one of the verses of her Ramayana that she could learn the art of poetry by the grace of Srikanta Mallesha of Gopavaram, and from this historians have concluded that she belonged to the village Gopavaram in the Nellore district. Some critics state that she belongs to Padugupadu and she is the sister of Kummara Gurunatha who is said to have written the Bharata to the dictation of the great poet Tikkana Somayaji. But as Molla mentioned the name of Srinatha who lived hundred years after Tikkana Somayaji in the praise of old poets, the above statement seems to be baseless. In imitation of Potana, Molla wrote that she composed Ramayana as Ramachandra asked her to do so. This also indicates that she lived after Srinatha and Potana, and as she did not mention the name of any poet that lived in the 16th century we can conclude that she might have lived in the first half of the 16th century. Kanuparthi Varalaksmamma wrote in one of her essays that the name of Molla is not correct, and as the name of the God in the village in which she lived is Malleswara, her name might have been Mallamma which might have been changed to Malli in ordinary usage. She also stated that the name Malli alone is in vogue in northern India. In many of the palm leaf manuscripts her name has been stated as Molla alone and that has been in usage for a long time.

In great humility she stated in some of her verses that she had no skill in writing poetry and that she was able to write the work entirely through the grace of God and entreated the scholars not to find fault with her if they came across any mistakes in her work. In spite of some grammatical mistakes, her poetry is soft and mellifluous. The only work she wrote is the Ramayana in six kandas and dedicated it to Sri Rama. She divided the Yuddhakanda into three parts and called them Ashwasas. Generally her Ramayana is called Molla Ramayana after her name.

D.V.

MOLLA RAMAYANA (Telugu) Subhadrākalyāṇa by Tallapaka Timmakka is generally considered to be the first Telugu Ramayana. The second is the Molla Ramayana.

It is a fact that two or three poets wrote the Rāmāyana even prior to Molla but they are either translations or adaptations of Vālmiki's great poem and are too profound for ordinary people. Molla attempted to write the Rāmāyana briefly so that every one may read and get the benefit of reading it. She divided her poem into six kāndās as usual and did not write the Uttarakānda. She tried to abbreviate the story as far as possible and this is evident from the fact that her Ayōdhyakānda and Kishkindhākānda contain only 43 and 27 verses respectively. Even the Aranyakānda is comparatively small. She seems to have given more importance to Sundarakānda and Yuddhakānda. She subdivided the Yuddhakānda into three cantos or Āshwāsās. Her story runs very rapidly touching the important incidents. She left off the killing of Kabandha, the duel between Rāvana and Sugriva, Ādityahridaya and some other incidents and made only a passing mention of the stories of Manthara, Shravanakumāra and the curse of Ahalya. While leaving the city before going to the forest in Bālakānda, Rāma did not go to see Dasharatha in this epic. The search of Hanumān for

MOMIN, HAKIM MOMIN KHAN—MON VODDTTA VODDONA

Sitā in Sundarākānda is very much reduced. She introduced some change in Rāma killing Mārīcha and Subāhu while protecting the sacrifice of Vishwāmītra. These minor changes and modifications have not interfered with either the beauty or the dignity of the story. Such omissions and modifications will become necessary for any poet who attempts to abreviate a big story.

Molla's poem reveals her poetic brilliance in many contexts. Her descriptions are short but very realistic and dignified. The description of the city Ayōdhya, of the evening, night, darkness and moonlight in the Ayōdhyakānda, and the crossing of the ocean by Hanumān can be cited as examples. She describes the pitiable condition of Sitā while walking along with her husband in the forest and while sitting under the Ashoka tree bemoaning her fate in such a naturalistic way that one who reads the verses cannot but shed tears. She describes the evening twilight in verse which means "After the sun has set, the red twilight of the evening mixed with the coming darkness appeared as if the red diamond and the black diamond have been blended in the direction of Varuṇa (West)". The description of moonlight is equally beautiful. In clear moonlight all the sages have become Nārādās, all the trees have become the divine 'kalpa' trees, all the women have become Saraswatīs, all the mountains have become Kailāśas, all the oceans have become filled with mercury, all the snakes have become Ādiśeṣhas, and all the clouds have become white." Her dialogues are natural and full of propriety. The conversation between Sitā and Rāvaṇa is narrated in a skilful manner and displays Sitā's devotion towards her husband. While stating about the safety of Rāma to Sitā Hanumān first uses the words 'safe' in the sentence and in the same way uses the word 'Kantin' (have I seen) first while narrating the welfare of Sitā to Rāma. The 'viraha' (separation) of Sitā and Rāma is aptly described.

Molla has taken great care in depicting all the characters in her poem and especially that of Sita. Sita first appears in her poem in a joyful mood when Rāma breaks the bow of Shiva. She repents very much for having abused Lakshmaṇa in the forest and requests Hanumān to ask him to excuse her for her hastiness. When Rāma says in the end that he does not accept her as she lived in Rāvaṇa's care for a few months she boldly says that she will enter fire to prove her chastity. Her ideas are quite exalted and the fear expressed by Guha before taking Rāma, his brother and wife to the other shore of the river serves as a good example. Guha says: "it seems that the dust of your feet has transformed a stone into a female and I am quite afraid that the same might happen to my boat which is my only source of livelihood".

Molla's style is simple though we find figures of speech like 'Shlesha' here and there. She does not like to use more Sanskrit words or high-sounding compounds.

The flow of her verses is uninterrupted and mellifluous and she makes use of beautiful and meaningful idioms through her poem. She seems to have read the works of the old poets very carefully and their impact on her work is seen in many places. She is fond of using the Kanda metre and there are about 250 Kandās in her poem out of a total of 900 verses. She opines that poetry should sweeten the hearts of the readers as honey sweetens the tongue and that if unintelligible and pedantic words are used poetry will be ridiculous like the conversation of dumb and deaf people. In spite of some ungrammatical uses here and there her poem does not lag behind any other poem of her age.

MOMIN, HAKIM MOMIN KHAN (Urdu; b. 1800-1801, d. 1852) was a famous Urdu poet. He was the son of Hakim Ghulam Nabi Khan. His grandfather migrated from Kashmir, and received pension from the East India Company. Momin first studied at home, and then learned Arabic with Shah Abdul Qadir. After learning Arabic, he studied Indian medicine. Besides this, he also learned astrology, classical music, etc. He practised as a 'Hakim' casually, but did not make it a profession. Azad, in his Abe Hayat, has given some astounding episodes of his accurate astrological predictions. He was expert in chess also. Unlike other poets of his time, he did not become a court poet.

He was a disciple of Shah Nasir in poetry, and in religious practice he was a disciple of Syed Ahmad Bareilvi, who led a crusade against Sikhs. More than a religious zealot, Momin was an enormous Don Juan, who made romance with a lot of ladies, the chief being Ummatul Zohra Sahib ji. In his romantic autobiographical masnavis, he has narrated his romances with brutal frankness. It is said that he had predicted the time of his death.

His works include: Kulliat (compiled In 1843, published in 1846), which has all forms of poems, a Persian Diwan (1854) and Inshae Momin, a collection of Persian letters. His fame rests mainly on his ghazals which have been popular because of his individualistic style of expression.

MON VODDTTA VODDONA (Konkani). Olivinho Gomes, the author of this book, came into the limelight as a poet before making his debut in the field of short story in Konkani with this collection, published in 1981, by Konkani Sahitya Prakashan, Margao (Goa).

There is a fundamental seriousness in these stories.

MOOKAJJIYA KANASUGALU-MOOLADHANAM

They are not illustrations of anything that is reducible to a moral law or political or social analysis, or even a principle of human behaviour. What they depict is human relations in their constantly shifting phases in the moments of which their existence is wrought. He attempts at understanding the human motives and feelings. All the stories relate to the fate of ordinary people. The writer's main interest is in the people. In fact it is stated by T.O. Beachcroft in The Modest Art that a short story gives a vision of the people. Human life is at the centre of Gomes's art. This is the result of his observation. He does not take flight into the world of imagination, away from reality. His art is rooted in reality.

His title story 'The Spirit is willing' embraces the universal experience. The character in the story is a leper, but he is heir to all the things of sex and passion. However, he is frustrated since he cannot fulfil his urge. He is an outcast. Everybody in society shuns him. Another touching story is 'Vhokol' (The bride, included in the Sahitya Akademi's Special Silver Jubilee Number). The story depicts the tragedy of a young girl who has been jilted in love. For the second time she tries her luck. Her new love raises her hopes. But on the day of marriage, the prospective bridegroom informs her that he does not want to marry her. This shock makes her go mad. For the rest of her life she sits clad in the clothes of a bride awaiting the arrival of the bridegroom. In the stories entitled 'The broken mirror', 'Yearning' 'That night of dance', 'Low tide' and 'The alienated', Gomes looks closely at the tension between our vision of love and its actual experience. The stories depict different attitudes of love, dearth of love, relationship between love and hatred, the mutual unkindness of lovers, snobbery, fulfilment of desire after passing through torment. 'The lottery ticket' (Sort) and 'The upstart' (Mosnno) stories present a satirical portrayal of the characters. The writer adopts a method of caricature. There are many specimens of farcical descriptions in these well-done stories. Both these stories abound in the beauties of the vernacular idiom. They display broadly the comic and mock-serious situations. The emphasis is more on the externals than on psychological actions of the characters that cause their own downfall, though the latter are hinted at obliquely. Local colour, spirit of regional atmosphere is discernible in another story titled 'Gaumpurus' (Collective ancestor of village).

Olvinho talks of no belief, gives no motives, airs no theories, but simply presents to the reader a situation, a place and a character, with a bold brush. The emotional content is present in the stories implicitly. There are thirteen short stories in this collection. The structural patterns of these short stories are mostly traditional, as employed by a majority of contemporary writers. The exception is the story called 'Makddavponna' (Aping) which displays a slight variation in technique and borders on an essay. It resembles a factual reportorial account, tinged with the psychological analysis of the writer's observation and acutely felt experience, written in a satiric vein. The author's prose is poetic in its diction, not merely as a medium of communication, but truly organic. The language reflects and supports the very quality of life, which is vividly established by the narrative. Wherever he uses dialogue, it is highly effective, enhancing the dramatic force of the narrative. His style retains its essential clarity right through the stories from the earliest to the latest. The style, as a matter of fact, is used as a mode of comprehending and communicating reality. That is why it sometimes tends to be ironical in its wry comments on life in a sophisticated manner.

MOOKAJJIYA KANASUGALU (Kannada) is a novel by Shivarama Karanth, which was awarded the Jnanapith Prashasti in 1977. 'Mookajji' means the dumb grandmother. The central figure of the novel is so called because for years after she became a child widow she did not speak a word. She has a special gift—if she touches something it brings visions; she can delve into the minds of people and know exactly what thoughts dwell there. This extra-sensory perception is a device used by the novelist to bring into the frame of the work the entire history of mankind. It is as if Karanth is testing what load the novel form can bear. The novel probes the origin and development of beliefs and institutions. A plot is also woven into this vision of history, and the old woman develops into an intensely human and compassionate person. There is a memorable scene in which the old woman soothes a dying companion and prepares her to face and accept death as the natural rounding off of life. Karanth's sceptical and questioning mind and his respect almost bordering on reverence for integrity shape the novel. The rational attitude is clear in the depiction of sex as necessary and natural, needed to complete the development of the individual.

The novel was first published in 1968; and English translation, Mookajji's Visions, by T.S. Sanjeeva Rao, was brought out by IBH Prakashana, Bangalore, in 1979.

MOOLADHANAM (Malayalam) is a powerful play, written by Thoppil Bhasi, portraying the grim repression of the period 1948-50, a period of unprecedented Communist witch-hunt in Kerala. Men and women from the lowest strata of society—like the butcher, the tea-shop vendor and the peasant—are portrayed vividly in all their simplicity and nobility. Many of them in their sacrifice and in the stoic resistance that was put up, attain great heights of heroic grandeur when the tyranny unleashed by the State against a people hard hit by destitution and poverty assumes its crudest form.

MOOLADHANAM

The author, Thoppil Bhasi, is a nationalist-turned Communist, elected to the State Legislature in the early 1950's. As a political worker leading many struggles he knew intimately the lives and passions of the peasant folk. He had a long period of underground life following a bloody clash in Soornad between land lords and labourers. This was followed by terrible torture of agricultural labourers at the hands of the police. It was this experience which led Bhasi to write a play like Mooladhanam (Capital), grim and suffocating yet charged with a revolutionary's hope of achieving his goal. In his prefatory note Bhasi narrates a personal tragedy of his comrade, one Kunhiraman co-accused in the above mentioned struggle. His house was razed to the ground and with his wife and six children he went underground. Five of his children were lost and two took to begging. Carrying a girl on the shoulders, Kunhiraman started a long trek to his hiding place in the hills. After walking for two nights and a day he realised that the girl was dead. It is to the grave of this girl that Bhasi has dedicated the book.

But the drama, though based on real life and its struggle, is different from the above incident. "There were two little ones" the author says, "who, when young and absolutely innocent, were cast into the vast arena of life to bear its heavy crosses. What could the poor ones do but sob, weep and sob? I am allowing these two little ones to toddle on to the stage of our theatre." These children do appear on the stage, but Bhasi has shifted the central point from these children to their mother living under the protection of a Muslim family. Characters like the rougish Madhu and the fashionable Malati are introduced for theatrical reasons. The Malayalam stage, about fifty years ago, (The western type of social drama was not familiar to Malayalam till 1935, when A. Balakrishna Pillai translated Ibsen, Chekov, etc.) needed a full story and diverse characters preferably from different religions and different strata, and above all a dialogue ringing idealism. As a professional playwright, Bhasi respected these popular preferences and in this process had recourse to unusual coincidences, melodramas and the like.

The hero is Ravi, who has been in his hide-out for three years. The police had razed to the ground his house, removing all his belongings. They tore away Ravi's photo from its frame. His daughter, six-year old Ammini, holds throughout the play this empty frame close to her heart. This child happens to join a middleclass family of a retired government servant, as a maid. Ravi (still underground) visits this house as a teacher under the assumed name of Prabhakaran. It is implied that Ravi is not only a revolutionary but an author too. His novel was published under a pseudonym. Malati, the daughter of the pensioner, gets fascinated by the novel and becomes a worshipper of its unknown author.

The villain is one Madhu, an impostor and a type of the bestial. He declares himself the author of the novel to win the heart of Malati. By helping the release of the children on bail, he has already seduced Ravi's wife, who in spite of all her heroic efforts to stand by herself was compelled to yield to his lascivious design in a moment of mental torture, having already lost her mental balance when she lost her children. Ironically, Ravi could intervene and prevent this calamity when it was about to happen to Malati, whereas he could not do so for his own wife. Ravi did this by declaring himself as the true author of the novel, and so he could no longer remain underground. The householder informs the police, and Ravi is taken into custody. So Ravi surrenders to the police in his effort to save Malati from disgrace. She was about to marry a leopard in disguise. A man who could not save his own wife and children from disgrace goes out of his way to rescue a girl from disaster and the reward is his own surrendering to the police. This forms the climax of action in the play.

Ravi's son, released on bail, happens to see his mother with Madhu and the grief-stricken son leaves his mother. Ravi too is released on bail and he returns home to meet his children. He knew his wife, by force of circumstances, had gone astray as reported by many. But a reunion of the family is made possible by the Muslim family with whom Ravi's wife was living. The Muslim lady requests Ravi to accept his wife's hand since she has been chaste at heart. A poor woman's stoicism could not resist for ever the evil design of the wealthy class. Ravi magnanimously takes back his wife and here the story ends.

Parallel to this main plot and related to it at crucial points is the story of the Muslim family, the life of Assanar, the butcher and his daughter Nabeesa. Nabeesa's heroism is evident when she convinces Ravi that his wife was chaste. Nabeesa's heroism is at its best when she thwarts all the attempts of her father to compel her to marry a crude polygamist.

Bhasi's characters are real. Madhu and Ravi are drawn in black or white. Ravi has no fault in him and Madhu no virtue in him. More complex is the character of Ravi's wife Sharada who had to face squarely and alone the atrocities of a corrupt society as represented by Madhu. Bhasi maintains his sense of reality and underlines the sad fact that the organised evil of society can blackmail a woman, no matter how chaste she is.

Mooladhanam is not as popular as his earlier play Ningalen: c kammyunistakki (You made me a Communist). Nor can it be considered a landmark in the history of drama. But it has been very successful on the stage and is notable for its theme of repression and witch-hunt. The other plays of Bhasi mainly concentrate on socio-political issues and ideals.

MOOLCHAND PRANESH-MOR JIVAN SOWARAN

MOOLCHAND PRANESH (Rajasthani; b. 1925) was born at the village of Jhajhu in Bikaner district, Rajasthan. Being associated with Bharatiya Vidya Mandir Shodh Pratishthan, Bikaner, as a research scholar, he developed a taste for editing old texts. As he hailed from the countryside and was well-acquainted with rural life, he could arrive at the correct meanings of old words which, though out of use in the towns and cities, were still in use in the villages. He has published two such texts: Nagadaman (story of subduing the Naga by Krishna) and Ranamall Chhanda (episode of Rao Ranamall depicting the fighting with the Muslim invaders). He is also a first-rate story writer and editor of repute. His collections of short stories, Ukalata antara shila sansa and Chashma dith gawah, have been published. He received the Sahitya Akademi award for his Chashmadith gawah in 1982. The books brought out by him include Hiyetano upaya, Pardesi ri goradi, Ekalgid dhadalai ri vat, Rajasthan ke pratinidhi kahanikar and Khalkhali. A number of these are collections of short stories and edited texts.

He has also won awards as the best Rajasthani litterateur from the Rajasthan Sahitya Academy, Udaipur, and the Sadul Rajasthan Research Institute, Bikaner. He also worked as editor of Vaichariki, a research journal. His own monthly magazine was Jalambhom (motherland), which mostly contained creative writing of Rajasthani writers.

MOPLAH LITERATURE (Malayalam). Muslims from Arabia, who settled in the north Malabar coast almost at the same time when the Persian and other Muslims settled in Northern India, were mostly traders. Whereas the latter had brought Persian art and architecture, the trading class of the Arab Muslims had nothing of that sort but had their language and literature, the Arabian Nights and the folk songs which developed in many areas through generations. The Arabic language got mixed with native Malayalam. Till recently this queer mixture of languages was written in the Arabic script. This was considered outlandish or even vulgar and so its recognition as a literary language was unthinkable, but the Arabian stories cast a magic spell. Though they lacked decorum and sophistication, it seems these songs and stories filtered through the traders to the artisans and workers and then to literary circles. Their identification with the life of the common man was a positive virtue. People who heard these songs could not help remembering a few lines and some tried to imitate the tunes in the native language. The Moplah songs are marked by their spontaneity, gaiety and melody. New metrical patterns were observed and at a time when poets were discarding Sanskrit metres and searching for the Dravidian ones the Moplah songs came handy to provide a fresh cadence.

The Muslim folk songs were first written and published in the Arabic script. They were collected and edited by T. Ubaid, Punneyurkulam Bapu, etc. and printed and published by Amina Book Stall. An original work in this style was to come out soon. The Badr pada-pattu (Badr war-song), written by Moyinkutty Vaidyar, is an outstanding work, which includes a short history of Islam. The war at Badr between Muslims and Khurisees in the second year of Hijra was indeed a heroic one as the Khurisees outnumbered the Muslims several times. This war is the theme of this heroic ballad. Vaidyar used Arabic and Malayalam words, but his close acquaintance with Kerala culture and with the popular poetic styles such as 'kilipattu' enabled him to communicate effectively.

Later Moplah songs were written in spoken Malayalam i.e. Malayalam as spoken by the Muslims of Malabar. As the Arabic works were minimal there was nothing outlandish about these compositions; on the other hand they directly dealt with life as it was and therefore were in tune with the literary trend of realism emerging in the early decades of this century. Chakiri Moytheen Kutty Sahib composed a new 'War song at Badr' in 1971. Other famous songs which may be classified in this group of Moplah songs are Jamita by Muneer, Suhra by K. Hasan, Kadeejakutty by R. Mullassery, Neduveerpukal and Teruvinte Chinta by Mehr.

Short stories and longer stories written by Vaikom Mohammed Basheer and other Muslim writers are replete with Muslim dialect, but they are not considered to be Moplah literature as their literary excellence enabled their entry in the mainstream of Malayalam fiction.

A typical Moplah song preserved in the households through generations is the 'Oppana' song, which is sung on occasions of marriage. The song is addressed to the bride and sung by her attendants and is marked by tender affection and mild mockery.

Uloor S. Parameswara Iyer in his Kerala sahitya charitram has mentioned works in Moplah literature such as Phuthur her ssam of Parceethukutty and Nahisathu mala of Koottayi Kunjikoya, which are 600 years old. This means that this branch of popular songs was extant even while the language was in its early stage of evolution.

P.N.K.

MOR JIVAN SOWARAN (Assamese) is the autobiography of Lakshminath Bezbarua (1864-1938) who dominated the literary scene of Assam for nearly half a century from 1888. It covers the first forty years of his life (1864-1904). An account of the remaining part of his life is found partially in his diary which does not form a part of the autobiography. The diary has recently been published as a separate book under the title Bezbaruā diblekha in two parts (1969, 1971). The autobiography narrates the author's life from the day of his birth in a boat while the family including his father was plying down the river Brahmaputra in a barge from Nowgaon to Barpeta and ends with the starting of his business association with Bholanath Barua, one of the pioneer businessmen of the early decades of this century. The autobiography appeared serially in the Banhi (Vols. XII-XIV), a popular monthly literary magazine edited by Bezbarua himself. The book was finally published in 1944 by M.C. Bezbarua. Since then two more editions with added materials were published by Assam Sahitya Sabha of Jorhat and Sahitya Prakash of Gauhati in 1963 and 1968.

The work, being one of the earliest of the modern autobiographies in Assamese, has served as a model to the later autobiographers in the language. It is true, Bezbarua's literary predecessor, Hemchandra Barua, was the first to attempt an autobiography but he wrote only a few chapters and did not finish the work. Bezbarua's work containing ten chapters that recount his experiences during the formative period of his life is notable from several points of view. The last two chapters are written in the diary style without elaborating the recorded events. In the complete works of Bezbarua edited by Atulchandra Hazarika (1968) and published by Sahitya Prakash, Gauhati, two more chapters narrating his hunting exploits in Sambalpur and his visit to Assam in 1930 have been incorporated. These two chapters did not appear in the edition of 1944.

The work is not a moon-dry narration of an individual's impression and experience of his life which we notice in some of the later autobiographies. Written in an inimitable vivacious style, the narration, though based on actual facts and experiences, has the charm of creative writing. Experiences and impressions of his childhood treasured in his reminiscent mind, the loving but stern controlling attitude of his father, the behaviour and conduct of the inmates of a big family, the Vaishnavite tradition and atmosphere reigning supreme in the household, chastisement as well as encouragement he received during his school-going days, his impression of different persons who came in close contact with the family, social life prevailing in small towns like Barpeta, Lakhimpur and Sibsagar during the last quarter of the nineteenth century—all these have been vividly dealt with in the autobiography with a telling effect.

The readability of the work is considerably enhanced by miniature vignettes of some persons who impressed the young mind of the author in his childhood. Portraits of his uncle, Rabi Kaka, the artisan, Durgeswar Sarma, the Headmaster, Chandramohan Goswami, and a few others, drawn by the author on the basis of impressions formed in his childhood, bespeak of the author's competence in outlining characters.

The autobiography vividly narrates the life and cultural activities of the Assamese residents and students of the later half of the nineteenth century, especially of the last quarter of the century. The foundation and cultural activities of the Assamese Students Literary Society (S.S.L. Club) and the Assamese Language Improvement Society in 1888 and the circumstances under which the monthly literary magazine, Jonaki (1889), came into existence and ushered in a new era in Assamese literature are recounted vividly.

The autobiography throws considerable light on the life and conditions prevailing in Calcutta towards the last two decades of the last century.

Though the author spent the major part of his adult life in Calcutta and Sambalpur (Orissa), he is admirably successful in projecting in detail the social life of Assam prevailing in the later part of the nineteenth and in the early part of the present century in his inimitable style of presentation, interspersed with humorous comments and sparkling wit. This lightness of touch and artistry in the style of composition have lent an added attraction to the autobiography.

MORAES, DOM (English; b. 1938), poet and author, is the son of Frank Moraes, himself a distinguished writer. He had his initial schooling in a Catholic Missionary school in India before going to England where he studied English literature in Jesus College, Oxford, during 1956-59. He went to England for the first time when he was sixteen and finally settled in UK having adopted the British citizenship in 1961.

His poetic career began with A Beginning (1957) which immediately earned him rave reviews from critics including Edwin Muir who reviewed it in The New Statesman and he won the prestigious Hawthornden Prize in 1958. This was followed by three more volumes of poetry, Poems (1960), John Nobody (1965) and The Brass Serpent, the last a collection of his translations from Hebrew poetry. His Poems came out in 1966 and Collected Poems appeared in 1969.

A prolific writer, Moraes has also authored quite a few books of prose: Gone Away, The People Time Forgot (1972), The Tempest Within (1972), A Matter of People (1974) and My Son's Father (1968). He was commissioned by the Government of India to write travel books on Goa and Madhya Pradesh. Besides these, he has also edited Voices of Life (a collection of essays), Mrs. Gandhi (1980) and Bombay (1980).

Perhaps the most versatile and outstanding among the post-Independence Indian English poets, Moraes often weaves his poetry around the themes which are personal and intimate. This is why sometimes his poetry is overridden with a confessional tone. But despite this confessional cast, having grown out of the intense tussle between the personal illusion and rude reality. Moraes could succeed in purging his poetry of the subjective idiosyncrasies and translate his personal feelings or experiences through symbolic extrication into poems with an universal appeal. The intermittent bouts of the insanity of his mother compounded the trauma of his excruciating adolescence and this traumatic experience as well as his conscious effort to come to terms with them in his grown up years have put an indelible stamp on his psyche causing the recurrence of the themes of loneliness, insecurity and persecution leading him to seek refuge in wishful erotica or 'self-probing of a tortured soul'. 'His verse often creates a haunted world in which classical, Christian, medieval and fairy tale myths are mixed and dragons and dwarfs, Cain and the unicorn, the tombs of Mycenae and Christ come together'. In this respect Moraes, among his contemporaries writing Indo-English poetry, seems to have the widest span and yet with an imperceptible Coleridgean touch he persuades the reader to share his vision. The bald masseur from Ceylon is 'reborn as Christ' in the poet's mind 'At seven O'clock'. Sometimes, as in his famous poem, 'Voices', he indulges in metaphysical conceits: "In my lady's chamber/Once I found a skull./It helped me to remember/That she was beautiful". His imageries are often sensuous and among the Indian English poets writing today probably his verse has the easiest yet the most natural, rhythmic and controlled flow of language, although of late his endeavour has been to bring a "rougher texture" to his poems. But irrespective of his themes, "whether they are legendary and mythological or contemporaneous and clinical, Dom Moraes turns what he touches into finished art".

MORNING FACE (English) is the second in the sequence of the planned seven-volume autobiographical novel of Mulk Raj Anand to be called Seven Ages of Man. Though written as early as 1926, the 2000-page "long confession" was rejected by publishers and became the source-book of some of his subsequent works and his autobiographical novels. The first part, Seven Summers (1951), chronicles the first seven years of its hero-narrator, Krishan Chander's life. Its sequel, Morning Face, published after seventeen years in 1968 and awarded by the Sahitya Akademi in 1971, records the next six years of Krishan's life from the beginning of World War I to the Jalliwallah Bagh massacre in 1919. Its three parts, "City of Dreadful Nights," "The Prison" and "The Regiment" deal with Krishan's stay respectively at Amritsar, Ludhiana and the Jhelum cantonment. As the story moves in a leisurely manner, numerous details are given of men and women, their customs and manners, their religious, social, economic and political life, and the simmering discontent under the British rule augmented now by cruelty and injustice. Krishan, who too had received seven lashes, is angry at General Dyer's attitude and at the Jalliwallah Bagh massacre.

Basically the novel is about Krishan and his family. In school he knows more English than others, is praised and punished, but is protected by his mother. Gradually, the inquisitive boy with a "morning face" is transformed into a revolutionary. His father's impressive job fails to blind the young lad to his father's avarice and servility. His mother, loving, protective and god-fearing, gives him moral strength when he joins the Gandhian movement. Among the other women at least three, Aunt Devki, Mumtaz and Shakuntala, become sources of his love and protection.

In the matter of religion, Krishan had a choice between the family's faith in Aga Khan, his mother's faith in propitiating evil spirits, his father's inconsistent secular attitude and the fast-spreading Arya Samajist reformist movement. He is anxious, baffled, terrified and finally disgusted. Finding a lot of cruelty in the world he spits out in the direction of the temple. He has the same attitude towards money which caused misery to the poor and the untouchables. The futility of Krishan's search for values and love in life among the money-minded people makes him feel lonely.

Morning Face is a detailed record of experiences and sentiments of Anand's boyhood, recorded in his youthful days and revised during his middle age. While details of many events and places are important and fascinating, some critics have found fault with Anand's use of irrelevant details, and his repetitiveness which could have been minimized. The absence of a good plot and selective details fails to make it a good autobiographical novel.

MOROPANT (Marathi; b. 1729, d. 1794) is perhaps the last of the well-known Pandit poets. He spent the first formative years of his life in the study of Sanskrit classics. Keshavshastri Padhye, his tutor, was a renowned Sanskrit scholar. In 1753 he came to stay at Baramati. It was here that Baburao Naik, a wealthy patron of learning, was to make his life comfortable so that he was free from all worries for the years to come. His family-life thus was very happy and he could devote the remaining years of his life to literary pursuits.

MOTE, HARI VISHNU

His literary output was prodigious. The first decade of his literary career was given to the composition of mythological stories like those of Kusha-Lava, Harishchandra and Pralhad. The second decade started with very simple and beautiful narrative poems like 'Sitagit', 'Rukminigit' and 'Savitritig'. This decade saw the composition of Mantra Ramayana and two lovely shorter poems, 'Sanshaya Ratnavali' and 'Arya Kekavali'. The third decade was devoted to his most ambitious work, Mahabharata. The fourth and last decade was given to the composition of Hari Vansha, Mantra Bhagwat, a hundred or more Mantra Ramayanas Ganga-Stavan and his famous Shlok Kekavali.

He was what in Marathi is known as a pandit-poet of the 'Gaudi school', which was rather artificial, too-ornamental, full of archaic Sanskrit words, the meaning of which was difficult to grasp, for he enjoyed the use of verbose compound structures. 'Yamak' was his favourite 'alamkara' and 'slesh' usually followed the yamak. He frequently used 'anupras'. such alamkaras proclaim richness but the treasures were reserved for those who were well versed in Sanskrit literature of the Gaudi school. The poet, who was himself a pandit, was, as it were, writing for only those who were pandits themselves. Arya (known as Giti in Sanskrit) was his favourite metre and in this respect he differed from his eminent predecessors like Eknath, Mukteshwar and Sridhara, who had excelled in the traditional 'ovi' metre. Arya was his forte and all his ambitious compositions—the abridged versions of all the three Arsha epics, the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata—were composed in the arya metre.

Besides, there are some pieces which ring a different note. The full-throated lyrical note is heard in one of his latter-day compositions, Shlok Kekavali. Its immediate predecessor was Ganga-Stavana and even earlier he had composed Sanshaya Ratnavali and Arya Kekavali, which were in a way simpler versions of Shlok Kekavali. The poet's name, Moropant, is derived from the Marathi word 'Mor', which again is derived from the Sanskrit 'Mayur', meaning a peacock. The yearning cry of the peacock for the rain-soaked cloud is 'Keka'. In this lyrical composition Moropant, aware in his old age that death was approaching fast, is praying to Lord Vishnu to have pity on him and give him 'Mukti' soon. Kekavali throbs with genuine heart-ache and in his abundant literary output, this poem stands out as unique.

Moropant was a unique figure in the annals of the senior Marathi poets. He was basically a story-teller, but a story-teller with a difference. Like Eknath, Mukteshwar and Shridhara, he did not choose to write simply. His expression was ornate, rather cluttered and difficult. His obsession with 'yamak' led him to unwarranted dark labyrinths, where no passage-clues were offered to the simple Marathi reader. And yet in his own way, he was a formidable writer, the last giant of Marathi literature in the pre-British influence era.

M.M.

MOTE, HARI VISHNU (Marathi; b. 1907, d. 1984) was an eminent publisher and autobiographer. He edited Pratibha, a literary magazine now defunct.

Mote lost his parents in childhood and was brought up by his rich uncle, Raosaheb Mote, who was a follower of Lokmanya Tilak and a man of some social standing. Educated at Amraoti and Ujjain upto matriculation, he did two years in a college at Indore, but could not pursue the studies further being a chronic patient of asthma since boyhood. Mote ultimately turned to book-publishing and started his 'Mote Prakashan' in Bombay (1932). Within a short time he took over Pratibha—a fortnightly magazine started by some writers, and became its proprietor-editor (1934).

Though not a writer himself, Mote had a deep literary understanding and taste. During the three years and a half of his editorship the magazine acquired a new shape and prestige. With several new additions of features, illustrations, photographs and special issues, the magazine reached the heights of popularity and earned a name for him.

Mote's greater achievement was his publications. Mote Publication which ran but for a gap of 15 years, till his death, has some outstanding books to its credit. He was a publisher with a difference. He looked out not for the well-known writers, but the unknown, most of whom were his 'finds' and later turned out to be famous. His publications, only 28 in number, have proved to be the landmarks in Marathi literature—Kalyanche nishwas (story collection), Hindolyawar (novel), Ranangan (novel), Bahurupi, Aprakashit Gadkari, Vishrabdha sharada, gavgada, Meech he sangitale pahije, Shejwalkaranche lekh, to name some of them. Thus he made a valuable contribution to the publishing history in Marathi literature.

A multifaceted personality, Mote entered the film-world and squandered all he had in producing 3 films, Gharjawai, Payachi dasi and Vasantsena, in collaboration with Acharya Atre. We get a comprehensive picture of his rich and varied life in his autobiography—the only book he wrote titled Ek sarvamangal Kshipra, published in 2 parts (1980, 1984). Unconventional in style and form, the book makes interesting reading. It partly tells us about Mote the man, and gives us glimpses of various types of personalities—great and small, saintly and villainous—that he came across in his eventful life. The book won for him the V.P. Bnagwat Prize for the best publication in Marathi. Volume II was partly completed by his wife

MOTI SUKHRAMDAS SHARMA 'PRAKASH'—MOTICHANDRA

Krishnabai Mote, a writer herself, and published posthumously (1984).

I.S.

MOTI SUKHRAMDAS SHARMA 'PRAKASH' (Sindhi; b. 1931) was born in a Brahmin family at Daro, a small village in Thatta district in Sindh, and had his education there upto the primary level.

His father, Sukhramdas Sharma, was a village postmaster, and this turned out to be a boon for young Moti, who had free access to the post that reached the village. He used to take away the Sindhi magazines, Gulistan, Pushp, Ratan, etc., and read them before they were delivered to the subscribers. This kindled in the young heart love for writing and he began contributing tit bits to the magazines at the age of 12.

Young Moti was fascinated by nature and its wondrous manifestations. He loved the trees, the birds, the gardens, the rivers.

After having completed his primary education, he shifted to Karachi for higher studies. His interest in literary pursuits continued to grow. In collaboration with two young friends he ventured a childrens' magazine entitled B'al sandesh.

After the Independence, his family migrated to Bombay, where he continued his studies in the K.J. Khilnani High School (Dadar). In the mean time a writers' literary circle, Nav Sahit Mandal, later on renamed Sindhi Sahit Mandal, had been organised for the purpose of promotion of Sindhi language and literature in Bombay. The Mandal became the nucleus of creative literary activities and attracted all the senior as well as budding writers. Moti Prakash attended regularly the weekly literary gatherings. Moti Prakash again turned to publishing. In collaboration with his friend, Thakur Chawla, he brought out a monthly, Sohini, which for many years remained popular with the reading public.

In the 40s and the 50s progressive thoughts dominated the Sindhi literary scene. Moti was greatly influenced by the progressive movement and his commitment to 'literature for life's sake' remains firm and unambiguous till today. He also remains dedicated to the movement popularly known as 'Sindhyat' for the promotion of Sindhi language, literature and culture.

In the 50s, when All India Radio introduced its Sindhi Service from the Bombay station, Moti Prakash was in charge of the programme for over a decade and worked hard to make the programme popular. Similarly his contribution in pioneering Sindhi drama is laudable. In the year 1960, he organised a dramatic group, Sindhi Kala Mandir, in cooperation with the old veteran of the film world, Bud'o Ad'vani. Sindhi Kala Mandir laid the foundation for the development of Sindhi drama in India after the partition and under the able guidance of Moti Prakash as its secretary the Mandir set a record of achievements on the Sindhi stage.

Moti Prakash, after having graduated in the Arts, took to teaching in the same K.J. Khilnani High School and served the institution for many years as the principal, before he accepted the post of the head of the Indian High School in Dubai, where he is at present serving in the same capacity.

Moti Prakash is basically a poet, and yet a versatile writer, who has successfully tried his hand at almost every branch of literature. He holds an equally facile pen in both prose and poetry. His contribution to the Sindhi Literature is substantial. Fourteen titles are there to his credit: two books of verses, two full-length plays, two pen-portraits of unknown personalities, two collections of essays, one novel, one travelogue, one Ph.D. thesis and four translation works. His works include: Andhero ujalo (novel, 1954); Adabi gula (essays, 1957), Aau ta choriyun chang (poems, 1959), Raat hika toofan ji (full-length play, 1963), Dil jun g'alhiyun (reflections, 1972), Parde ag'yan—parde puthyan (full-length play, 1975), Chininga vich chole (poems, 1983), D'ithe d'inhan thiyam (pen-portraits, 1985), Se sabh sandhyan saaha seen (travelogue, 1987), Sindhi shaira mein istria jo chitu (Ph.D. thesis, 1988). Translation: Addena (novel from Tajikistani, 1952), Kalindi (novel by Taranshanker Banerjee 1952), Kako-kalu (Three Men in a Boat, 1958), Under Secretary (play by Romesh Mehta, 1960).

Moti Prakash has received several awards for his accomplishments in the literary and educational fields. In 1965, he was awarded the first prize at All India Radio's Patriotic Lyrics competition. In 1975, NCERT gave him an award for his manuscript of children's poems, Gulran ja gita. He received citation and a cash prize of Rs. 10,000/- for his contribution to Sindhi literature by Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli Ain Sahit Sabha, in the year 1986. He was selected for the national award for Teachers for 1988 for his dedicated services in the field of education. He also received the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1988 for his book Se sabh sandhyan saaha seen (I hold them in my breath), a travelogue—journey through his old beloved home land Sindh—which is intensely touching and absorbing.

MOTICHANDRA (Hindi; b. 1909), doyen of Indology and archaeology, was born at Varanasi in the family of Bhartaendu Harishchandra, the pioneer of modern age in Hindi. He was educated at Varanasi and London, and appointed Director of the Prince of Wales Museum, Bombay during the British rule.

Motichandra studied in depth Sanskrit, Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha languages and culled from them the date which throws light on the archaeological remains of many ancient sites in India. His important books in this field are Prachin Bharatiya veshbhusha, Saarthvaah, Kashi ka itihās, and Sringar hat. The last one is a translation of four Sanskrit farces (Bhāna) with the help of Vasudevsaran Agrawal. The outstanding characteristic of these works is the integration, for the first time, of the three streams of culture, history, archaeology of India.

In his Prachin Bharatiya veshbhusha the writer presents in a chronological order the evolution of clothes and dresses amongst Indian people from the prehistoric time to the seventh century. The details are collected from observation of idols found in excavations, figures carved out in the stones and walls of temples, artistic paintings, and ancient coins. An attempt is also made to name these dresses on the testimony of the Vedas, Puranas, Sanskrit epics, Pali Tripitakas and other books in Prakrit and Apabhramsha.

Saarthavah is written on the traditional lines of 'Path paddhati'. In the twelve chapters of this book an attempt has been made to furnish a detailed account of the trading classes visiting foreign lands by sea from time immemorial. The leader of such sea-travels was called Saarthvaah who kept his crew safe from the perils of journey. We are told that Indian ships went as far as Rome, Greece, Camboj, Srilanka and China.

Sringar hat is a unique achievement in both Sanskrit and Hindi literatures. This is a collection of four Sanskrit farces known as Chaturbhāni, written in the last decade of the 4th century. This work depicts the lives of both the prostitutes who led an ostentatious life and the amorous wits who led a life of cunning.

Kashi ka itihās is an interesting work based on the history and culture of Kashi. Further, his translation of Vishnu Sharma's Panchatantra also contributes to the enrichment of Hindi literature.

V.A.

MOTILAL JOTWANI (Sindhi; b. 1936) is an eminent scholar, fiction writer and poet. He did his M.A. in 1962 from the University of Delhi. He joined Deshbandhu College, Delhi as a lecturer in 1965, and was subsequently promoted as Senior Lecturer. Earlier, he worked with All India Radio as a programmer. Besides doing Hindi Prabhakar and Diploma in Journalism from Panjab University in 1954 and 1959 respectively, he did his Ph.D. from the University of Delhi 1973. His doctoral work, Shah Abdul Latif: His Life and Works (A study of socio-cultural and literary situations in eighteenth century Sindh, now in Pakistan), published by the University of Delhi in 1975, won him critical acclaim and took him to Harvard University for his post-doctoral work on Indian Sufism during the academic year 1979-80. He was honoured among others for his services to Hindi literature at Vishwa Hindi Sammelan, Nagpur, 1975.

His works in Sindhi include Khayala (Thoughts, a collection of essays, 1960), Alankara ain chhanda (Rhetorics and prosody, 1965), Parampara-hina (The traditionless, a collection of short stories, 1970), Narangi traffic light te (At the amber traffic light, a short novel, 1974), Samb'andhani je sarakuni te (On the highways of relations, a collection of poems, 1982), Ihe rishta nata (These relationships, a short novel, 1982). His latest publication is a collection of short stories entitled Kotha (Invitation, 1987).

His Narangi traffic light te is a significant work that registers the impact of fast changing values in our society and yet does not overlook the moral base of human relationships. His Ihe rishta nata portrays a character, who is caught in the complex situations of contemporary life and feels himself to be alienated from his close relations. The imagery in his poems compiled in Samb'andhani je sarakuni te is derived from the real life situations and the poems seem to have a direct dialogue with the readers.

In the field of Hindi letters, Jotvani contributed 'Sindhi sahitya' to the Government of India volume Bharatiya bhashaon ke sahitya ka sankashipta itihāsa (A brief history of the literature of Indian languages, 1974) and published Sindhi bhasha, lipi aur sahitya (Sindhi language, script and literature, 1966). The revised enlarged edition of the latter was brought out in 1978. Author of a collection of lyrical prose pieces entitled Chand ke gita (Songs of the moon, 1961), he has also published the Hindi versions of his short stories and novels.

Besides the work on Shah Abdul Latif, his other works in English include Shah Abdul Karim: A Mystic Poet of Sindh (1970) and Sindhi Literature and Society (1979). He has edited Contemporary Indian Literature and Society (1979), in which are given authentic accounts of 16 national literatures of India, bringing out the essentially one Indian mind and pointing to the one single Indian literature. Also, he has contributed his writings to the special numbers of journals and book-projects of national importance.

M.K.J.

MOUNI (Tamil; b. 1907), the well-known pseudonym of S. Mani, means 'The silent one', and he has been true to that name by observing an ascetic strictness and silence. Besides a novellette which was lost at the manuscript stage, he has written about twenty-four short stories. Some of his stories have been translated into English. 'Born of Death' in New Writing in India (ed. Adil Jussawala, Penguin) another story in Sameeksha (1970) a magazine edited by M. Govindan, and 'The Loss of Identity' in Tamii Short Stories edited by K.N. Subramaniam (Vikas, 1980).

MOVEMENTS, LITERARY-ASSAMESE

He has been called 'a writers' writer in the best sense of that much abused term' by K.N. Subramaniam. He has developed interest in metaphysical literature and philosophy. He has shunned politics, though a persistent fighter against any kind of totalitarianism. As K.N. Subramaniam says, 'His stories try to do almost the impossible in Tamil'. 'Born of Death' is a typical Mouni story—a serious but a casual and momentary grasp of reality—it has the randomness and the irregular rhythm of life itself—like the train journey which provides the basic metaphor of the story as well as the framework for the plot. It is the story of an old man, Subbaiyer, who is returning home abruptly with his twenty-year-old wife Gowri from her father's house after attending a marriage. A young man joins them and sits before them and the story beautifully weaves a web of psychic tension linking these three: the old man's fears, the young girl's anxiety and agony and the young man's desires. In a very casual way the author makes the old man identify himself with the young man—his name is also 'Subbhu' and he says 'It is as though you were me'. The girl, Gowri, feels earlier that 'the old man and the young seemed to merge as they grappled for her soul'. Youth and old age, like Life and Death or creation and destruction are seen as two aspects of the same, and Gowri is linked with Lokmata, primitive matrix of the whole world, whereas Subbhiar, Subbhu and Subbini, another young man whom Gowri should have married, seem to be aspects of the power signified by the serpent. More than the mythological significance is the profound psychology which identifies these characters in a mysterious way. This story and 'The Loss of Identity' are good examples to illustrate his ability to blend the metaphysical and the psychological in his writings. Though his output is small, his achievement as well as influence on the younger writers is remarkable.

Mouni's short stories are now available in two volumes under the title, Mouni kathaigal (Vol I & II).

K.C.

MOVEMENTS, LITERARY (Assamese). There was no conscious and deliberate literary movement before the last quarter of the nineteenth century. But that does not mean that there was no literary upsurge before the nineteenth century. With the emergence of the regional languages in different parts of India as media of literary expression, the tendency to shift to the regional languages gradually became more and more pronounced. There is a popular saying about Kabir that he compared the Sanskrit language with the stagnant water of a well and the spoken languages with the flowing water of a stream. When Sanskrit and Prakrit languages became obsolete and unintelligible to the masses, a section of scholars and religious-minded people felt the need to enlighten the masses about the literary and religious heritage of India by translating and adapting epics and puranas to their respective spoken languages. The neo-Vaishnavite movement which swept over the entire length and breadth of India in the late medieval period brought in its wake an urge to educate and edify the common men. This all-India phenomenon is also noticed in Assam since the beginning of the fourteenth century. Writers and poets like Hemasaraswati, Kaviratnasaraswati, Madhava Kandali and Harivara Bipra of the fourteenth century successfully initiated the move to render ancient classics into Assamese verse. The neo-Vaishnavite movement sponsored by Shankaradeva in the early part of the sixteenth century added a new momentum and velocity to the writers' desire and urge to acquaint people with the Vaishnavite teachings and ideals through poetry, plays, biographies of religious personalities and occasionally by rendering epics and puranic episodes into prose. The ideal of the Vaishnava writers is clearly expressed in the remarks of Damodaradeva and Ananta Kandali, two of the Vaishnava stalwarts of the sixteenth century. The former instructed his scholarly disciple, Vaikunthanatha Bhagavata-Bhattacharya, to translate the entire Bhagavata-purana in simple Assamese prose so that non-Brahmins and women could understand the contents. Similarly, Ananta Kandali expressed his purpose of writing in the mother tongue in these words: "I can write fluent verses in Sanskrit, but even then I have preferred to write Assamese verses for the edification of the sudras and womenfolk." A galaxy of scholars and poets came out of their scholarly books or hibernation. The neo-Vaishnavite movement ushered in a sort of Renaissance in literature, music, dance and craft, though that regeneration was mainly a devotion-oriented one. Apart from the religious literature derived from the epics, the puranas and other devotional literature, secular subjects were not totally neglected. Chronicles, Raja-vamsavalis, works on political ethics, astrology and astronomy, medicine etc. were also written by competent scholars. The efflorescence of literature was not due to the conscious effort of the writers to enrich Assamese literature. It was rather a by-product of the devotional Reformation movement. The salient features of this literature are the monotheistic belief, absolute surrender of the self to the deity (Vishnu), The singing and reciting the glorious deeds of the deity, equality of all devotees irrespective of castes and creeds and detached action (nishkama karma) in the name of God. The poets, however, did not restrain their imagination in embellishing their works with poetic description of situations, natural beauty and characterisation.

The tidal wave of the Vaishnava movement somewhat receded towards the end of the seventeenth century and as a result the literature produced henceforth became stale, unimaginative and imitative. This phase of literature continued its moribund existence till the beginning of the nineteenth century and ultimately died a natural death with the coming of the British. The British occupation paved the way for the emergence of a new brand of literature which derived its main inspiration from the West.

Modern Assamese literature owes its beginning to the literary activities of the missionaries of the American Baptist Mission, the first batch of which arrived in Assam in 1836, the year in which the Bengali language was imposed in schools and courts. It is to be remembered that the policies of Assam Administration were determined by the Government of Bengal till 1873, when Assam was formally declared a separate Province under the Chief Commissioner. The imposition of Bengali raised a storm of protest in Assam and a few forward-looking Assamese headed by the Christian Missionary leaders like Nathon Brown and Miles Bronson initiated a language movement for the replacement of Bengali by Assamese. Although it was not a literary movement, it created an environment for literary production also. The first monthly magazine Arunodai (1846) in Assamese was started by the missionaries in which, besides the stories of the Bible and messages of the Christian religion, information about the western world as well as that of India and Assam was published. Progressive Assamese youngmen like Anandaram Dhenkial Phukan, Hemchandra Barua, Gunabhiram Barua, Jaduram Barua, and Nidhi Devi Farwell contributed to the magazine and helped the missionaries in their attempt to restore and develop the Assamese language by publishing text books, the Bible, a grammar, a lexicon and story books in Assamese. Although it was primarily a language movement, it boosted the cause of literary development in Assamese.

The real movement for the development of a genuine creative literature was started in the eighties of the last century. As there was no seat of higher learning in Assam in the last century, students desirous of prosecuting higher studies had to proceed to Calcutta. Assamese students and residents of Calcutta formed a literary association in 1866 with a view to improving the language and literature by introducing ideas, ideals, literary trends and forms from two sources. The Bengal Renaissance of the nineteenth century ushered in by the cultural activities of Raja Rammohun Roy, Ishwarchandra Vidyasagar, Madhusudan Dutt, Bankimchandra Chatterjee, Nabinchandra Sen, Hemchandra Banerjee and others greatly impressed the educated Assamese young men on the one hand and on the other, the romantic English poets and dramatists of England exerted a great influence. The philosophical writings of Hume, Bentham and Comte influenced their views to a considerable extent. The literary association or club established in 1866 could not make much headway as the number of members was limited. The number of students considerably increased during the last two decades of the last century. With a view to invigorating the tardy growth of their literature, the students and Assamese residents of Calcutta established a new broad-based society known as the Assamese Language Improvement Society with the Assamese equivalent Asamiya Bhasar Unnati Sadhini Sabha in 1888 at the initiative of Lakshminath Bezbarua, Hemchandra Goswami and Chandrakumar Agarwala who are known as trimurti (Trinity) of the modern Assamese literature. The objectives of this Society were clearly laid down in 1889 in the first issue of its literary monthpiece Jonaki. This magazine continued to be published till the first few years of the current century, albeit with a break of four or five years. The main objectives laid down were to prepare a scientific dictionary of the Assamese language and a grammar to collect old Assamese manuscripts and to encourage production of creative works like drama, novel and poetry on modern lines. In addition to the inspiration received from the contemporary Bengali literature, these budding poets, dramatists and novelists of Assam derived inspiration Shakespeare and the English Romantics whose impact on Assamese literature of this period was deep and abiding. The movement started with the successful translation of Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors in 1888. The mystic-lyrical poetry of Chandrakumar Agarwala, the patriotic and the sensuous love-poetry of Bezbarua and Hemchandra Goswami, the ecstatic Nature poetry of Raghunath Choudhury, the sad but sweet lyrics of Jatindranath Dowra, the longer narrative poetry and sonnets of Hiteswar Barbarua, the rollicking fun and humour of S.N. Bezbarua, the historical novels of Rajanikanta Bardoloi and historical plays and social farces of the period are the legacy of the romantic tidal waves that swept over the literary beach of Assam from 1888 to 1940. These literary pioneers introduced all the elements and forms of the English romantic period.

With the establishment of the National Congress Organisation in Assam in 1919 and the visit of Mahatma Gandhi in 1921, the spirit of patriotism and the urge for freedom from the foreign yoke began to inspire a section of the poets and writers. The newspapers, notably the Asam Bilasini, the Asamiya (1918-1957) and the Batari (1919-1940) and the magazines, notably Chetana (1919-1926), played a conspicuous role in diffusing the Congress ideals among the people. Revolutionary and patriotic poetry and plays were written to arouse nationalistic sentiment to the chagrin of the rulers. Revolutionary poems of Ambikagiri Raichoudhury, Prasannalal Choudhury, Binandachandra Barua, Jyotiprasad Agarwala and others gave a turn to the literary trends so long prevalent.

Then the Second World War came to the very door-steps of Assam in 1940. Assam became the war-base of the allied powers in their desperate struggle against the Japanese. The corruption, the near-famine condition and the loss of integrity, and other concomitant vices entirely changed the outlook of the younger generation of writers. They raised the banner of revolt against romantic escapism. Some of them were inspired by the Marxist ideal of society. This socio-realistic tendency first found expression in the poems and writings of a batch of younger poets headed by Amulya Barua, Bhavananda Datta and Hem Barua, published in the monthly magazine Jayanti (1936-1949). The movement thus started in the forties gradually gained momentum through the next important monthly Ramdhenu (1951-1964). This magazine is mainly responsible for introducing contemporary trends of European poetry starting from T.S. Eliot down to Pablo Neruda. Their poetry does not express a logical sequence of thought as noticed in earlier poetry, nor do their words or vocables confine themselves to expressing only the dictionary meaning. This new brand of poetry is the fusion of the conscious and the sub-conscious elements of experience or impression of the poet. It harmonises the imagination, the intellect and the emotion of the poets. Symbolism, impressionism, expressionism and imagism as noticed in European poetry, Latin American poetry and the 'haiku' poetry of Japan made great impact on the modern poets. The modern Bengali poets like Jibanananda Das, Sudhin Datta, Buddhadev Basu and their successors are equally read with avidity by the modern Assamese poets. As a result, modern Assamese poetry became the cynosure of a limited number of poetry-lovers. Old verse-forms have been totally discarded and are being replaced by sprung verse, rhythmic prose and vers libre. During the fifties this new poetry was in the experimental stage, but now it is firmly established as the medium of new poetry. In the field of fiction and drama, the presentation has undergone a radical change. Brecht, Ionesco, Beckett, Pirandello, Williams, Gogol and many others including Vijay Tendulkar, Girish Karnad and Sambhu Mitra have fired the imagination of the Assamese dramatists. In fiction, the old method of story-telling and plot construction are being discarded giving precedence to analysis and social awareness of the writers.

MOVEMENTS, LITERARY (Gujarati). The influence of the British educational system on the medieval thinking and living brought in an era of enlightenment and reformation. Particularly, in the presence of English learning and literature, the medieval Gujarati literary forms and material proved obsolete. As in other walks of life, so in literature, the reformist movement tried vehemently to absorb the new air. For the first time prose became an important medium of literature. Religiously centred objective and collective expressions gave way to personal emotions, and intimate love took place of devotional renderings. Nevertheless the initial outcome was crude and rudimentary. Social responsibility and message remained dominant. In spite of the pioneering ventures by Narmad, Dalpatram, Navalram, Nandshankar and a few others, they could not prevent much of their writings from becoming the vehicle of social advancement. The English models prevailed above all.

Obviously, it gave, in reaction, a rise to the revival movement. The writers turned to their own roots and culture, adhered strongly to erudition, adapted models from Sanskrit and Persian also, strove more for the aesthetic achievements, showing apparent predilection for the ideal and the sublime, instead of the common and the mundane. The novel Saraswatchandra by Govardhanram Tripathi, the Khandkavya Vasantvijay by Kant, the elegy Smaransanhita by Narsinhrao Divetia, the verse drama Jayajayant by Nanalal, the sonnet series by Balavantraï Thakor were the representative classic outcome of this entire effort.

But this revival movement ultimately culminated in the highly sentimental and ornate language as well as in the extreme idealization and Platonism. Hence, the successive Gandhian movement found an opportunity to disburden the weight and it shifted over to the simple language, to the common themes and ordinary occurrences. It got concerned about the poor and the downtrodden. All its energy was directed to depicting universalism and brotherhood. The poets like Umashankar Joshi, Sundaram and Meghani, the essayist like Kaka Kalelkar, the critic like Ramnarayan Pathak, the novelist like Ramanlal Desai generously contributed to the development in this direction.

Between this committed Gandhian movement and the modernist movement of the sixties, a short span of aesthetic movement ruled over the Gujarati literature. In other words, it was a prelude to the modernist movement. It aimed at soft emotions, light, adorning and elusory sensuousness. The prevailing model was of Rabindranath Tagore's writings. Prahlad Parekh was the pioneer. His anthology of poems, Bari Bahar, broke open a new vista. The poets like Rajendra Shah and Niranjana Bhagat were the major voices of this cult.

Around 1960, the modernist movement took its firm roots. Till then, the Gujarati literature was only exposed to continental sensibility, but it did not respond actively. Suresh Joshi's creative participation and critical insight changed the course thoroughly. Formalism, Symbolism, Surrealism, Cubism, and other western movements with the existential agony pervaded the whole of literary field. Modernist devices such as wild deviations, wilful distortions, stiff abstractions, large omissions and forcible fragmentations deliberately disturbed the channel of direct communication. Sitanshu Yashashchandra, Labhashankar Thakar, Madhu Rai, Kishor Jadav, Radheshyam Sharma contributed significantly to the growth of modernism.

In the end, it is noted that during the last few years, the 'Dalit' movement from the neighbouring state, Maharashtra, is actively working and striving for the socially committed and participatory literature.

MOVEMENTS, LITERARY-HINDI

MOVEMENTS, LITERARY (Hindi). Bhakti movement is the first major movement in the Indian cultural life. It was more than a literary movement. Hindi bhakti literature (15th to 17th century) is the result of a broad-based socio-cultural movement. Alwar saints are considered to be the pioneers of this movement, and it was Ramanand who gave it a social base. The movement had several sub-currents as it embraced the whole of North India—Nirgun (Jnanmarg; Kabir; Premmarg; Malik Muhammad Jayasi), and Sagun (Rambhakti: Tulsidas; Krishnabhakti: Surdas). The Nirgun bhakti movement appears to have been more revolutionary as it directly attacked the feudal pattern of society. However, the main stress of the movement was on absolute faith in God and oneness of human community. As a literary movement it mainly contributed to the development of the two dialects, Braj and Awadhi, as poetic languages.

Chhayavad, Pragativad, Prayogvad, Nayi Kavita, Akavita, Pratibaddh Kavita, Nayi Kahani, Yuval Khan or Sathottari Sahitya and Janvadi Sahitya are some of the other literary movements which have a historical relevance. Some of these faded before acquiring a mature form or a clear perspective.

Chhayavad (1918-1936) is a major poetic movement regarded mostly as a romantic revival in Hindi poetry. The term originated in 1920 when Mukutdhara Pandey published a series of four essays, 'Hindi mein chhayavad' in the journal, Shrisharada, published from Jabalpur. In 1921, Sushilkumar wrote an article in Saraswati on Chhayavad, calling it an ambiguous poetic form. Acharya Ramchandra Shukla held that the Chhayavad yug was the offshoot of the mystic and symbolist poetry of Rabindranath Tagore, while Jaishankar 'Prasad' emphasised the Indian roots of the movement. Prasad, Sumitranandan Pant, Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala' and Mahadevi Verma are major chhayavadi poets. Chhayavad has also been defined as a product of the freedom movement and the cultural renaissance in modern India. Chhayavad evolved a new poetic diction which has sensuous imagery and complex emotionalism. Ansu, Lahar, Kamayani, Aansu ki balika, Badal, Ektara, Nauka vihar, Ram ki shakti puja, Saroj smriti, Van bela, Tulsidas are the significant examples reflecting different trends in chhayavad.

The term pragativad came into use in 1936. It also had its roots in chhayavad. Pragativad was a broad literary movement with a distinct ideology and aesthetics. It was both a form of creative literature and a standard of literary criticism. The concept of progressive literature took shape at the first session of Progressive Writers' Association held in Paris under the Chairmanship of E.M. Forster. The very next year the Indian session of Progressive Writers' Association was held under the chairmanship of Premchand at Lucknow. Pragativad has a definite ideological base of Marxism, but in Hindi creative writing it reflects rather the Indian social reality. It urges that literature could be used as a medium for a social change in favour of the masses. Poets like Nagarjun, Trilochan, Kedarnath Agrawal show a common peasant sensibility. In fiction Pragativad is reflected in the works of Premchand and Yashpal. Prominent pragativadi critics include Ramvilas Sharma, Shivdansingh Chauhan and Namwar Singh. It is a growing literary movement even today.

Prayogvad is also a poetic movement. Tar saptak (1934, ed. Agyeya) is the first publication of poems in which Agyeya used the term 'Prayog' in a particular sense. It was a formalistic problem before him, the problem of poetic communication and expression of a complex reality. Tar saptak included progressives also (e.g. Ramvilas Sharma), but it was mostly Agyeya, who defined the poetics of prayogvad. Another phase of prayogvad came into existence as Nakenvad. Nalinvilochan Sharma and Kesarikumar disagreed with Agyeya on certain formal issues, but their approach was strictly formalistic. Prayogvad does not accept any ideological restraint. It believes in total individual freedom. Dusara saptak (1951, ed. Agyeya) developed the trend with the poems of Dharmvir Bharati, Raghuvir Sahai, Shamsheerbahadur Singh, etc.

Prayogvad lost its relevance when Tisara saptak (ed. Agyeya) was published in 1959. It represents the trend of Nayi kavita without explanation. Kedarnath Singh, Kunwar Narayan, Vijaydev Narain Sahi, Sarveshwar Doyal Saxena are not experiments. They are significant poets to define and support the new Poetry Movement. They have a mature understanding of the new human situation and a more communicative poetic form. This movement got its force from a journal Nayi Kavita (ed. Jagdish Gupta and Vijaydeo Narayan Sahi) which explored the possibilities of the New Poetry movement.

Akavita was a pseudo-poetic movement whose pioneers, Jagdish Chaturvedi, Shyam Parmar, Saumitra Mohan, posed to be anti-establishment, non-traditional and anti moralists. But the result was an obsession with nudity and obscure surrealistic expressionism.

Pratibaddha kavita made its impact on Hindi for some time. Its exponents opposed the aimless protest-phenomenon in writing. It defined the relationship between poetry and politics in a new perspective. Dhumil, Jaguri, Gyanendrapati and Manglesh Dabral are some of the important poets who belonged to this movement.

Nayi kahani is accepted as a literary movement in Hindi short story. Its important writers are Phanishwar-nath 'Renu', Mohan Rakesh, Rajendra Yadav, Kamleshwar, Markandeya, Shivprasad Singh, Amar Kant, Mannu Bhandari and Nirmal Verma. Its exponents like Kamleshwar felt that there was a new challenge to face in post-Independence India. The social value-pattern had undergone a sudden change. The rural-based social reality was itself a new challenge to short story writers. 'Tisari kasam' (Renu), 'Raja Nirbansiya' (Kamleshwar), 'Pan phul', 'Mahue ka per' (Markandeya), 'Gadal' (Rangeya Raghav) are some of the examples which reflect the social aesthetics of nayi kahani. Sachetan kahani, Samantar kahani are some other trends in the history of Hindi short story.

Yuva lekhan or Sathottari sahitya distinguished as a literary movement during the last two decades (1960-80). In a way Pratibaddha kavita and Sathottari kahani are part of this movement. Poets like Dhumil share the challenge to the new social reality with such short story writers as Kashinath Singh, Gyanranjan, Dudhnath Singh and Ravindra Kaliya. Again, Srikant Verma and Rajkamal Chaudhari represent a non-confirmist attitude associated with this movement. A series of three essays (by Kedar-nath Singh, Ajit Kumar and Parmanand Srivastava) on San sath ke baad ki Hindi kavita, published in Dharmyug in 1965, was the first serious attempt at defining the Sathottari movement.

Janvadi sahitya is a later development in the seventies. It has its roots in the progressive movement of pragativad. With a crisis in the political faith of the Left, the Janvadi writers want to make their own identity different from that of the Progressives. They have their own view of revolutionary writing and are strictly opposed to any kind aestheticism or formalism.

MOYINKUTTY VAIDYAR (Malayalam; b. 1851, d. 1891). Well known as the author of a popular ballad, Badr pada pattu, written in a mixture of Arabic and Malayalam, Moyinkutty Vaidyar belonged to an illustrious Muslim family in Malappuram district. He learnt Malayalam from a local abecedarian and Sanskrit and Ayurveda from his father, who was an Ayurvedic physician. Later he studied Tamil as well. His works reveal that he was not only well acquainted with but also influenced by the works of the great Malayalam poets Cherusseri, Ezhuttacchan and Kunchan Nambiar.

Vaidyar's principal poetical works are the following: Badrul Munir, Huznul Jamal (1871); Badr pada pattu (1875); Vahadu pada (1878); Malappuram pattu (1885); and Hijra pattu (1891).

The first is a long narrative poem based on a Persian love story with Badr-ul-Munir, the son of the Khalif of Azmir, and Huzrul Jamal, the daughter of the Khalif's minister, figuring as the heroⁿ and heroine respectively. The poet takes the lovers and the readers through an astounding variety of scenes and episodes full of hazards. The lovers are at last united in holy wedlock in a kind of fairyland. Thereupon the Khalif recalls the couple, makes Munir his successor and leaves the place in search of eternal peace. The work shows the poet's power of describing scenes, depicting different sentiments and using a number of metres with extraordinary success.

While this poem provoked some opposition because of the sentiment of amour portrayed in it, the second one, Badr pada pattu, evoked universal approval among the Muslims of the day by rousing their theistic and heroic qualities. The theme of the poem is an armed conflict between Muslims and a group of non-Muslims, which took place at Badr in the second year of the Hijra Era. The poet is at his best in this war song, which is marked by felicitous phrases and rhythmic patterns. Yet Malayalees may find it a little difficult to enjoy the poem because of the rather high percentage of Arabic words. The poem is sprinkled with a few prose passages also.

Vahadu pada deals with another battle. Malappuram pattu is a historically important poem revealing the poet's national consciousness. Hijra pattu, as the term implies, attempts to describe the prophet's flight from Mecca but has not been completed.

P.N.K.

MRICHCHHAKATIKA (Sanskrit) is a play in ten acts with a social theme set in a realistic atmosphere. Technically it is a prakarana natya which requires a brahmin or merchant hero and kulastri or ganika as the heroine. Shudraka's Charudatta is a brahmin by birth and a merchant by profession. The heroine is Vasantasena, a courtesan; but there is also a kulastri, the wife of Charudatta, Arya Dhuta. As required in theory, Shudraka keeps them apart. Shudraka also brings in the world of gamblers with appropriate characters and action, making the play a samkirna or mixed prakarana.

Shudraka paints his picture on a vast canvas and presents a complex plot. The principal theme is the love between Charudatta and Vasantasena. There are two sub-plots in the story: the love-affair of a brahmin youth Sharvilaka and Vasantasena's maid Madanika, whom Sharvilaka is trying to buy off in order to marry her; the other sub-plot concerns a political revolution in Ujjayini in which the rebels are attempting to overthrow the tyrant king Palaka and install Gopaladaraka Aryaka on the throne. Despite the complicated plot-structure, the three threads are skillfully interwoven and the story is well-organised and unified.

Charudatta and Vasantasena had met in the Cupid's temple in the city during a festival. Vasantasena fell in love with Charudatta. But the fulfilment could neither be smooth nor straight. Vasantasena was born a courtesan, denied respectable social status, and her protestations of love, however sincere and noble, would always be suspect due to the stigma of her profession. Secondly, Charudatta was a serious young man and was not likely to respond to love openly. Besides, he had been reduced to poverty by his acts of generosity and public philanthropy and had nothing to offer to Vasantasena except his name and renown. Charudatta's poverty was, in a way, a blessing in disguise for Vasantasena, though she had to fight hard to convince Charudatta of her sincere love and winning her way to respectability against the social and religious code. But there was another complication. Shakara, the low-born brother-in-law of king Palaka, was lusting for Vasantasena. He was pursuing her relentlessly, and fortified by royal favour, his overtures of love carried a menace.

Vasantasena gets an opportunity to visit Charudatta when she seeks the shelter of his house to escape the pursuit of Shakara on a dark night. She leaves her ornaments with Charudatta. Unfortunately these ornaments are stolen by Sharvilaka who wanted money to buy the freedom of Vasantasena's maid Madanika whom he wanted to marry. Madanika persuades Sharvilaka to return the ornaments to Vasantasena posing as Charudatta's messenger. Charudatta on his part sends Maitreya to Vasantasena with a precious jewel-necklace to replace the lost ornaments. Vasantasena seizes this opportunity to visit Charudatta in a thundering storm and rain and spends the night in his house. The next morning she finds Charudatta's little son Rohita crying because he has only a clay-cart while the neighbour's boy is playing with a golden cart. Vasantasena takes the child in her lap and fills his toy cart with her ornaments. This incident, which has given the play its title, the little clay-cart (mrid-shakatika) filled with Vasantasena's jewels, symbolises her acceptance in Charudatta's household and is an augury of new life.

Charudatta had fixed a rendezvous to meet Vasantasena in the old garden on the outskirts of the city. Vasantasena enters Shakara's cart by mistake. When she arrives in the old garden the frustrated Shakara strangles her, covers her body with leaves and runs away fearing her to be dead. Aryaka mounts into Charudatta's car escaping from Palaka's prison and Charudatta is unable to keep his appointment with Vasantasena. The diabolical Shakara brings the charge of Vasantasena's murder on Charudatta. Circumstantial evidence of a woman's dead body in the old garden, discovery of Vasantasena's ornaments with Maitreya and Charudatta's refusal to reveal his movements in order to protect Aryaka, all goes against him and he is sentenced to death.

Luckily Vasantasena had only swooned away. A Buddhist monk, whom she had formerly helped to pay off his gambling debts and who was now living in a nearby monastery, sees her and helps her to recover. The timely arrival of Vasantasena at the place of execution saves Charudatta's life as also of his wife who was about to perform the act of sati.

In the meantime the political revolution succeeds. Sharvilaka kills Palaka; Aryaka is proclaimed the new king. Charudatta pardons Shakara. Aryaka bestows the noble title of Kulavadhu on Vasantasena. The near-tragedy turns into an occasion of rejoicing for all.

Mrichchhakatika as a play is unique in a number of ways. In the range of classical Sanskrit drama, which generally revolves round the love-life of a king-hero, with its inevitable atmosphere of court intrigues and harem jealousies, the prakarana drama breathes a different and fresh air of social realism. Bhavabhuti's Malatimadhava is also a prakarana; but he is tempted to paint it in colours of the supernatural, of yogic and magical practices, and overdo the sentiments. Shudraka bypasses many conventional rules of dramaturgy and shows such unusual scenes as the nocturnal pursuit of a girl by lustful men, street-fights of gamblers, open quarrel and abuse between king's guards and between the contestants in a court of law, house-breaking and theft, sleep scene, murder and parade of the accused through city streets, and a scene of sati. Even the angle of love is different, because the heroine is a young woman who pursues her young man and goes to meet him in pouring rain, thunder and darkness.

Shudraka's characters are drawn from real life and show an amazing range of human nature. Shakara's servant who jumps down from the terrace in his chains in order to give true evidence about the murder to save Charudatta's life; Madanika who is prepared to sacrifice her freedom out of devotion and love for Vasantasena; the executioners who apologise to Charudatta before lifting their hatchet; the police officer who refuses to recognise personal factors in the discharge of his duty; the gambler Darduraka who cheerfully displays his tattered garment full of holes, and is as ready to fight other people's disputes as jumps into the political revolution; the bohemian youth Sharvilaka who leads the revolution but finds time to break into a house to get the money to redeem his girl of bonded slavery; the silent but magnanimous Charudatta who accepts the love of a courtesan and goes to the gallows to keep his promise to a political refugee; Vasantasena who is struggling to throw away the bonds of her profession and meets her killer with the name of her lover on her lips; Dhuta typifying the pativrata; the blundering fool Maitreya who lashes at everything with his sharp tongue but who has the noble courage to precede Charudatta's wife into the burning pyre; and the incomparable Shakara, crafty, cruel, wily as a fox, but downright laughable, a villain unmatched; the men and women in Mrichchhakatika are truly 'citizens of the world', as Ryder has said.

The vast canvas of the story is filled with a dazzling variety of happenings and emotions, presented with stark realism and with controlled art. The gamblers' world where a man is dragged like an animal across the road for avoiding to pay the debts, the atrocious murder of a young girl in a dilapidated garden, streets drenched in rain-water and mud, the crowds on a bazar day and traffic jam are some of the details which reveal Shudraka's perceptive skill, his range and grip of the realities of life.

'Shudraka stands alone in capturing the real spirit of a dignified comedy which laughs with abandon without descending to the level of a vulgar farce.' His humour is not confined to the sallies of the Vidusaka's conventional wit; Maitreya's observations are as penetrating and crammed with wisdom as they are funny. The mischievous remarks of the gamblers and their antics, Sharvilaka's humorous suggestion for dealing with Shakara, and above all Shakara's perversion of mythology and his fondness for using a string of synonyms in a single statement, his promise that he will not kill Vasantasena again, all raise the level of fun in Mrichchhakatika to an uncommon level of enjoyment.

MRIGAJAL (Marathi) is a collection of poems by a renowned Marathi poetess, Indira Sant. It was published in 1957. Her other collection are Mendi, Sela, Rangabavari, Bahulya and Garbhareshim. She received the Sahitya Akademi Award for her last collection of poems, Garbhareshim, in 1984.

Indira Sant is well-known for her emotional and sentimental poetry. Her love for Nature is revealed through the images in her poetry. Her sensitivity is unfolded through the tender expression of her subtle feelings. The constant grief of separation from her beloved husband who had died in his prime youth, has been expressed very intensely in most of her poems. All the happiness of her life has been turned into illusion as mrigajal (mirage) since then.

Mrigajal contains sixty-eight poems expressing Indira's different moods and feelings. Emotion of love, sorrow of separation from the beloved person and his memories, different shades of anguish, the fear and the feeling of emotional insecurity in life without her dear one, appreciation of Nature in its different colours and moods are the subjects of her poems in this collection. The title itself indicates the mood of her poems.

After suffering this sorrow in many forms, the poetess becomes bold enough to look towards the profound grief, which previously made her motionless and fearful, with courage and fortitude. She realises that one has to suffer bravely while living this life. Eventually she feels that this sorrow has cursed her in such a way that its intensity has vanished and it has appeared in the form of her laughter which, of course, is ironic.

There are six poems of separation from her beloved and some nine to ten poems about his memories. There are fine illustrations of the different shades and aspects of the emotion of love in many of her poems in Mrigajal.

All these appear in her poetry in the form of images. The sky, the wind, the trees, the birds, the sun, the moon, the rain and the flowers are the prominent images in her poetry. The poetess is also very much attracted by the colours in Nature. Blue, black, white and red are the colours which appear in Mrigajal frequently. Blue seems to be her favourite colour which symbolizes happiness and clarity. It occurs as an indication of her happy mood. Black suggests her loneliness, her sufferings. White appears rarely which shows her dreamy mood, whereas bright red suggests her anguish or sometimes even the emotion of love.

Indira Sant's poems in Mrigajal are very simple in style. Images which are few in number, appear quite naturally as currents in the flow of emotions and moods. The intensity of the emotions and the sincerity of the feelings, deep love towards Nature and the dejected mood due to the loss of the life-partner are the main features of these poems. They are not polished with deliberate charm, but bear natural fragrance of half-bloomed flowers.

MRIGANAYANI (Hindi) is a historical novel of great distinction by Vrindavanlal Verma, who devoted almost all his creative energy to this genre, hitherto neglected in Hindi. Varma's historical novels and romances reveal an intensely profound love for his homeland, viz., Bundelkhand, and like Maithilisharan Gupta of the same region, his works too revolve round characters, specially women, imbued with a deep sense of morality, integrity and righteousness. His keen interest in his home region, its proud history, its social set-up and milieu, and its ruins, finds an eloquent expression in his novels. He writes about his aim in writing historical novels thus: "It was not as though my aim or interest was just to unravel the past.... As I studied and ventured deeper, my conclusion that a historical work of fiction should somehow be inclusive of contemporary problems became firmer. I greatly revere facts. The projection of facts in a creative manner reflects truth and is the essence of all art." Thus on the wide and varied screen of the heroic land of Bundelkhand emerge the captivating tales of heroism and gallantry of historical characters.

Amongst Varma's historical novels Mriganayani ranks foremost. Though not as interesting and fascinating as his earliest romances, viz. Garh Kunder and Birata ki Padmini, it strikes successfully a balance between historical facts and creative improvisations, interweaving therewith traditions that impart a certain wholeness to the plot without undermining the historicity of the main events. Mriganayani is a tale of quiet gallantry and stable love. From her humble beginning as a commoner's daughter, Mriganayani rises to full stature as the king's discreet adviser on state matters, and she shows her mettle as an astute organiser in both war and peace. Hers is truly a many-splendoured personality.

The main plot, namely, the love tale and valiant exploits of Mansingh and Mriganayani, is historical in its essence, while the side plot, the love episode of Atal and Lakhi, no less captivating indeed, imparts an added attraction to the novel. In the creation of his female characters, Mriganayani and Lakhi, Varma is at his best. The contours of these characters represent a happy blend of unsophisticated beauty and inner strength. Mriganayani is filled with dreams of a remarkable future without being vain or conceited. She is attracted not by Mansingh's riches and grandeur but by his valour and steadfastness of purpose. Mansingh's life is moulded by a sense of discipline and struggle for the unity of his homeland to which end he bends all his energies and eventually takes Mriganayani as a partner in that endeavour.

As a backdrop to the main love story of Mansingh and Mriganayani and the secondary love tale of Atal and Lakhi, we have an impressive portrayal of a disorganised and demoralised contemporary social life, battered by constant foreign onslaughts and internecine battles based on false vanity and caste parochialism, deep-rooted superstitions and religious fanaticism. Varma successfully presents the seething social ferment of the age in the framework of a historical romance of great power and artistic excellence. The novel represents, indeed, the high watermark of Vrindavanlal Varma's artistic achievement as a historical novelist.

MRITYUNJAY (Marathi) is very popular novel by Shivaji Savant, a teacher by profession. This was the debut-making literary work of the author, first published in August 1967. Later, it ran into over a dozen editions and has been translated in Hindi, Gujarati, Bengali and other Indian languages. It has won several prestigious awards in Marathi, such as Maharashtra Government Award, Kesari-Maratha Samstha Award, Maharashtra Sahitya Parishad Award and Lalit Award. The prime literary institution Bharatiya Jnanpith has brought out its Hindi version which is an honour bestowed upon the first work of any Marathi author.

As claimed by the author in all his humility, seven long years have been spent by him on necessary research for this book which took him to all those places with which were associated the hero of this novel, Maharathi Karna, the great warrior and ace archer by the side of Kauravas. Karna in fact was the first Pandava abandoned by his mother Kunti and nursed a heartburning grievance against the society. This great and epic character of the Mahabharata has been powerfully portrayed by the author with superb exposition of human sentiments as well as sense of magnanimity and sacrifice in the hero's life.

Author has picked up a new genre in novel-writing from the veteran novelist of Marathi literature, V.S. Khandekar, who also hails from Kolhapur, a place to which the author belongs. Khandekar in his Jnanpith Award winning novel Yayati first adopted the technique of knitting the story as if it were narrated by its important characters. The technique unknown before Khandekar, has been ably used and improved upon by the author who gets the entire story told and retold by the five principal actors of the Mahabharata—Karna himself, Duryodhana, the Kaurava king, Shona the foster brother of Karna, Vrishali, Karna's wife and Shri Krishna, the key role in the entire Mahabharata.

It was very courageous on the part of the author to use for his first ever literary venture a technique developed by a literary giant like V.S. Khandekar whose inspiration the author gratefully acknowledges and surpasses his inspirer throughout the vast expanse of 600 pages of the book. It is a novel experiment and a determined endeavour on a very big canvas and yet every word is strikingly capable of depicting the ups and downs in the nuances of the behaviour of every character and makes for reader appreciate its justification.

Basic tenor of the book is not to search for the present in the past, nor does it anywhere try to look for the past in the present. It has successfully, artistically and meticulously put forth the hitherto unexplored aspects of Karna's psyche and that of his eminent contemporaries. The flow and beauty of the language of the author makes the book extremely interesting. Author has ably impressed upon his readers that Karna, the protagonist, was in all fields of the war-craft and techniques, far superior to others in the royal clan of Hastinapur, but was let down by fate, circumstances and politics of the day. Even in his death Karna appears to be far more magnanimous than his arch rivals.

The book instantly became so popular that it was serialised by Bombay All India Radio and attracted the highest number of listeners, as found out by the AIR Listener Research Unit in a survey. The book was widely commented upon and reviewed.

MUDALIAR, CHIDAMBARANATHA T.K. (Tamil; b.1881, d.1954), popularly known as 'TKC', dominated the Tamil literary scene in the first half of the twentieth century. His admirers affectionately called him Rasika Mani. He was a controversial figure, because of the strong views he held.

He was educated at St. Joseph's College, Tiruchi, Madras Christian College (where Maraimalai Adikal taught him Tamil) and at the Law College, Madras. He belonged to the Justice Party which elected him to the Madras Legislative Council. Later on, he was appointed Commissioner, Hindu Religious Endowments, Board of the Government of Madras, when he gave up political activities.

TKC is remembered not for his work in politics, administration or law. His fame rests entirely on his cultural pursuits. TKC founded the Tirunelveli Ilakkiya Sangam (a literary society) in 1924. Another forum of TKC was the 'Vatta Thotti' which met every Sunday from 1936 to 1938 at Vannarpet in the suburb of Tirunelveli. The intelligentsia of the district flocked to these meets to hear an opening stanza from Muttollayiram expounded by TKC to be followed by his scholarly interpretations and literary appreciations of Kamban's poems.

The credit for creating public opinion in favour of a movement for revival of Tamil music also goes to TKC. Later on, this was organised on a permanent footing by a body called Tamil Isai Sangam by Rajah Sir Annamalai Chettiar, R.K. Shanmukam Chetty and others with the support of Rajaji and C.N. Annadurai. TKC was also one of the founder-members of the association which was formed to bring out the Tamil Encyclopedia.

TKC held original and non-traditional views. He rejected thousands of stanzas as interpolations and infiltrations into Kamban's writing. So he was the target of attack from the Tamil School of traditional pandits. He wanted to simplify Tamil Grammar by integrating spoken Tamil with written Tamil. He advocated uniform use of conjunction letters. TKC was opposed to the system of higher education; he thought it did not fit in with India's culture; he believed in what views he gave expression to and so he did not send his grandchildren to school. TKC popularised the beauties of Tamil literature among people who were out and out anglicized in thought, word, deed and dress. In whatever he expounded, TKC believed that aesthetics was the soul of all art, literature and culture. He coined many new words in Tamil e.g., 'panbadu' (for culture). TKC was one of the founder-partners of a weekly, Kalki.

The present popularity of Kamban and his work is due not a little to TKC. Before his entry in the field, Kamban's work was regarded only as a religious text of a section of the Hindus. His interpretations earned a secular audience for the poet. TKC was one of the prime movers of the Kamban Kazhagam at Karaikudi which has been holding annual literary meets since 1938. From 1951 for three years continuously, he wrote week after week in Kalki under the caption 'Glimpses from Kamban'. It was TKC who gave the idea for the portrait of Kamban which is now widely recognised as authoritative.

TKC brought folk songs to the notice of the elite and wanted them to be accepted as part of our great literary heritage. TKC was a close associate of V.P. Subramania Mudaliar, advocate A. Subbiah Mudaliar, poet Kavimani Desikavinayakam Pillai and Rajaji (C. Rajagopalachari) who considered his views to be the last word on all literary and cultural subjects.

MUDDUKRISHNA S. (Telugu; b.1899, d.1973) is known among the lovers of Telugu literature mainly as the editor of the well-known anthology of poetry. His other achievements, though not widely known, are by no means less significant or less praiseworthy.

Muddukrishna was born in a family of scholars. His father was a follower of Kandukuri Veeresalingam Pantulu, the well-known figure in the history of social reform in Andhra. The cultured atmosphere at home played a significant role in moulding the taste and temperament of Muddukrishna. Schooled under his father in Telugu classics and prabandhas, he soon evinced a keen interest in English literature as well. For a short while he was a student at Kakinada under Raghupati Venkata Ratnam Naidu. Later, he graduated from the Rajahmundry College, by which time he had become well-versed in Sanskrit and English literatures.

He developed a close association with romantic poets like Devulapalli Krishna Sastry, Chinta Dikshitulu, Tallavajjala Sivasankara Sastry and others. He was intimately connected with various drama troupes staging Telugu and English plays. He also worked closely with Harindranath Chattopadhyay giving performances around 1927. All these activities inspired him to write for the stage. Among his popular plays is Ashokam, unconventional and rebellions in theme and presentation. Muddukrishna tenaciously staged the play quite a few times in the face of much adverse criticism.

The nationalist movement of the 1920s inspired young Muddukrishna to take active part in it during 1932-33.

Jwala, the literary journal Muddukrishna edited, unfortunately ran only for a few months in 1934, but it provided an excellent forum for some modern trends in Telugu writing. Young experimentalists like 'Pattabhi' won the attention of the reading public through its pages. Jwala set new trends both by its writings and by its editing.

Muddukrishna also worked for a few films in Telugu, and some of them were commercially successful. But a man of such strong individuality and tastes could not be chained up for long to a fixed position or profession.

Muddukrishna remained a bachelor all his life, and the treatise on marital relations and problems, Dampatya dipika written by this bachelor, was quite a success. It won the accolades of many.

His close contacts with the contemporary romantic poets resulted in his longing to collect and edit the best of their writings. The result was the collection entitled Vythalikulu (1935). Even though the poems he selected for his anthology belonged, broadly speaking, to the prevailing romantic trend, he knew that the book was to reflect variety of themes and technique, and the various stages of evolution discernible in that dominating trend. Some of the opinions he expressed about Sri Sri Viswanatha Satyanarayana, Krishna Sastry, Basavaraju Appa Rao and others are accepted as authoritative critical pronouncements. The introduction he wrote to Vythalikulu is a brief and tidy sketch of the history of Telugu poetry to date. In recognising the continuity of poetic traditions, in relating the novelty of modern poetry to various extra-literary phenomena, and in welcoming more changes and experiments in poetic trends, Muddukrishna proves himself out and out modern. Thus Vythalikulu came out as the most valuable and esteemed anthology the like of which is hard to find. It covered more than twenty-five poets represented by about two hundred poems. Diverse trends like classicism, nationalism, romanticism, realism, progressivism, etc., are accommodated, making the collection rich, even though the dominant trend is romanticism in its multiple hues. Vythalikulu is a unique contribution to Telugu literary world of this century. It may be compared to the Golden Treasury edited by Palgrave.

All through his long and eventful life, Muddukrishna was devoted mainly to the cause of literature. He believed in Shelley's statement that poets are the unacknowledged legislators of mankind. The services he rendered to the Telugu literary scene have been duly acknowledged by those who knew of his effort and achievement. Some of his plays like Anarkali have been translated into Hindi.

MUDGAL, KRISHNADAS (Marathi; b. 16th century) is an important poet who worked on an adaptation of the Ramayana. He was a contemporary of Eknath, and a resident of Paithan. His Yuddhakanda-Ramayana was so popular that it was read all over Maharashtra as part of daily ritual. He was also called 'Krishnadasa Lolya' or 'Lolya Mudgal'. The poet referred to Adhyatamaṛamayana and Agnipurana along with Valmiki Ramayana in his adaptation. He was the first writer to include stories about Rama from Shivapurana also. He took pride in the rich heritage of the Marathi language and poetry. There is no other elaborate work in Marathi based on a single canto of the Ramayana. The poet's style is seen at its best in this work. It is treated as one of the classics of early Marathi poetry. Apart from this, some akhyanas like Sulochanakhyan, Angadashishtai, Bibhishanabheth and Ravana-aniakale are seen in a different form. In fact, these are also part of the Yuddhakanda. Krishnadas has also written Balakrida in Ovi form.

MUDRA RAKSHAS (Hindi; b.1933), born at village Behata, district Lucknow, he imbibed his father's love for plays. He passed his M.A. examination from Lucknow University. Since 1951 he has been writing regularly. He edited Gyanodaya, Anuvrat, Zero (English magazine), Sahitya Bulletin, and Behatar. He joined the All India Radio, Delhi, in 1961, but did not find much favour with the authorities because of his Marxist ideology. Since 1976 he has been a freelance writer and actively engaged in play, theatre, poetry, short story, novel, literary criticism, history, philosophy, archaeology, and fine arts. He has concentrated now on new experiments in fine arts and has given new dimension to Hindi theatre through his acting and direction.

He is also a powerful writer in the field of novel. He has continuously attacked the feudal structure of society, and his strength lies in voicing the struggle of the common man.

He is also acclaimed as a dramatist of new vision. He writes against the establishment, and is a forerunner in the field of folk-drama. His plays are an effort to liberate Hindi drama from sentimentalism and age-old conventions in both content and technique:

His well known works are: Plays: Marajeeva (1962), Your's faithfully (1969), Tilachetta (1973), Tendua (1975), Gufayen (1979), Santola (1980) Ala Afasar (1981), Dakoo (1986), Malvikagnimitra aur hum, and Seediyan; Novels: Gyarah sapanon ka desh, Achala ek manahstheti, Bhagoda, Mera nam tera nam, Shok samvad, Hum sab manshar-am, Cheenteepuram ke Bhurelal (Children's play). Stories: Shabda dāsh; Satire: Suno bhai sadho (1984); Criticism: Paribhashyen aur samasyayen.

MUDRARAKSHASA

MUDRARAKSHASA (Sanskrit) is a historical play of the nataka type in seven acts, by Vishakhadatta. The scene is laid at Kusumapura (Patna) after Sarvarthasiddhi, the last of the Nanda kings, has renounced the world because his kingdom has been wrested from him by Chandragupta through the machination of the latter's able minister, the famous Vishnusharman, better known as Chanakya. Malayaketu, a small vassal king, left Chandragupta's court because his father Parvataka (or Parvatesha) had been poisoned to death by a girl secretly sent by Chanakya. Rakshasa, an honest, intelligent and able minister served Malayaketu and it was Chanakya's ambition to defeat the weakling Malayaketu so that Rakshasa's services could be secured for Chandragupta, the abler of the two kings. Act I opens after the introductory section with one of Chanakya's spies presenting Rakshasa's signet ring which he has secured through a ruse. Chanakya, overjoyed, has a letter copied by the unsuspecting Shakatadasa (Rakshasa's friend) and seals it with the ring. Later, he orders Chandanadasa's arrest and death because he, Rakshasa's closest friend, has sheltered the latter's family in his own house. He is, however, saved at the last moment by Siddharthaka, another spy of Chanakya's. Shakatadasa flees to Rakshasa. Jivasiddhi another spy disguised as a Jain monk and astrologer is banished by Chanakya to Rakshasa's court for espionage at that end. It is reported that Rakshasa's family has escaped to safety and that Bhagurayana, a friend of Chanakya's, has fled. Act II opens at Malayaketu's capital where Viradhaka, Rakshasa's spy disguised as a snake-charmer comes and reports that Rakshasa's scheme to murder Chandragupta (which was to be brought about with the help of several secret agents) has miscarried through Chanakya's shrewd vigilance and that Vairadhaka, Malayaketu's uncle, who had stayed on in Kusumapura when the latter had fled (because he had been promised half of the kingdom by Chandragupta), has been cleverly put to death. All those secret agents of Rakshasa who had arranged separate devices for killing Chandragupta, have been cruelly slaughtered. The banishment of Shakatadasa and imprisonment of Chandanadasa are also reported. Then appear Shakatadasa, and Siddharthaka, Chanakya's spy who had apparently rescued the former. Rakshasa, ignorant of the scheme and overjoyed at seeing Shakatadasa, presents a trinket to Siddharthaka who begs it to be sealed and kept in the royal treasury until he should need it. Shakatadasa recognizes the signet-ring as Rakshasa's; Siddharthaka confesses that he found it lying near the door of Chandanadasa's house (it was accidentally dropped there by Rakshasa's wife). Shakatadasa pays money for the ring and Rakshasa gives it to Shakatadasa as his personal seal. Siddharthaka pleads fear of Chanakya's revenge for rescuing Shakatadasa and is allowed to stay in Malayaketu's court. Finally, Viradhaka says that Chandragupta is tired of Chanakya; Rakshasa is happy. Then Rakshasa buys some jewels of the late Parvataka cleverly sent by Chanakya through his messenger. In act III we hear that Chandragupta orders a moonlight fiesta and is informed that Chanakya has forbidden the celebration. He sends for the minister and there is a heated argument. Chanakya says that he feels humiliated and leaves in a huff. (Actually the entire scene is got up for deceiving the enemy's spies). The next act (IV) introduces Bhagurayana who has apparently defected from Chandragupta's court and has come over to Malayaketu, but is actually a secret agent of Chanakya's. Speaking to Malayaketu on behalf of all the kings who have deserted Chandragupta he says that they would prefer to have a direct approach to Malayaketu rather than through Rakshasa because Rakshasa is hostile only to his rival Chanakya and not to Chandragupta with whom he may come to terms once Chanakya is removed. Then the King overhears rift between Chanakya and Chandragupta. Rakshasa remarks, "Now, therefore, Chandragupta is virtually under his control. This Malayaketu interprets as a proof of Rakshasa's secret desire for an alliance with Chandragupta. The king talks with his minister but cannot rid his mind of a nagging doubt about the latter's bona-fide. It is in such a hesitant mood that he agrees with Rakshasa's plan of attacking Chandragupta's capital. Jivasiddhi, Chanakya's spy, disguised as a Jain monk, is summoned for an auspicious date for the battle; he forecasts doom in a veiled language. In the next act (V) Jivasiddhi meets Bhagurayana who is in charge of exit permits for leaving Malayaketu's camp and says that he is afraid of Rakshasa for whom he used to work and whom he helped in getting Parvataka poisoned. Malayaketu hears this and is full of wrath and hate. Bhagurayana falsely pleads for Rakshasa saying that he may have had his reasons for acting as he did and persuades him not to take revenge on Rakshasa immediately. Siddharthaka is arrested because he tried to escape without an exit permit and when he is beaten by officers, a letter he was carrying drops down. This letter, addressed to Chandragupta, says that the bearer has a verbal message, and a precious jewel sealed with Rakshasa's seal is enclosed with the letter. Further beatings elicit the 'truth', viz. the conditions laid down by the defecting kings for shifting their allegiance to Chandragupta, together with Rakshasa's own terms: Chanakya must be removed. Questioned by Malayaketu, Rakshasa pleads complete ignorance; but his own seal and his friend Shakatadasa's handwriting bear evidence against him. Then Malayaketu discovers that Rakshasa has on him one of his late father's jewels (Rakshasa had bought these from a seller sent by the wily Chanakya). Malayaketu construes this as another proof of Rakshasa's infidelity. In characteristic haste and choler, Malayaketu orders that the treacherous kings who had coveted territory should be buried alive and those who hoped to get elephants should be trampled to death under elephants' feet. He spares Rakshasa's life with pompous words of magnanimity. Rakshasa leaves with the aim of saving Chandanadasa's life. The next act (VI) finds Rakshasa seated on a bench in a park, recapitulating his failures in deep agony and terrified at the thought of Chandanadasa's fate. One of Chandragupta's spies appears and pretends to prepare a noose to hang himself with. Questioned by Rakshasa he says that his friend Vishnudasa is about to kill himself because Chandanadasa, the latter's friend, has been condemned to death. For fear of out-living his friend, Vishnudasa, he wishes to commit suicide, especially as Chandanadasa cannot be rescued because at the first sign of a rescue attempt the executioners will put Chandanadasa to death; so no other course but suicide is left open to him. Rakshasa dissuades him from suicide and hastens to offer his own life as a ransom for Chandanadasa. The last act (VII) sees Chandanadasa followed by his wife and son being led away to the execution ground. The wife is anxious to die with him when Rakshasa comes and offers himself in his friend's place. Then Chanakya and Chandragupta appear on the scene; Chanakya tells Rakshasa that only on condition of his (Rakshasa's) accepting the office of Chandragupta's chief counsellor will Chandanadasa's life be spared. Rakshasa has no option; he accepts the office which both Chandragupta and Chanakya respectfully press on him. There is report of great havoc in the battlefield, the rebel kings have defeated and captured Malayaketu whose life is spared at Rakshasa's intercession and whose territories are restored to him. Chandanadasa is handsomely rewarded, the prisoners of war are all released, Chanakya retires from politics and Chandragupta is gratified at Rakshasa's consent to serve him. The play ends with a benediction.

The Mudrarakshasa is a unique play in many respects. As a play based on a political theme, it bears testimony to the consummate skill of Visakhadatta as a dramatist. It does not present any of the recognized dramatic sentiments (rasa), but introduces a new, hitherto unrecognized sentiment of intense rivalry between two sharp-witted ministers dedicated to the service of their respective kings. The plot is very carefully constructed in the two courts and action is continuous, varied and follows a closely knit pattern. It is never smothered in mere words. In spite of the general limitation of the paradigm of court intrigues, genuine dramatic interest is created within this apparently narrow scope. Unlike most Sanskrit dramas, it avoids love as the main or even a subsidiary sentiment. The problem of the protagonist and antagonist is also highly debatable; it is, however, generally assumed that since in the final analysis Chanakya outwits Rakshasa and succeeds in achieving what he strove for throughout the play, he should be regarded as the hero.

But for the brief and insignificant presence of Chandanadasa's wife, the play has no female characters. Neither do we meet the familiar Vidushaka, the traditional fool of the Sanskrit play; humour, even as a relief motif is wholly absent here. And yet the audiences do not feel bored because the interest never flags; the drama grips the reader's imagination until the very end. Dialogues are terse and effective and contain fine dramatic touches. The prose, both in Sanskrit and Prakrits (of which Shauraseni and Magadhi are used more frequently) is composed with great economy of words and is very realistic in style. Verses are generally in long metres and contain long compounds. Rhetoric is never used as a luxury or for the sake of mere ornateness but always embellishes a really significant experience; it is always organically connected with the poetry.

The dramatist is a keen observer of human life; his comments on life are full of wisdom and betray an awareness of its many-faceted complexities. The core of the play is a conflict of emotions, interests, ideals and allegiances. The whole play moves along the intricate patterns woven by these conflicts; it succeeds in depicting the two opponents as noble and basically good and selfless characters, and yet the gravity and intensity of the struggle is never understood. The dramatic problem was thus a very real one and success depended on the author's power of remaining true to this very sensitive antitheses of objectives without reducing the two major characters into mere stereotypes. It is here that the play is really unique and the playwright uniquely successful.

MUGALI, R.S. (Kannada; b. 1906) is a Kannada poet, critic and novelist. Coming under the spell of Gandhiji, Mugali left school for some time at the age of fourteen. Later he did his B.A., M.A., and D.Litt. of Pune University. He worked in several capacities as Professor of Kannada at Willingdon College, Sangli, later as Principal Director of Literary and Cultural Department, Mysore Government, and as Professor and Head of the Department of Kannada, Bangalore University. Apart from Kannada, he knows English, Marathi and Sanskrit.

Mugali first made a name as a poet. As a member of the Geleyara Gumpu of Dharwad, in his youth he was steeped in literature. A lover of beauty and nature, Mugali began with lyrics characterized by smoothness and tenderness. With the passing of years his poetry grew more thoughtful and ripe. His Manimala (1976), for instance, which is a string of 102 reflective stanzas, presents a cosmic picture of life and man as a part of creation. As a novelist he is an idealist. His heroes know sorrow and suffering and humiliation but endeavour to make life purposeful. Anna is the best known of the earlier novels with a purposeful idealist for hero. Agnivarna strikes a new path; the central character is the degenerate profligate described by Kalidasa in his Raghuvamsha. Mugali shows how his degeneration becomes tragic for the kingdom and how corruption spreads; it is too late when Agnivarna sees light.

Mugali is recognized as one of the leading scholars and critics of the contemporary Kannada world, and an authority on the history of Kannada literature. His Kannada sahitya charitre is the first comprehensive history of Kannada literature. He also wrote a history of Kannada literature for the Sahitya Akademi which has been translated into several Indian languages. He prepared also a slightly shorter English version of the book for the Akademi. He is one of the few Kannada critics who have sought to analyze the principles and methods of criticism. In his critical writings he combines scholarship with originality and balance; he has been a student of western criticism and so he can use the comparative method profitably. Mugali has also written one-Act plays and short stories, as well as full-length plays.

Mugali presided over the 45th Kannada Literary Conference in 1963. For several years he was a member of the Executive Board of the Sahitya Akademi. He read a paper on 'Nationalism and Cosmopolitanism in Literature: Indian Outlook' at the Fourth Congress of the International Comparative Literature Association in Feribough, Switzerland. He has visited France, Belgium, Holland and England.

MUHAMMAD BUX 'WASIF' (Sindhi b.1892, d.1954) was a poet and a prose writer. Born in a small village of Razi Jatoi in Nawabshah district of Sindh, he was reared in Hyderabad Sindh where his father was employed. Wasif studied up to the secondary level. He could not continue his studies further due to the sudden death of his father in 1911. In spite of the fact that he had to strive for a living, he studied different languages and their literatures. Wasif's poetic compositions are highly influenced by erotic poems of Persian and Urdu. He had mastery over 'ghazal' and 'rubai' forms of poetry. He compiled Diwan-e-Wasif which was published first in 1922, and later reprinted in 1955 from Hyderabad. Most of the poems of Wasif were published in the issues of a literary journal Adib-e-Sindh, brought out monthly from Larkana during 1941-1952. It has been rightly pointed out by critics that Wasif cleverly imitated Persian and Urdu poets in thought, imagery and style. Thus, most of his poems do not find roots in the soil of Sindh. In the field of prose, Wasif mainly wrote on Islamic theology. His main works in prose are Islami Shari'at in two parts (Vol.I. published in 1934 and Vol.II in 1942), Quran Sharifa jo Sindhi tarjumo (Sindhi translation of the Quran, 1934), Asanjo pyaro Rasul (Our beloved Prophet, 1931) and Islami akhlaqi kahanyu (Moral tales from Islam, 1951). Wasif also wrote in Sindhi a book of moral stories and fables entitled Gulzar chambeli. This Sindhi work is a good specimen of Wasif's prose-style which was greatly influenced by the Persian idiom and vocabulary. Wasif showed his critical vision by writing Sharah Latifi, a critical evaluation of H. M. Gurbaxani's edition of Shah jo Risalo (Part I, published in 1923). Wasif's another critical work, Tazkirah-e-Shuara-e-Hyderabad (Biographical memoirs of the poets of Hyderabad, 1956), was brought out after his death.

MUHAMMAD FAZIL SHAH 'SAYYAD' (Sindhi; b.1836, d.1900) was a poet. He was born at Hyderabad (Sindh). He was the eldest son of Sayyad Haidar Shah, who was a poet himself, well-known for composing the folk-tale of Laila-Majnu in 'd'ohira' verses. Fazil Shah got his education in one of the traditional makhtabs in the town. He became a well-known scholar of Arabic, Persian and Islamic theology. After completing his education, he joined judicial line and was a licensed Mukhtyar (advocate) in Hyderabad and Hala divisions up to 1888. After the death of his paternal uncle, Qazi Yusuf Shah, in 1892, Fazil Shah got the post of mufti (i.e., one who writes judgements) in the court of his cousin Qazi Ibrahim Shah. He remained on that post until he breathed his last. It is said that Fazil Shah spent the last years of his life mostly praying to God and studying Islamic scriptures.

In the field of poetry, Fazil Shah belongs to the Persian school of Sindhi poetry. He has composed a good number of poems in Persian, following the custom of those days in Sindh; but the large corpus of his poetry is in Sindhi. The main published works of Fazil Shah which have come to light are: (1) Diwan Fazil (a collection of ghazals compiled by the poet himself in 1873), (2) Mizanal shair (The first treatise written in Sindhi on the principles of Persian poetic forms and prosody. It contains some forms of Sindhi poetry also, such as 'd'ohiro', 'kafi', 'mauludu', 'madah'. The book was completed in 1873). Fazil Shah submitted both these works to the Vernacular Literature Committee for publication. Both books were published by the Committee in lithograph in 1883. They were brought out in a single volume and the poet was paid an honorarium of Rs. 160/- by the Education Department.

These books were out of print for long. The Sindh Muslim Adabi Society published the second edition of Mizanal shair in composed type in 1936, with the changed title Shairo shairi. The same society brought out a new edition of Diwan Fazil in 1937 in composed type. It is edited by Muhammad Sidiq Gulab Khan 'Musafir' with a critical introduction and explanatory notes. Fazil Shah had collected selected Sindhi 'kafi' poems composed by well-known Sindhi poets. He compiled them in a book entitled Chunda kafiyun (selected kafis) with introductory notes on the poets. The book was published by the Vernacular Literature Committee in 1887. A considerable number of other works written by Fazil Shah in Persian and Sindhi remained unpublished and these works seem to be lost for ever.

Fazil Shah's ghazals are on various topics, which include carnal love as well as spiritual love, didactic subjects as well as beauty of nature. Fazil Shah had passed through the experience of a love affair in his youth, and he came to the conclusion that it was futile to give oneself to carnal love ('Ishq majazi'). One must, therefore, devote oneself to spiritual love only.

MUHAMMAD HASHIM 'MUKHLIS' (Sindhi, b.1860, d.1934) was a journalist, a prose writer and a poet. He had his education in Arabic and Persian in a traditional Madrasa. Mukhlis got his inspiration and guidance for poetic compositions from his father Hafiz Haji 'Hamid' (1823-1897), who had lost his sight in childhood due to smallpox, and was a well-known poet and scholar. Mukhlis entered the literary field by writing in periodicals and newspapers. He remained associated as an editor with more than half a dozen Sindhi periodicals, viz., Alhaq (started in 1901), Tohfa-e-Ehbad (monthly, started in 1903), Bahar-e-Akhlaq (monthly, started in 1906 by Asad Shah 'Fida'), Jafar-Zatli (monthly, started in 1910 by Ghulam Muhammad Shah Bharg'uri from Hyderabad), Kachkol (monthly, started in 1910), Alamin (started in 1913 by Ghulam Muhammad Shah Bharg'uri), Mirapur Khas Gazette (started in 1916 from Mirapur Khas by Gurd' inomal Tahilsingh) and Musalman, (weekly, started in 1923 from Mirapur Khas). Mukhlis was a master of powerful Sindhi prose which often contained wit and humour. His satirical and bold writings against the British rulers annoyed the authorities, and as a result the Government was compelled to take legal action against him. But Mukhlis left Sindh for a few years and remained in disguise in the adjacent provinces. After returning to his native province, he sometimes wrote under different names. In the field of poetry, besides seeking guidance from his father, he became a student of Ghulam Muhammad Shah 'Gada' (1826-1905), his senior contemporary Sindhi poet. The poetry of Mukhlis, like his prose, contains witty and satirical expressions. It is loaded with Perso-Arabic vocabulary and is greatly influenced by Persian poetry in thought, imagery and form. Most of the poems composed by Mukhlis are scattered in literary periodicals of that period.

MUHAMMAD KASEM ALI KORESHI (Bengali; b.1858, d.1951), better known by his pseudonym, Kaykobad, was born at Agla village, in the district of Dhaka (now in Bangladesh). Due to financial difficulties he was unable to complete his school education. He took up a job in the Postal Department and spent his life as a Postmaster in his own village.

His best poetical work is an epic called Mahashmashan (1904). Based on the Third War of Panipat (1761) the poem recounts the victory of Ahmed Shah Abadali. Besides Mahashmashan, he wrote some narratives such as Shivamandir (1917), Shmashanbhashma and Maharram shari (1933). He is also famous for a number of his lyrics. Ashrumala, a collection of such lyrics, was first published in 1894.

M.Ma.

MUHAMMAD, K.T. (Malayalam; b. 1928) is a well-known playwright and author of short stories. A native of Manjeri, he was employed in the Postal Department. For a term he served as Chairman of the Kerala Film Development Corporation. Muhammed first came into prominence with his story 'Kannukal' (Eyes), winning the first place in an all-India short story competition organised by prominent newspapers in 1952. He has been connected with theatre groups and is the founder of the Sangam Theatres in Calicut.

Muhammad contributed much to the experimental and the commercial theatre in Kerala. He wrote at first for the amateur theatre and later for professional and commercial theatre.

Muhammad was noted for his ability to depict human emotion under stress in such plays as his Karavatta pashu (The non-milching cow), one of his best known plays. This powerful play deals with the tensions and conflicts that grip a not-so-well-to-do family where there is a young and sensitive consumptive who refuses to sell his cow that has stopped giving milk, although he has nothing else to fall back upon to raise the money badly needed for his treatment. Eventually, he feels that people like him are symbolised by this cow, useless and poignantly dispensable. In another well-known play Itu bhumiyanu (This is the earth, 1955), Muhammed develops the theme of religious observances which have degenerated into mere shells devoid of spirit. He has here the Muslim community as his area of reference. In his play Srishti (Creation, 1972) he adopts the surrealistic technique of mixing fact and fancy. Critics have noted that the elements of the theatre like stage lighting and stage-sets, which Muhammad especially used in his experimental plays, were later developed and employed in his plays written for the commercial theatre. Some of his other plays are: Manushyan karagrihattalanu (Man is in prison, 1956), Oru putiya vitu (A new house, 1957), Nan petikkunnu (I am afraid, 1957), Ratri vantikal (Night trains, 1961), Velicham vilakkanveshikkunnu (The light seeks a lamp, 1961), Katalppalam (The bridge on the sea, 1965), Sthiti (1978).

Though Muhammed came into prominence with an award-winning short story, he is famous mainly as a playwright and as one who contributed to the renaissance of the Malayalam play, particularly through his association with the All Malabar Central Arts Group (Akhila Malabar Kendra Kalasamiti). He has three collections of short stories to his credit. These are Chirikkunna kattu (The laughing knife, 1956) Shabdangalute lokam (The world of voices, 1959) and Kaliyum karayavum (Play and work, 1969). There are also two novels. These are Kattu (The wind, 1967), and Mamsapushpangal (Flowers of flesh, 1965).

P.N.K.

MUHAMMAD MOHSIN 'BEKAS' (Sindhi; b.1859, d.1882) inherited poetic talent as also the love for physical form from his father 'Bedil'. Of him one could rightly say that he was a 'chip of the old block'. Bekas literally means the helpless. He was brought up and educated by his father. Bekas adopted most of the characteristics of his father's personality including allegiance to Lal Shahbaz Qalandar. Although Bekas died at a very early age of 23, he wrote a lot of poetry which was ripe and mature. He has often been compared with the English poet John Keats (who also died young), for he too like the great Keats, created sensuous beauty in his verse. He was very handsome and was fond of colourful clothes. Like his father, he believed 'majaz' (physical love) to be a bridge leading to 'haqiqat' (spiritual love)

He often wrote and sang his compositions saturated with the sorrows of separation, considering himself to be the legendary 'Marui', lamenting for her 'Malir' and 'Marus'. For him this world was Umar Sumro's 'Kotu' (place) which held for him no happiness.

His father taught him other languages too, but he preferred to write in Sindhi and Siraiki. He composed poems weaving them with the famous folk-tales of Mumal-Rano, Sasuai-Punhu, etc.

Much of Bekas's poetry is similar to that of his father Bedil, both in form and content, and one could easily mistake the poetry of one for that of the other. We find in his poetry flight of imagination, music, intoxication, fervour, and such other essential features of classical poetry.

Bekas also wrote an elegy on the death of his father and master, but it does not come up to the poetic level of the one that Bedil wrote in the praise and memory of his master Sachal.

MUHAMMAD MUJEEB (Urdu; b.1902, d.1985) was a historian, social thinker, liberal humanist and a short story writer, biographer and playwright of considerable merit. He was born at Lucknow, had his early education in the Loretto Convent, Lucknow and the public school of Dehradun. Then he went to Oxford and graduated in history from there. From Oxford he went to Germany and studied printing. He joined Jamia Millia as a professor of history in 1926 and remained its Vice Chancellor from 1948 to 1974. He wrote with equal mastery both in Urdu and English. His Urdu works are Kimiyagar aur doosre afsane (1933), Shahidullah aur doosri kahaniyan (1958); both these are collections of stories. His stories, though rich in human elements were written mainly for edification. Kheti (1932); Anjaam (1934); Khana jangi (1947); Habba Khatoon (1952); Heroine ki talash (1953); Doosri shaam (1956); Azmaish (1957); Aao drama karen (1941); all these are plays and demonstrate Mujeeb's passion for history and concern with social reform. Roosi adab 2 vols. (1934) is a penetrating history of Russian literature. Tarikh-i-falsafa-i-siyasat (1936) is the history of political philosophy. Tarikh-i-Hindustan ki tamhid (1935) is a comprehensive introduction to the study of Indian history. Duniya ki kahani (1935) is a collection of radio talks dealing with the developments and decay of different cultures of the world.

His English works also relate to literature in various ways: Indian Muslims (1961) is a monumental work in which he traces the origin of Islam in India and the variegated forms it has taken because of the local influences over the years in different parts of the country. This is not merely a historical work, but Mujeeb deals at length with Indian culture and literature and shows how they influenced the Muslim mind. His historical vision is a comprehensive one; he continually pleads for the study of history of a people in conjunction with its literature and fine arts. Ghalib (1969; translated into several Indian languages by Sahitya Akademi) is a monograph dealing with the life of the poet and a brief critical study of his works. His other works in English are: Ordeal 1857 (1958); Akbar (1969); Ghazaliat Ghalib (1969); Islamic influence on Indian Society (1972); Dr. Zakir Hussain—A Biography (1972). Mujeeb also enriched Urdu literature by translating widely from other literatures, both Indian and European: he translated from Tagore, Emily Dickinson, son and Maulana Abul Kalam Azad and a host of other authors.

MUHAMMAD, N.P. (Malayalam; b.1928), a native of Calicut, is a short story writer and novelist, who took to writing not to entertain the readers with nostalgic and sentimental anecdotes, but to expose the hollowness of the materialistic culture he saw around him. An impeccable sense of nationalism and an unflinching social commitment have endowed him with an uncompromising stance. His sense of honour often becomes sarcastic and ironic. He is not carried away by western models of 'modernism' and is sane enough to know that literature is organic and has a local habitation and a name.

Muhammad's first publication is Toppiym tattavum (1952), a collection of six short stories. Nallavarude nattil (In the land of the good, 1955) and Maranam tarattu padi (Death sang a lullaby) are two of his other collections. Generally speaking, all his stories have the power of evoking thought. Pukakkuzhalum Saraswatiyum (The pipe and Saraswati) is a collection of his highly readable essays.

In a sense, however, his novels are more remarkable. Maaram (Tree) and Arabiponnu (The gold of Arabia), written in collaboration with M.T. Vasudevan Nair, are two of them. The full force of his satire is let loose in another novel, Hiranyakashipu (1967), which is a satanic attack against the social and moral degeneration of the time and brings the author's rare gifts into sharp focus. The theme is Kerala's politics set against the background of Indian politics of the year 2003. A man named Srihari is depicted as having usurped the powers of the central government and democracy as having culminated into dictatorship, at that time. Sreehari employs a sycophant called Hiranyakashipu as Kerala's Chief to ensure the nation's integrity and solidarity. Then follows the ruthless manouvring of Hiranya, who in course of time subdues all his rivals including his relatives and Gurus. As a practical measure for population control, he introduces the Infanticide Bill and sets up a police force called 'Black guard'. Later he poohpoohs even Srihari, who manages to tide over the situation by offering him a high post at the centre. Allegory and fantasy are in full play in the novel and serve to accentuate the satirical tone.

Muhammad's Avar nalu per (Those four persons) won the Sree Padmanabhaswamy Endowment award for children's literature in 1988.

MUHAMMAD QASIM (Sindhi; b. 1806, d. 1881) was a poet. Originally hailing from Hala, a small village in Sindh, Muhammad Qasim settled in Hyderabad where he came in close contact with his contemporary Sindhi poets, Gul Muhammad, Fazil Shah and others. He worked with the provincial government for some time, but later on preferred to remain a free-lance writer. He was a fine calligraphist of his time and earned enough from writing books and posters. Besides, he was a scholar of Arabic and Persian and used to teach these languages to private students to earn his livelihood. For this reason he was known as akhund (teacher). Qasim initially wrote poems in Persian which were mostly published in Mofurrah-ul-Qulub (Giving happiness to hearts), the first literary weekly in Persian started in 1855 by Mirza Mukhlis Ali from Karachi. Qasim became well-known as a Persian poet through this weekly and his poems were highly appreciated. Those young writers who practised metrical compositions in Persian approached Qasim for guidance. It was due to the insistence of his friend, Fazil Shah, that Qasim switched over to writing poems in Sindhi. He prepared Diwan Qasim, a collection of his Sindhi ghazals in 1875, which was approved as a text book by the Vernacular Literature Committee of the Government. It was published in lithograph from Karachi in 1878. As the book was full of misprints and orthographical mistakes, Mirza Qalich Beg, one of the admirers of the poet, edited it with annotations and critical notes. It remained in the manuscript form for a long time until it was published in 1936 by his son Mirza Afzal Beg from Hyderabad. Sindh, Diwan Qasim contains 137 ghazals, which are comparatively meagre part of his total verse compositions because most of his Persian and Sindhi poems have not been collected and published in a book form. The ghazals of Diwan Qasim are known for their theological subjects and dry didactic elaborateness. No doubts, the poet gained vast reputation on account of his metrical perfection. In medieval Sindhi poetry, it was a common practice to quote phrases and small sentences from the Quran at suitable places. Qasim also followed this, but he went a step further by mingling his own composed lines of Arabic and Persian in his Sindhi poems. In his time it might have been a mark of excellence, but in fact it marred the lucid and simple style of poetry. Qasim has artistically depicted the beauty of nature in some of his poems. His innovations in traditional forms of 'ghazal', 'rubai' and some other forms of Persian poetry are remarkable contributions. Some 'kafis' written by Qasim are popular due to their melody and appealing way of expression. He beautifully used in his ghazals the common idioms and proverbs without disturbing the requirements of the metre. It can be said that Muhammad Qasim was more a versifier than a poet in the real sense of the term.

MUHAMMAD SIDIQ MUSAFIR (Sindhi; b. 1879, d. 1955) was an educationist, journalist and poet. He passed the Vernacular Final examination in 1896 and joined as an assistant teacher in a school at Tando Adam. During the tenure of his service as a teacher, he acquired proficiency in Arabic and Persian. He was a disciple of the renowned poet Sayyad Fazil Shah (1836-1900) and learnt from him the art of poetic composition. He was appointed assistant teacher at the Teachers Training College, Hyderabad, in 1902. When the publication of the journal Tailima started in 1903, he took charge of its editorial page. During his service with the Training College, he acquired proficiency in the English language, and later, joined a private school and taught English there.

Musafir has written twenty-five books. Major portion of this are educational books. The anthology of his poems entitled Kulliyat Musafir was published in 1952 and its second edition was brought out in 1965. This anthology contains his ghazals, mussadas, masnavis, rubais, qitas and kafis. The subjects of his poetry embrace beauty and romance, poignancy and pathos, and morals. Although one comes across the sincerity of feeling in many poems in the Kulliyat, yet his poetry as a whole is bereft of depth of thought which is normally found in the poetry of a good poet.

MUHAMMAD ZAMAN, KHWAJA (Sindhi, b. 1713, d. 1774) was a famous Sufi saint poet of Sindh. He acquired initial knowledge of Arabic and Islamic theology at the feet of his father Haji Abdullah, who was himself a learned scholar. Later on, he went for further studies to Thato, one of the main centres of learning in those days, where he came in contact with a Sufi mystic, Khwaja Abu-al-Masakin Hazrat Shaikh Muhammad Naqshbandi, and became his disciple. After gaining mystic insight from his master, he returned to his village, Lawari. Muhammad Zaman lived a simple and pious life and always remained indifferent to worldly attractions. Many a time he was offered gifts and free lands by Ghulam Shah Kalhoru (who ruled Sindh from 1755 to 1772), but he politely refused such favours. As his fame spread outside Sindh, many seekers of knowledge from distant places used to visit Lawari Sharif to pay homage to this great saint of Sindh. It is said that Shah Abdul Latif Bhitai, a senior contemporary Sufi saint of Sindh, also had great respect for Muhammad Zaman and he went to Lawari Sharif to meet him. There is very little poetry of this Sufi saint which has come to light so far. Abdur Rahim Girhori, one of the main disciples of Muhammad Zaman, compiled the philosophical thoughts and poems of his master in two books written by him in the Arabic language. Fatah-al-Fazi (Achievement of favour) is the collection of 446 preachings of Muhammad Zaman translated into Arabic. The original Sindhi utterances of the saint are not given in the book. Another compilation, Sharah abyat Sindhi (Commentary on Sindhi verses) contains 84 verses in Sindhi with an explanation of their philosophic thought in Arabic. The second book has been translated into Sindhi by Umar Muhammad Daudpota and published in 1939. These Sindhi verses of Muhammad Zaman are gems of Sufi mysticism and have been highly appreciated by critics for their profundity and poetic beauty.

MUHANOTA NAINASI (Rajasthani; b. 1610, d. 1670). Nothing is known about Nainasi's early life and education. It can only be presumed that his father, Mahanota Jayamala, who held a high rank in the Government of Marawad, must have made proper arrangements for his regular education under able and virtuous teachers.

Nainasi conducted a number of successful raids while holding important posts during the reign of Maharaja Gajasimha and Jasavant Simha right from 1632 to 1670. He also worked as a Minister from 1658.

Marawad ra paragana ri vigata and Nainasi ri khyata are the most important monumental works of Muhanota Nainasi. Marawada-ra-paragana-ri-vigata is a historical survey of the different paraganas of the then Jodhpur State. It is a veritable gazetteer containing rich information regarding historical, geographical, economic, agricultural and ethnological details of each paragana, including the achievements of its various noteworthy administrative officers. It is really a unique unprecedented collection of material relating to political, economic, social and administrative history of that region.

His another work, Khyata, is one of the greatest works in Rajasthani historical literature. It was actually planned on a wide and grand scale with the aim of covering the history of all the important Rajput dynasties and the ruling clans and sub-clans of Rajasthan as well as some of the Rajput dynasties in various adjoining regions like Gujarat, Kathiyawad, Bundelkhand and Malawa up to 1660.

Nainasi's Khyata breathes a fearless spirit, and he did not hesitate to expose the weaknesses and failures of even his master plan. No defeats have been concealed therein.

MUHINJE HAYATIA JA SONA ROPA WARQ

Thus Khyata contains many valuable and important details which throw new light directly or indirectly on the life, society, economic conditions and administrative arrangements in those times as well as the superstitions and beliefs of the rulers and of the people of those times. It is more illuminating at times than the Persian histories as far as the history of the Rajputs and their principalities is concerned, and in many cases it can fill up the gaps left after materials from other sources have been utilized. It must be said to his credit that Nainasi has honestly and fully preserved the names of all important contributors to his vast collection of the source material.

Nainasi, due to his sudden end during the course of his gathering the materials for his history of the Rajputs, could not give it the actual shape and as such he has been said to be a historiographer of unfulfilled promise. His language is full of proverbs and idioms, technical terms, and various forms of prose literature of western Rajasthan. The use of traditional syntax, case terminations, prepositions, prefixes and suffixes, verbs, pronouns and appropriate adjectives is superb. The use of short sentences without euphonic combinations, which is the traditional quality of prose can be said to be the evidence of the maturity of his prose.

Nainasi committed suicide along with his younger brother, Sundaradasa, to save themselves from disrepute due to charges framed against them. They were sentenced and penalised for a hundred thousand rupees by Maharaja Jaswant Simha, which they refused to pay and instead embraced death sending their reply to the Maharaja in the form of a doha.

B.M.J.

MUHINJE HAYATIA JA SONA ROPA WARQ (Sindhi) is an autobiography by Popati Hiranandani, which was selected for the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1982. The author has ventured almost in every literary branch and exhibited remarkable interest in myriad subjects and fields of human interest. The present work, with a romantic title meaning 'golden and silver leaves of my life', is perhaps the best among her works.

The striking feature of the narration is that she has sagaciously avoided the mundane details of her birth, her family genealogy and all other details that go with it. She begins with the tragic chapter in her life, depicting the sudden death of her father, a forest officer, of a severe heart attack, leaving the young widow and seven children in the wild world, the authoress just ten years old. She recapitulates the tragic situation when her dying father calls her to his bed and utters his dying testament, "Your elder brother has taken after your mother, a meak and simple boy; you are courageous and brave. I entrust the responsibility of the family to you. Rear up your brothers and sisters so that they come up in life. Then alone I shall be in peace..." This single tragedy greatly affected her life and, perhaps, directed her course, for throughout the autobiography the undercurrent of the tragedy keeps reverberating.

Thus, the family began its troubled course of journey in the vast expanses of the future. They passed through many vicissitudes, suffering, and humiliations at the hands of heartless relatives, who found the orphaned family burdensome even though some were quite generous, loving and helpful.

Her life story reveals her indomitable courage, cool confidence and relentless perseverance. She started earning and supporting her family at the tender age of 14. While at school, she sewed and taught children for a living. After matriculation she became a teacher of music in the same school. She continued her studies side by side and graduated from the Benaras Hindu University with Sanskrit as a special subject, which aroused in her a great interest in the classics of Sanskrit and influenced her creative activity.

Her extraordinary moral strength came from her association at an early age with that great saint, Sadhu T.L. Vaswani, whose discourses she attended uninterrupted for years in her childhood. This acted as a source of inspiration, which stood in good stead in later life. She seems to have developed a fearless rebellious spirit against all incongruities and injustice in society. She remained a champion for woman's cause all her life. For such a crusade the male chauvinists label her as a "woman chauvinist". She says, "I am proud of being a woman".

The unfortunate upheaval attendant upon the partition of India overtook the country. In the autobiography she vividly and pathetically describes the agonising escape in the dead of night in a truck with the womenfolk, from her home in Hyderabad (Sindh) to Mirpurkhas for taking the train to India. The account lingers in the mind.

Popati remained in the teaching profession for a major span of her life and moulded thousands of Sindhi children as ideal citizens, inspiring them to love their language and culture. The account of her experiences in the teaching line is really fascinating, some of them being sour, some gnawing and some very pleasant and revealing.

The chapter on her encounter with first love (and perhaps the last) reads like a poem, full of pathos and eternal beauty. An adolescent, beautiful, pink-cheeked girl in her prime, being accosted every morning at the corner of the street, while going to school, suddenly feels throbbings in her heart. Love has just blossomed, but the lover suddenly disappears and gets married. The flame is extinguished. Maybe, this incident left an indelible impression of man's infidelity on her mind and generated repulsion against all men. She did not marry and preferred to remain a spinster. Though a few offers came her way, they were shattered on the cruel rock of dowry. She abhorred the notion of buying herself a husband. She has treated this most important and sensitive problem of life very boldly and frankly in the chapter "Why did I not marry?"

The account of the struggle of the Sindhis for cultural survival is effectively and colourfully reflected in detail. The Akhil Bharat Sindhi Boli Ain Sahit Sabha, which has remained the platform for the movement and with which she remained associated, and in which she even held responsible positions, is judicially projected in the book.

Her style is lucid, forthright and penetrating. Her wide range of experience and distinctive treatment of every event in her life lend it the seal of her personality's flavour. It is one of the significant works in Sindhi literature.

MU'JAZO (Sindhi) is a form of devotional folk-poetry. The Sindhi term 'mu' jado' (pl. mu'jaza') is derived from Arabic 'mu'jazah' which literally means miracle. Mu'jazo is a lengthy narrative poem akin to 'managibo'. The difference between the two is that while in Managibo a story or an incident of common nature is selected from the life of the prophet or a revered saint to praise his greatness, in mu'jazo his miraculous deed is narrated for glorification. Miracle-stories described in mu' jaza poems have been transmitted orally from one generation to another. The folk-poet who depends upon hearsay is fully convinced of its truth. Similarly, listeners in folk-assemblies also have full faith in such miraculous narratives. Thus, the historical authenticity of these stories is never questioned. The folk-poet, in order to give more authentic touch to his narration, often begins his poem by quoting its source from some religious book or naming some one who had originally told the story. However, it cannot be denied that the authority quoted by the folk-poet is not always historically verified.

The earliest mu'jazo poem that has come to light so far is by Makhdam Ghulam Muhammad Bugai (alive in 1735). Muhammad Hashim Thatvi (1692-1760) wrote a book, Quvvat-al-ashqin, containing a good number of mu'jaza poems which gained popularity. The tradition of composing these poems and reciting them in gatherings of common people has been preserved to this day. Mu'jaza poems are generally long compositions having uniformity of rhyming in a vowel, the technique commonly followed in long narrative poems in Sindhi. Some poets have composed mu'jaza in Persian metres also. The main aim of the poets is to impart knowledge of religious characters of Islam to common people in their mother tongue. The third book brought out under the series of Sindhi Folklore and Literature project, edited by N.A. Baloch, contains 65 selected mu'jaza compositions.

MUJIRIM (Kashmiri). Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' started writing this book in 1959 when novel-writing in Kashmiri language was practically unknown. However, the exigencies of judicial service and other vicissitudes stood in his way and the novel, his first, could be published only in 1969.

Mujrim is the story of a bereaved father, Bashir Ahmad, who is ruthlessly tormented by the police who implicate him in the alleged murder of his young daughter, Hajira, the only offspring he had. Overwhelmed by grief and the subsequent ignominy heaped on him by society, he remains indifferent to the trial and even makes a confession of his guilt at certain stages. He is sentenced to death by the Sessions Court on the charge of poisoning his daughter purportedly to save his family's honour at a time when she was over head and ears in love with a richman's only son living in their neighbourhood. The trial lasts five years during which period Ahmad suffers untold mental torture and loses all will to survive. The sentence is based mainly on circumstantial evidence supported by depositions of eight witnesses. There is, however, no eyewitness.

On the day of judgment Ahmed stands in the court pathetically unmoved and unconcerned. He is lost in a world of his own away from the cruel, matter of fact and mundane life. Following a medical examination, he has been declared of unsound mind. The judge, on doctor's advice, orders his immediate admission to the lunatic asylum and he is carried out of the court. The judge then begins to read his judgment. The climax is reached when he reads out Hajira's last letter unravelling the whole mystery. But justice, no doubt, comes too late for Ahmad and this marks the denouement of the novel.

The plot is quite gripping and suspense is maintained right up to the end. The author is a keen observer of man and matters and has a deep insight into human nature. His characterisation is superb. Description of the locale is perfect and the language used is both homespun and flowery. He has drawn heavily on nature and traditional lore. At places he cuts incisively into the social canker and exposes the shortcomings of our hackneyed legal system. He does not lack humour either, as is illustrated by his dig at the vagaries of human nature. He says, "Kashmiris are like alloy utensils. They perspire at the mere suggestion of a rise in the summer temperature and shiver even before the winter clouds appear in the sky." The failure of the judicial system in one form or another has been the theme of the fiction, but in the novel the author has not deviated from the set legal procedure adopted by the law courts in India to highlight its shortcomings.

Mujrim stirred the imagination of the reading public within months of its publication. Its adaptation as radio and television plays added to its popularity.

MUKA KAVI (Sanskrit). Very little is known about Muka Kavi except that he was born with an impaired speech and therefore, called Muka and regained his lost speech by the grace of the sage Vidyaghana. It is also said that he was underdeveloped in mental faculties and later became a great poet through a sudden revelation of poetic inspiration. His date also is uncertain, though tradition takes him to be a contemporary of Adi Shankara.

Muka Kavi is known to us through his splendid work, Muka-panchashati, also known as Devi-panchashati. It is a religious poem of 500 stanzas in praise and glorification of the goddess Kamakshi of Kanchi. The five shatakas are: Kataksha-shataka, Mandasmita-shataka, Padaravinda-shataka, Arya-shataka and Stuti-shataka. The order of shatakas differs in the manuscripts available today. The Muka-panchashati was first published in the Kavyamala, Part V, in 1888 wherein Muka Kavi is referred to as a comparatively later poet. The work was reprinted by Chowkhamba Bharati Academy, Varanasi, in 1987.

As is apparent from the names of the shatakas the Muka-panchashati appears to be a poem of erotic-religious nature wherein the physical charms and attributes of the goddess Kamakshi like her side-glances (Kataksha), smiles (Mandasmita), lotus feet (Padavavinda) etc. are devotionally praised in melodious strains and embellished diction.

Endowed as it is with five poetic fancies, tender feelings, deep devotion, religious fervency and graceful ornate expression the Muka-panchashati is one of the best religio-lyrical poems of classical Sanskrit. On the one hand it matches the Geetagoavinda of Jayadeva in sweet diction and soft feelings; on the other in the use of difficult grammatical feats and refined artifices of poetics like double entendre (shlesa) etc., it equals the poetry of Bharavi and Magha. A few verses are enough to illustrate the point:

Nilalaka madhukaranti manojnyanasa
Muktaruchah prakatarudhabisanikuvanti
Karunyamamba makaramdati kamakotira
Manye tatah kamulameva vilokanam te

(O Kamakoti goddess, your glance is really a lotus; the black curls in your hair are like black bees, the rays shining from the pearl worn on your beautiful nose are its protruding grown filaments and the mercy on devotees oozing from you is its honey).

Apart from the fancy, imagination, sweet and smooth diction, the grammatical feat of denominative use (namadhatu) is superb. In the next verse we can appreciate the use of the poetic device of contradiction (virodhabhasa) mingled with soothing alliteration (anup-rasa).

Nilo'pi ragamadhikam janayan purarrer.
Lolo'pi bhaktimdhikam dradhayannaranam
Vakro'pi Devi namatam samatam vitamvan,
Kamakshi nrityatu maytitvadapanagapoatah

(O goddess Kamakshi, may your glance dance upon me which, though blue, enhances the redness (love) in the enmity of Pura (Lord Shiva); though it is itself wavering and unstable it strengthens and kindles stable devotion in the mind of your devotees; though it is itself slanting and even, it turns devotees even and straight (they discard their wily ways and become humble) when they bow down in obeisance to you.

Rav. N.

MUKAPANCHASATI (Sanskrit). Panchasati by Muka (literally the dumb one) is a collection of 500 devotional verses on Goddess Kamakshi, divided into five parts, each containing a hundred verses. They are Mandasmita shataka (on the smile of the goddesses), Karakshashataka (on her side-glance), Padaravindashataka (on her lotus-feet), Aryashataka in Arya-metre; and finally stuti shataka. The order of the five sections varies in different manuscripts.

Muka belonged to the South and is sometimes identified with a Shankarcharya known as Mukarbhaka Shankara. The poem portrays the exquisite physical charm of the divine beauty with deep religious fervour which is so characteristic of the Saundaryalahari. The erotic-religious devotion so powerfully expressed in sweet rhymes and the lucidity of style, indeed, remind one of the passages in that poem.

R.T.

MUKBAL, SHAH JAHAN (Punjabi) was a 'kissa' poet. The information regarding the date and place of his birth is not available. Even some of the couplets in the Jangnama that he wrote give very little information. Jangnama was composed around 1947. Mukbal wrote his kissa of Hir in a form which became the most popular metrical form in poetry, simply called 'bait'. This metre had never been used before in the popular Punjabi poetry. At the same time, we cannot easily call this metre an innovation of the poet, because the very sophistication with which it has been used in Mukbal's Hir shows that it cannot be a new invention. Mukbal himself would have mentioned this in case he had used it for the first time.

His language is simple and candid. Persian words are sparingly used. The story is in its conventional mould. Mukbal seems to be the model that Waris adopted for his story and the metrical form. He refers to Hindu customs even to a greater length than Waris. A blend of Hindu-Muslini marriage rites is discernible in his writings.

P.S.K.

MUKHERJEE, AMULYADHAN (Bengali; b. 1902, d. 1984), a renowned educationist, was the author of Bangla

MUKHERJEE, APARESHCHANDRA–MUKHERJEE, SIR ASUTOSH

chhander mulsutra (1932), Sanskrit Prosody: Its Evolution and a score of other essays in English and Bengali on Sanskrit and Bengali prosody. For his pioneering works on prosody, he received Mouat Medal from Calcutta University. He also wrote stories for children, the most popular being his Nabab kahini (1980). He occasionally wrote under the pen-name of Betalbhatta.

A.M.

MUKHERJEE, APARESHCHANDRA (Bengali) was an actor-dramatist associated with the professional stage of Calcutta during the first three decades of the 20th century. Both as a dramatist and as an actor he belonged to the 19th century tradition, and was a follower of Girishchandra Ghosh.

His first drama, Rangila, was published in 1914. It was a lyrical drama, satirical in tone. It was a poor adaptation from English. More adaptations followed but they were mostly mechanical and hardly had any literary merit. They were only intended for the stage.

But he attracted attention as a real dramatist with his Ramanuja. It dealt with the life of Ramanuja, the religious reformer of Southern India. In form he imitated the biographical dramas of Girishchandra Ghosh.

Apareshchandra wrote a number of historical dramas also. One of them is Rakhi-bandhan based on the life of the Rajputs. Though he wrote historical dramas, he had to yield to the influence of the time he lived in. Rakhi bandhan was a ritual which became popular during the Swadeshi Movement in Bengal in 1905. But the theme of the drama Rakhi-bandhan refers to matters of the middle ages of India. Therefore, such dramas are more romantic than historical. His Ayodhyar begam (The begum of Oudh) gained considerable popularity mostly due to its successful stage performance. More in number were his mythological dramas. But the age of mythological drama was already over. Therefore, it could not carry him very far as a dramatist.

As.B.

MUKHERJEE, ASUTOSH (Bengali; b. 1920), novelist and short story writer, was born in Dacca. His father, Pareshchandra Mukherjee, an educationist, failed to draw the attention of his restless son to studies and Asutosh gave up studies at the degree level. This capricious and carefree youth took to one occupation after another—once he became a hosier, at another time a homoeopath and ultimately joined the Jugantar, a daily newspaper, as a journalist. His career as a novelist, however, started a short while ago. His first novel, Kalchakra, had been published when he was twenty-four. The next novel he wrote was Jibantrishna. His first short story, 'Nurse Mitra', published in the monthly Basumati, later on appeared on the screen as Dip jwele jai. Another of his early writings, 'Kalankabati', a short story, published in the monthly Basumati, caused much stir. His first popular and successful novel, Panchatapa, attained screen success. As a rising novelist he was once much patronised by Tarasankar Banerjee. Kal tumi aleya is his other popular novel in which the characters and with them the story breathe and move with the march of time. Another of his significant novels, Nagar pare rupnagar, Dickensian in dimension, puts before us a vivid picture of the fifties and sixties of the current century. His experience of living in a joint family possibly accounts for his lavishness in introducing characters in most of his novels. His popularity rests mainly on lucidity and on the dramatic nature of his novels. He is amoral and is never afraid of life in its nakedness, and like a naturalist he lays it bare. He is a prolific writer who has written about a hundred novels, a good number of stories, short as well as long, five stories for children, about ten scenarios, one play (Chalachal) and two books of essays, Kathamala and Nishiddha bai. The last named book is a long and illuminating discussion on the proscribed books of different countries and of different times. Some of his novels have been rendered into Hindi and Tamil.

FURTHER WORKS: Balakar man, Kichhu chhilo, Abar ami asbo, Alor thikana, Shilapate lekha, Nagar darpane, Khanir nutan man, Sonar harin nci, Jhankar, Ragsbar, Anandarup, Bajikar, Tomar janya, Ami se o sakha, Sabuj toran chhariye, Kacher sajghar, Dinkal Alaka-Tilaka roshnai, Chalo jangale yai, Pratibimbata, Sanjher mallika, Pherari atit, Kumari mata, Pindidar gappo, Lidar bate pindida etc

MUKHERJEE, SIR ASUTOSH (Bengali; b. 1864, d. 1924), a profound scholar and an eminent educationist, was born in Calcutta. He had a brilliant academic career. He stood first in the first class in the M.A. Examination in Mathematics in 1885. In the following year he took his M.A. degree in Physics. A mathematical prodigy as he was, he contributed an article on a mathematical problem to the Cambridge Messenger of Mathematics when he was young and later in 1908, formed the Calcutta Mathematical Society. He also studied law and in 1904 became the Hon'ble Justice of the Calcutta High Court. In 1906 he became the Vice Chancellor of the Calcutta University. His work as Vice Chancellor still endures. He converted the University from a mere examining board into an active centre of teaching and research. In 1914 he established the Post-Graduate College of Science. He also established the Bengali Manuscript Section and introduced the teaching of Indian vernaculars and Fine Arts. As Tagore said, he "touched the Calcutta University with the magic wand of his creative genius in order to transform it into a living organism belonging to the life of the Bengali people". Thus his contribution to Indian literature in general, and Bengali literature in particular, though indirect, cannot be underestimated.

MUKHERJEE, BALAICHAND (Bengali; b. 1899, d. 1979), son of Satyacharan Mukherjee and better known by his pen-name, 'Banaphul', was born at Manihari in the district of Purnea in Bihar. He had his early education at Manihari and Shahebganj, studied medicine and obtained M.B. degree from Patna Medical College. He worked for a short while in a clinical research laboratory, did apprenticeship at Azimganj Hospital, Murshidabad, and finally went to Bhagalpur, Bihar, where he practised medicine until after retirement when he settled in Calcutta, and took to writing as a wholetime job.

Balaichand wrote poems in his school days and the pseudonym he adopted then stuck. At a more advanced age he turned to writing novels. His first novel, Trinakhand, came out in 1935 and his last one, Sandhipuja, appeared in 1972. In the intervening period Balaichand wrote more than forty novels. He gave shape to his experience derived from his life as a man of medicine in Trinakhand (1940) and Hate bajare (1961). He knew men and society in different situations and as such, the procession of characters in his novels has a pleasant novelty and diversity in it. In some of his novels like Kichhukhan (1937), Mrigaya (1940), Ratri (1940), Seo ami (1943), Mandanda (1948), Bhuban Som (1956), Agnishwar (1959) and Rupkatha he moved in different worlds, both real and imaginary, for he did not believe in their separate entities. Balaichand saw the disorder and wreckage caused by the partition of Bengal and the consequent influx of refugees from a fresh angle. The disorder was so pervasive that human values seemed to crumble. From this standpoint his novels, Pancha parba (1954) and Tribarna (1963), indicated a new direction. In novels like Agni (1946) he tried to construct new images on the debris of the old ones and to introduce inspiring values for social rejuvenation. The novelist reached the zenith of success in his three epic novels — Jangam (1943-1945), Sthabar (1951) and Dana (1948-1955). History, geography, sociology, agriculture, aesthetics etc. constituted a wide canvas in them showing in a pageant the stride of civilization in its historical process. Balaichand was a novelist of high merit.

Balaichand had a personal vision of life and an ability to lay bare the crux of human existence in a graphic style. Out of this sensitivity and skill came his short stories. The beginning of his short story seems to be dull and drab, but its ending turns out to be dramatic in many cases. His stories sometimes take homorous forms but there is also pathos mixed with humour. Balaichand's mastery over the art of short-story writing is quite evident in a number of collections he published in his lifetime—Banaphuler galpa (1936), Banaphuler aro galpa (1938), Bahulya (1943) and Bindu bisarga (1944).

Balaichand never aspired to be a major playwright, because he knew it well that the dramatic form was not the appropriate field for his creative talent. Still his occasional experiment with the dramatic form did attain some success. Besides his short plays, the two biographical plays — Shrimadhusudan (1939) and Vidyasagar (1941) speak even to-day of Balaichand's considerable command over the dramatic craft.

Poetry was Balaichand's first love. It was relegated to a lower position with the increasing demand of other literary forms. But it never died out. He wrote poems now and then throughout his life. These poems make pleasant reading. His works, Banaphuler kabita (1929), Angarparni (1940), Chaturdashi (1940), Ahvania (1943) and Karakamaleshu (1949), speak eloquently of the poet in him

J.S.R.

MUKHERJEE, BENOY (Bengali; b.1909) was born in Dacca (now in Bangladesh). He graduated from St. Paul's College, Calcutta, and obtained his Master's degree in Commerce from the University of Calcutta. About 1937 he joined a new Bengali daily, Jugantar, as an Assistant Editor. After about three years, he joined the Bureau of Public Information of the Government of India as an Assistant Information Officer (1940). Later on he became the Principal Information Officer and still later the Founder Secretary of the Press Council. He retired in 1974 but continued to live in Delhi for about a decade. He has now settled in Calcutta.

Benoy has published all his literary works under the pseudonym of Jajabar. The first one, Drishtipat (Glance, 1947), first serialised in Masik Basumati, made him famous overnight. It was described by the publishers as the first Bengali specimen of belles lettres. Drishtipat is neat and polished. If wit, elegance, urbanity and learning are characteristics of a writer of belles lettres, then Jajabar is such a writer par excellence as he possesses these qualities in abundance. His work is neither an essay nor fiction but history, politics and romance rolled into one. To say this, however, is not to minimize the striking artistic merits of the work.

MUKHERJEE, BHUDEV-MUKHERJEE, CHANDRASEKHAR

On the background of Drishtipat is a very important event in the history of the Indian freedom movement: the Cripps Mission of 1942. Around the Mission Jajabar weaves his beautiful descriptions of, and trenchant comments on, men and manners, places and things. Towards the end of the book is presented the sentimental but touching story of the deceiving and jilting of Charudatta Adbarkar by a married woman, Sunanda Banerjee. An attempt has been made to give an air of authenticity to the work by introducing some characters from real life like a Station Director of All India Radio and an eminent Professor of History.

Drishtipat, redolent of literary reminiscences, is full of 'wise saws and modern instances'. The style is remarkable for its incisive quality and epigrammatic brilliance. The writer's actual range may not be very wide but he is wise enough to keep himself within it.

Janantik (An aside, 1952) is a novel but there is not much of a story in it. The technique resembles the stream-of-consciousness fiction. The beautiful heroine Molly Sen is the central figure and her miserable married life the focus of interest. For her misery her husband, Sivnath, who could not forget his first attachment, seems to be primarily responsible. The main narrative is concerned with the staging of a play with which are connected the unfortunate men who are attracted to Molly and are encouraged by her. She remains ultimately elusive and her story has some tragic implications. Jajabar's aphoristic style is found here at its best.

Jhelum nadir tire, like the two earlier works, is also a bestseller. It gives an authentic and fascinating account of India's Kashmir War. Banned in former East Pakistan, the book was translated into Hindi by Manmathanath Gupta in 1960.

FURTHER WORKS: Laghukaran (1964), Hrashwa o dirgha (1973), Jakhan brishti namlo (1983), Khelar raja cricket, Majar khela cricket, Jajabar omnibus (1983).

MUKHERJEE, BHUDEV (Bengali; b.1827 d.1894) was educated at Hindu College along with Michael Madhusudan Datta, Rajnarayan Basu and Shashichandra Dutta. He taught at different schools and then became an additional Inspector of Schools. He was a member of the Hunter Commission (Education Reforms) and the editor of Shiksha darpan o sambadhar and the Education Gazette. In 1885 he became a member of the Bengal Legislative Council. He wrote many books which include essays, stories and novels. The most important of his works are: Aitihāsik upanyas (1857), Achar prabandha (1895), Bibidha prabandha (1895), Sikshabishayak prastab (1856), Purabvrittasar (1858), Swapnalabdha bharatbarsher itihās (1895) etc.

Bhudev was one of the leading intellectuals of his time. The collections of his essays reveal deep insights into social and cultural phenomena of the time. He sought to set up certain norms and standards in writing text books for higher studies.

His novels in the selection, Aitihāsik upanyas, were based upon Contar's Romance of History though he interpreted history in his own way. The first story of the book, Saphal swapna, is a romantic fiction and the second, Anguriya-binimay, deals with an imaginary love-affair between Shivaji and Roshnara, daughter of Emperor Aurangzeb.

P.S.

MUKHERJEE, BIBHUTIBHUSAN (Bengali; b.1899, d.1988), one of the most powerful writers of humorous stories, will remain immortal for his inimitable Ranu series of books. The series consists of Ranur pratham bhag (1937), Ranur ditiya bhag (1938), Ranur tritiya bhag (1937), and Ranur kathamala (1942). Not only the little Ranu's precociousness but also a deep note of pathos for the uncle are embodied in the First Book of Ranu. Equally humorous are the stories of Barjatri (1952). Gansa, Ghotna, Ganesh and K. Gupta have become perennial source of joy to his readers. Though Bibhutibhusan has written novels and essays, his main field of expression is short story. In his short stories he has gradually moved away from humour to seriousness. Two other books of his short stories are Haimanti and Kayakalpa. His humour is well balanced with a freshness of imagination and sanity. His method of narration is simple. His talent is also manifest in the relatively longer stories of Ponur chithi (1954) and Kanchanmulya (1956). Ponur chithi is not a novel but a collection of Ponu's letters. Kanchanmulya is more like a novel because the story is continuous. Bibhutibhusan's first novel is Nilanguria (1945). The central character is Mira. Here Mira's love and vanity are very successfully shown. Some of Bibhutibhusan's other novels are Rikshar gan (1959), Milanantak (1959), Nayan bau (1961) and Rup halo abhishap (1961). Bibhutibhusan has also written an autobiography. Known mostly for his humorous writings, he is undoubtedly one of the very few refined humorists of Bengal. His distinctive style of narration is still unsurpassed.

MUKHERJEE, CHANDRASEKHAR (Bengali, b. 1849, d. 1922) studied Sanskrit in the 'tol' of Thakurdas Vidyaratna for over eight years at an early age. He passed the Matriculation Examination in 1866 and graduated from the Presidency College in 1872. He worked as a teacher and studied law. He then joined the bar. Next he became the editor of a monthly magazine called Upasana. In 1873 'Vidya birambana', his first article, was published in Jnanankur. But he became famous only after the publication of Udbhanta prem (1875), a prose-lyric which he wrote after the sudden death of his wife. Bankimchandra Chatterjee requested him to write for Bangadarshan and 'Shmashame brahman' was published in it. As a powerful essayist and a literary man he became known to all and his many articles on various topics were published in different journals like Gnanankur, Masik samalochak, Sahitya, Malancha, Janmabhumi, Pratima, Upasana, Bharatbarsha etc. He was a well-read man, good singer and quite at home in Sanskrit, English and Persian.

As an essayist and a good prose writer he occupies an important place in the history of Bengali literature.

FURTHER WORKS: Masla bandha kagaj, Strcharitra, Kunjalar maner katha, Rasa granthabali.

Du.M.

MUKHERJEE, DAMODAR (Bengali; b. 1853, d. 1907) wrote about sixteen novels. He was one of the pioneers of and writers in the series 'Monthly Novel' published by the Anusandhan. In this series Damodar contributed several novels. He knew exactly what his readers wanted and tried his best to cater to their taste. Thus he chose to be more an entertainer than a novelist. This can be seen in the way he resurrected the heroines of Bankimchandra. Kapalkundala, for instance, dies at the end of Bankimchandra's novel Kapalkundala. Damodar calls her back to life in Mrinmayi. He wrote another novel called Nababnandini where Ayesha of Bankimchandra's Durgeshanandini is the heroine.

Damodar loved adventure. His novels are romantic tales. But it is a degenerate kind of romanticism as Damodar singularly lacked imagination and art. His language has an excess which impedes the flow and he never rises above the commonplace. More enduring than his novels is his translation of the Srimadbhagavadgita which bears the mark of his scholarship. He edited the journals, Prabaha and Anusandhan. For sometime he also edited the English journal, News of the Day.

MUKHERJEE, DHURJATIPRASAD (Bengali; b. 1894, d. 1961) novelist, essayist, critic, economist and sociologist, taught Sociology and Economics at the University of Lucknow and and later at Aligarh.

Since his early youth, Dhurjatiprasad had been associated with Sabujpatra (1914) edited by Pramatha Chowdhuri and Parichaya (1931) edited by Sudhindranath Dutta. Dhurjatiprasad made his début not only as an essayist but also as a novelist of a new order introducing the stream of consciousness style in Bengali fiction. Antahshila is one such novel. Dhurjatiprasad was also known as a connoisseur of Indian Music and brought out Sur o sangati (1935) a Bengali treatise on music in collaboration with Rabindranath Tagore.

FURTHER WORKS: Chintayasi (Calcutta, 1933); Realist (Calcutta, 1933); Avartta (Calcutta, 1937); Katha o sur (Calcutta, 1938); Mohana (Calcutta, 1943); Mane elo (Calcutta, 1956), Baktabya (Calcutta, 1957); Jhilmili (Calcutta, 1966).

MUKHERJEE, HAREKRISHNA (Bengali; b. 1890, d. 1977), a renowned Vasishnavite scholar, had very little formal education though he made up this deficiency to such an extent that the University of Burdwan awarded him an honorary D. Litt degree in 1974. Much earlier, M.M. Harprasad Sastri had conferred on him the title of 'Sahitya-ratna'. Harekrishna's contributions were largely centred on the Vaishnava literature in general and Jayadeva and Chandidasa in particular. He was also an authority on the theories of 'kirtan' of the Bengal school. Harekrishna during his life-long search for old Bengali manuscripts discovered a great number of them. Some of these have been published.

MUKHERJEE, MANISHANKAR (Bengali; b. 1933) or Shankar, which is his pen-name, is one of the most popular writers of today. Some of his fictions like Kata ajanare and Swargamartya-patal (a trilogy comprising Jana-aranya, Simabaddha and Asha akankha or Chaurangi) have been reprinted several times. This might be regarded as an index of his popularity. He deals with a number of characters from the hitherto unexplored areas of the Bengali middle-class society such as a clerk of a British barrister or a hotel-receptionist or a call-girl. He usually deals with such commonplace people though men or women belonging to the upper stratum of society are not rare. Some of his other well-known books are: Epar bangla opar bangala, Purohit darpan, Nivedita research laboratory, Jog biyog gun bhag, Bitta basana and Tanaya. The last is a trilogy. Shankar's novels are rich in characterisation and psychological insight and his latest writings projecting ironical and trenchant comments and observations on men and things have made them more attractive to the intelligent readers of this work.

MUKHERJEE, PRABHATKUMAR–MUKHERJEE, SARATCHANDRA

MUKHERJEE, PRABHAT KUMAR (Bengali, b. 1873, d. 1932), eminent novelist and short story writer was educated at Jamalpur H.E. School and Patna College in Patna, Bihar, and in 1895 he graduated from the Calcutta University. Thereupon he served the Government of India for a while. In 1901 he left for England. He returned to India as a Barrister-at-Law. Until 1916 he practised law at Darjeeling, Rangpur and Gaya, then returned to Calcutta and became the co-editor of a Bengali monthly, Manasi-o-marmabani. He also worked as a lecturer in the University Law College in Calcutta.

Prabhatkumar used to contribute poems to Bengali journals from his early youth. When he met Rabindranath Tagore the latter inspired him to write short stories and novels. Prabhat followed his advice and became one of the foremost writers of short stories and novels. He travelled widely in different parts of India and came across different people in different walks of life. This varied experience supplied him with materials for his short stories and novels. His works are lively and full of zest for life enlivened with romanticism and humour. He published about thirty works of short stories and novels. Among his novels are; Rama sundari (1908), Nabin sanyasi (1912), Ratna dwip (1915), Jibaner mulya (1917), Sindur kauta (1919), Maner manush (1922), Arati (1924), Satyabala (1925), Sukher milan (1927), Satir pati (1928), Pratima (1928) and Garib swami (1930). Naba katha (1899), Shoroshi (1906), Deshi o bileti (1909), Galpanjali (1913), Galpabithi (1916), Patra pushpa (1917), Gahanar baksa (1921), Hatash premik (1924), Bilasini (1926), Jubaker prem (1928) and Jamata babuji (1931) are collections of his stories.

MUKHERJEE, RAJKRISHNA (Bengali, b. 1845, d. 1886), poet and essayist, taught in several colleges, practised law in Calcutta High court and worked as a translator under the Bengal Government. He was a follower of Bankimchandra. His works include Jaubanodyan ('The garden of youth, 1868), Mitrabilap o anyanya kabitabali (Elegy for the friend and other poems, 1869), Kabyakalap (Poems, the plumes of the peacock, 1870), Kabitamala (A garland of poems, 1877) and Meghduta (translation in verse from Kalidasa, 1882). His book Nana prabandha (1885) is a brilliant collection of philosophical, historical and literary essays.

MUKHERJEE, SAILAJANANDA (Bengali; b. 1901, d. 1976), a contemporary and a friend of Kazi Nazrul Islam and Premendra Mitra, made his début with his story, 'Kaila kuthi' (Coal-farm) which was published in the monthly Basumati in 1922. Sailaja had much cause for unhappiness in his private life, but he never lost his smile. His early work, Atmaghatir diary displeased his grandfather (on his mother's side) Rajsahib Mrityunjay Chatterjee, who had once expressed his desire to give him half of his property. Sailaja left the Rajsahib's house and came to Calcutta. He learnt much from the pungent reality of the city life. His new experience found expression in his Dhvamsapather jatri ora (They are wayfarers on the road of destruction, 1924). But it was Kaila kuthi which brought him fame. He then became associated with such magazines as Kali o kalam and Kallol. He was one of the editors of the latter though for a very short period. In his old age he contributed to the magazine Taruner swapna edited by Tarasankar Banerjee and Malabika Datta. Sometimes in the fifties Sailaja appeared in the world of film with his own story Ami baro habo. Experiences accumulated from the rude reality made Sailaja's writings realistic to the core. He himself admitted that he depended mainly on his own experiences to depict the lives of the coolies. He was not so much interested in illuminating the obscure parts of the unfathomable human mind. It was his intimate relation with the surroundings and his capacity to draw reality with the subtle touches of a painter that account for his success as a short story writer. Even Tagore praised his mastery over expression. Mohitlal Mazumdar and Abdul Odood admired his sense of reality. Buddhadev Bose in his An Acre of Green Grass describes him as 'the most detached writer ever to be born in Bengal,' and says, 'his quietness, as he does his job, is terrible, his description of a murder as unconcerned as that of a mother suckling her child.'

He was appointed Deputy Collector and in 1950 he joined the Indian Administrative Service. As a student he wrote articles on different topics in the journals like Sahakar and Utkal Sahitya. He was one of the contributors to the novel, Basanti and the Sabuja kabita, a collection of poems. He was a zealous co-ordinator of the Sabuja Sahitya Samiti. Though his poems are not remarkable they are still the product of a young ambitious mind having dreams of love and beauty. Pancha pushpa, a short story collection, Ramunja, a biography in story form, MUKHERJEE, SAURINDRAMOHAN (Bengali; b. 1884, d. 1966), who was associated with the Bharati, wrote nearly a hundred books but he is noted mainly for a few of his short stories like 'Diner alo' and 'Thakurjhi'. His theme is mostly love and idiom simple and unpretentious. Some of his collections of stories are Shefali (1909), Nirjhar (1911), Pushpak (1913) and Piyasi (1922). Most of his novels are either translated or adapted from foreign works. Kajari, Andhi and Babla are some of his original works in the genre. He also wrote a few farces adapted from foreign or other writers of which mention may be made of Jatkinchit (from Molière), Grahar pher (from Prabhatkumar Mukherjee's Bulaban jamata), Dashachakra, Rumela, Hater panch and Panchashar.

MUKHERJEE, SUBHAS (Bengali; b. 1919), a major Bengali poet, joined the Communist Party early in life and worked as a journalist. He was imprisoned for two and a half years. He then worked for the trade union in the jute mill area, which is the source of many of the striking images in his poetry. After the split of the Communist Party he remained for sometime with the C.P.I. He no longer belongs to that party. He was a member of the Executive Board of the Sahitya Akademi and Vishavabharati Samsad and is a Secretary of the Afro-Asian Writers' Association. For several years he edited the literary monthly, Parichaya and the children's magazine, Sandesh. He has travelled widely in Asian and East European countries.

Subhas took the critics and the reading public by storm with the publication of the first volume of his poems, Padatik (1940). The wit, the supreme command over the technique combined with the infectious spirit of youth, tremendously impressed Buddhadeb Basu although he was a little apprehensive about the political rhetoric of the poems. Subhas is the first Bengali poet to interpret the world on the basis of his total commitment to Marxism. Agnikon ('Angle of fire', 1948) in its loudness may be stated as the poetic expression of the left adventurist period of the outlawed CPI. Some of the poems of Chirkut ('Chit of paper', 1950) contain memorable images of the Bengal Famine. His next group of poems Phul phutuk ('Let the flowers blossom', 1957) is a definite turning point in his career. The poem which had once echoed Mayakovsky's line 'now's no time for a lover and his lass', now declares 'Whether flowers blossom or not/It's springtime'. From now on his poems, although lacking in former militancy, get charged with deeper humanity. His translation of the poems of the Turkish poet Nazim Hikmet influenced the technique of the Phul phutuk group and his subsequent collections of poems deeply. Poetic logic moves through sequences of images; different types of metaphors make their appearances; rigidity of metrical discipline is mostly replaced by a tense gadya kabita 'poem in prose'. A sort of tight-lipped reticence is structured in the body of the lean, naked poetry, despite the presence of the narrative element. For Jato durei jai (1962) Subhas received the Sahitya Akademi award in 1964. The next collection is named after his finally achieved long autobiographical poem Kal madhumas (1966). He has since published four other collections: Ei bhai ('Oh brother', 1971), Chhele gecche bane ('The boy has gone to the forest', 1972), Ektu pa chaliye, bhai ('Brother, let's walk a little faster', 1979), and Jal saite ('Collecting water', 1981). Humour and pathos, passion nostalgia balance each other in his poems. The less successful ones of this intensely socially conscious poet, this poetic chronicler of his times, occasionally lapse into versified journalism, but the best take wings as exemplified by his poem Jacchi ('Am going') of the last collection.

He has translated, apart from two volumes of poems by Nazim Hikmet, one volume each by Pablo Neruda and by the Bulgarian poet, Nikola Vaptsarov. Among others, he has translated Solzhenitsyn's One Day in the Life of Ivan Denisovich. His only original novel Hanras (1973) transmutes his experiences as a political activist. He has several volumes of travelogues to his credit and some books for children.

Bankimchandra Chatterjee. Trailokyanath did not receive much formal education. This self-taught man had diversified interests. He came in contact with Debendranath Tagore and was appointed a teacher in a school at Sahajadpur in the district of Pabna. In 1868 at the age of twenty-one he accepted the post of a police Sub-Inspector in Cuttack. He then became the editor of the monthly magazine, Utkal shubhankari in Cuttack. Even as early as that he could think of the unification of India, a country with many languages, with the help of Hindi. The next phase of his life began when he came in touch with William Hunter. In 1870 he was appointed Head Clerk in the office of the Bengal Gazetteer. He helped in editing The Annals of Bengal, the Statistical Account of Bengal, Local Gazette etc., and worked for the collection of Bengali manuscript records under the supervision of the Statistical Survey of Bengal. Trailokyanath later joined the museum of Calcutta as its Assistant Curator. The chequered career of Trailokyanath obviously added prismatic beauty to his writings which can be compared only with those of Rajendralal Mitra. Trailokyanath is mainly known to us as the writer of fantasy. His world of fantasy presented many interesting characters, one of whom is Damarudhar. As a writer he ran from one corner to another in the realm of knowledge. His literary works include Kankabati (1893), Sekaler katha (1894), Bhut o manush, Phokla digambar, Muktamala, Maina kothai, Major galpa, Paper parinam and Damarucharita. Trailokyanath's sense of humour and fantasy is unique in that he could weave through them a picture of life which is at once interesting and improbable.

MUKKUDAL PALLU (Tamil) is a poem of unknown authorship. The 'Pallu' poem is a new genre in the Tamil language of the 17th-18th centuries. Its literary output was influenced by the changing political times and social milieu. This period was one of great political unrest when there was no paramount sovereign power anywhere in the Tamil country and only petty rulers were having sway over small principalities. No sustained great poetry was possible because of the uncertainty of living conditions and poets, however great or dedicated, had no patronage from any high quarter and had to fend for themselves. They had to survive and so they sought to cater to the masses so that they could get popular support. The many types of operatic poems such as the pallu, 'kuravanji' and nondi-natakam' were evolved in this political and social context.

Pallu is a poem portraying the life of the average farm labourers called pallar in the farm and highlighting their joys and sorrows. The first popular pallu poem is probably 'Mukkudal pallu' in 175 verses in the kalippa and sindu metres where the sindu songs were always sung to tunes and danced too. It contains a short story element. There is a farm manager for the land of the local shrine and a farm labourer with two wives. The poem is an account of the jealousy of these two women. It opens with the introduction of the women called 'palli' and their husband the 'pallan'. They together invoke the Lord for rains. There is a shower and the river is in floods. The pallan is infatuated with the younger wife and naturally the jealous elder woman reports to the manager that the pallan has neglected farm work. The manager impales him. However, seeing his miserable plight, she secures his release and the farm work is done. There is a good crop. But the jealousy between the women is not abated. They continue to abuse one another. However, good sense prevails in the end; they get reconciled and praising the Lord, live happily with their husband.

Mukkudal pallu was written towards the end of the 17th century in honour of Alankar, Lord Vishnu enshrined at Mukkudal, a shrine located at the confluence of three rivers in the Tirunelveli district. Ennayina-pulavar of the 18th century made a dramatised version of Mukkudal pallu. The poem is the most popular and most classic of its kind as it was always the text for a community dance among the labouring classes. It is strange that the manager was always the direct butt of ridicule for the labour class even in those days. The poem contains considerable good poetry and very happy turns of expression. More than any other piece of literature, this has even passed into the folk-literature of the area for their community dance of 'kolattam' and 'kummi'.

This poem has inspired a large number of similar poems in the next century. Poems have been written on all deities such as Shakti, Murugan and Vishnu and also petty patrons. Three pallu poems have been written from Jaffna. There are two other such poems celebrating the Vaishya and Vishvakarma communities.

MUKTA, PRAFULLACHANDRA OJHA-MUKTAKA-GUJARATI

MUKTA, PRAFULLACHANDRA OJHA (Hindi, b. 1910), a novelist, short story writer, playwright, journalist, travelogue-writer, and translator, had no occasion to receive any formal education worth the name as he was drawn at quite an early age into the revolutionary storm unleashed by Gandhi. All his education was naturally, therefore, self-acquired, and acquired directly from the experience of life. Mukta, as his pen-name suggests, defied all restrictions on freedom of expression imposed by foreign rulers, and wielded his pen to fight against political, economic and social injustice perpetrated by the aliens and their Indian henchmen.

Mukta wrote eight novels, three volumes of short stories, a travelogue, and several radio plays that are social, psychological and romantic in their themes. He served the All India Radio as Hindi Adviser and later as producer. He was also an able editor, and devoted himself to journalism when the profession was fraught with grave dangers of repression. In 1936, as an idealistic youth, he published a journal, Bijli, from Patna. It was followed by another journal, a literary one, named Bharati, in 1937. Paucity of funds, however, proved the undoing of his journalistic venture. Later, he collaborated with Agyeya in launching another literary monthly, Avanti. It catered to the intelligentsia, but had to face the same fate as did the earlier ventures.

Mukta's notable books are: Patjhar, Pap-punya, Sanyasi, Lalima, Dharm, Talaq, Jailyatra, Do din ki duniya. Amongst his stories 'Mein phir aaoongi' is the most acclaimed one. Dub aur pagdandi, Dhabbe, Ghattaen, Choorian, Pukar, Pratishodh, Kati unglian, Siskiyan are amongst his better known dramas. Amongst his Radio plays 'Prakash ki vijay', 'Duniya khari hai', 'Ashwamedh', 'Doshi kaun', 'Visad ki chhaya', 'Tuta hua admi', 'Tuta hua main' were well received by the listeners.

Mukta is a significant translator too, and he has translated into Hindi books from English, Sanskrit, Bengali and Gujarati. He is respected for the forthrightness of his views and the rich subtlety of his style.

V.T.

MUKTAKA (Apabhramsha) is said to have enjoyed an independent literary status in the seventh century, although the earliest available Apabhramsha works do not go farther back than the eighth century. In Mukta, Doha, Chaupai, and other miscellaneous metres were widely used. Of them all, Doha was the most popular. The great poet Swayambhu himself defined a few miscellaneous metres as well as the two main forms of Apabhramsha poetry, Samdhi Bandha and Rasa Bandha. Very likely, Rasa Bandha was used in narrative poetry. A Rasa composition in Ghattas, Chaddanikas, pajjhatrikas or other well-arranged metres is usually quite satisfying. Samdhi Bandha served the purposes of a wide range of narratives, such as the epic, the biography, the religious narrative. In a Samdhi Kavya, a book was composed in several cantos, each of which was further divided into twelve to twenty well-defined units, resembling verse-paragraphs (Kadavakas). This Kadavaka was peculiar to Apabhramsha poetry, and was eminently suitable for shaping narrative themes. It influenced the Sufi Premakhyanakas and the Ramacharitmanas of Tulsidas in early Awadhi poetry. When one thinks of religious and devotional poetry in Apabhramsha, one is struck by two works in particular, Paramappapayasa and Yogsar by Joindu (Yogindra Deva). Paramappapayasa is divided into two sections. The first section has 123 dohas and the second 214 stanzas (mostly dohas), dealing with the theme of liberation and self-realization. Yogsar in 108 stanzas, mostly dohas, has the same theme. Ram Simha's Doha pahuda is also concerned with the subject of spiritual enlightenment.

Buddhists too, like the Jains, had some mystical works in Apabhramsha. Kanha and Sarha both wrote in the tradition of the later Mahayana Buddhism. The Doha Kosas of these two authors are well known. Besides this, we have some miscellaneous writings also. Savayadhammadoha (Skt. Shrivakadharmadoha) of Lakshmidhara (15th-16th century) explains in a popular way the religious duties of a Jain householder. Samjammanjari of Maheshvara (13th century), a small poem in 35 dohas on self restraint; Charchari and Kalamarupakulaka of Jinadatta Suri (1076-1152); and devotional hymns like Satya-puramandana Mahavirotsaha by Dhanpala (11th century); and Jayatihuana of Abhayadeva (11th century) are other important works. Similarly, Upadesarasayana-rasa of Jinadatta Suri (1076-1155) is a sermon in eight verses, praising the Guru and genuine religious practices.

Apart from doha, we find many other forms also in Apabhramsha, such as kulaka, chaupai, puja, aarti, samasu, samdhi pathdi, paddhadia, pada, geet, anupreksha, jaimala, and allegory.

In the miscellaneous Mukதாகas of Apabhramsha we find both erotic and religious-didactic themes. Even in Kalidasa's Vikramoravashiya, Abhinavagupta's Tantrasar and king Bhuj's Saraswati Kantabharana we find the use of Apabhramsha verses. The following couplet from Dhola Maru ka duha shows the impact of Apabhramsha poetry on even early Rajasthani:

Bhalla hua to mariya bahini mahara kantu,
Lajjein tu vayassihau jai bhagge gharu emtu.

(O sister, it is well that my husband has died fighting bravely in the battle-field. Had he come home wounded, I would have felt ashamed in the company of my friends).

D.S.

MUKTAKA (Gujarati). The earliest literary form in Gujarati literature is the muktak. It is a poetic form derived from the Sanskrit language, but its form is as much 'folk' as it is 'classical'. Both the 'classical' and the 'folk' traditions are found in the muktak and the oldest extant muktaks in the Gujarati language seem to have elements of both the traditions. The outstanding characteristics of the muktak are that it has four 'feet' and a manner of presentation with a striking appeal. Everything that is the subject of human experience can be the subject of muktak. The author of Dhvanyaloka sings of the glory of the muktak by describing it as something which is perfect in itself (Muktaram anyena lingitam 'Lachan', lines 3-7).

MUKTAKA-HINDI-MUKTAKA-MALAYALAM

In Gujarati literature, the muktak is found both as a literary work in itself and as a part of some other literary work. In the literature of folk tales, it appears as a part of the tale. The dohas contained in them Chandra's Piddhapahem are generally ancient Muktaks of the Gujarati language, arranged in the form of a volume.

Besides these, there are muktaks which are extant in the oral tradition of folklore and enshrine within them 'dohas', 'Lokoktis' (Proverbs) and other forms; they also seem to be parts of a very old tradition.

The oldest known metre of the muktak is the doha. Chronologically speaking, metres such as sortho, sakhi, chaunai and other metres have also been employed in its composition. The muktak in a traditional heritage acquired at the time of the rise and development of the Gujarati language and has been, upto this date a consistently developed poetic form.

No.P.

MUKTAKA (Hindi). The word 'muktak' means a poem which is independent of any other poem. The Indian poetics classify poetry into 'prabandha' (epic) and 'muktak'. Vamana has used the term 'Anibaddha kavya' (unbounded poetry) for it. The author of Dhvanyalok defines this poetic form as one which is capable of giving pleasure (rasa) without having any sequential context. Such a view of the genre suggests that it lacks in unity and narrative design. Hemachandra in his Sabdanushasan expands the idea further to include in the genre all miscellaneous lyrical poems.

Though the Indian Acharyas took note of this genre they did not dwell much upon its structural pattern. The western critics, on the other hand, classified poetry into two classes: subjective and objective (or narrative) poetry. The former includes the lyric which may be said to be an equivalent of a muktak, although there is a difference, since a muktak can be both subjective since it aims primarily at self-expression. A lyric is more intensive in its spirit than a muktak.

In Hindi, the muktak genre includes lyrics. Babu Gulabrai has classified it into two 'pathya' (that which is only to be read) and 'geya' (that which can be sung). The latter is what is called a lyric. Acharya Ramchandra Shukla describes the 'prabandha kavya' as a vast forest and the muktak as a bunch of flowers.

The Hindi muktakas have a wide range and differ in form and content from their counterpart in Sanskrit. They have been composed on the varying patterns of metre and prosody, theme, 'raga' and 'padas'. Hence it is difficult to number their kinds in Hindi literature. If during the 'Adi Kal' and medieval period muktakas followed the tradition of songs and padas, in modern Hindi poetry it may be written in the manner of 'Ghazal' or 'Rubayi' of the Urdu and Persian tradition, or odes and sonnets and elegies of the western tradition. Hindi has however left such Sanskrit muktakas as 'Yugmaka', 'Visheshak', 'Kalapaka', 'Kulaka Kosha'. It has, however, adopted the traditions of Pali and Prakrit in the forms of 'Satasai', 'Hajara', 'Pachasa', 'Bavani', 'Kakahara', 'Akharavata', etc. The muktakas following the metrical pattern of duha or doha of Apabhramsha are plentiful. Dola maru ra duha, Tulasidas's Dohavali, Dularelal Bhargava's Dulare dohavali are some well-known examples. Giradhardas and Deendayal Giri chose 'Kundaliya', while Rahim 'Baravai' and 'Chchappaya'.

The musical and folk lyrics have also shaped the muktakas. 'Lavani', 'Khayala', 'Charchari', 'Mukari', 'Phaaga' etc. are some of the examples. The whole of the 'Riti kal' displays the wealth of muktak poetry. In the modern age, the study of the romantic poets of the West ushered in the vogue of such lyrical kinds as sonnet and elegy etc. Jayashankar Prasad wrote odes both in 'Brijbh-asa' and 'Khari Boli'. Sumitranandan Pant, Suryakant Tripathi 'Nirala', Makhanlal Chaturvedi, Mahadevi Verma and others wrote innumerable lyrics on various topics. The descriptive poems of the Dwivedi age were bypassed by the superior lyrical fervour and style of 'Chhayavada'. The trend of 'New poetry' in the modern age is inclined more towards the muktaka than towards the prabandha kavya. Numerous experiments are being made in this form to-day.

MUKTAKA (Malayalam), is an isolated stanza conveying a complete sense, and expressing a mood effectively or picturing a scene from nature or life. Such verses were there in the early manipravala literature of the 14th and 15th centuries also, but their the main concern was love and lust.

The third quarter of the 19th century produced a new school of poetry in Malayalam which is often called the Venmani School. Observation of life seen around, use of pure Malayalam along with naturalised Sanskrit words, a tone of relaxation, easy flow of diction, euphony in writing, reflection of medieval life, etc. are the characteristics of the Venmani School. Humour, light-heartedness, and clarity in composition are evident in this poetry. Nambudiri culture is predominant in poetry. Venmani Nambudiris (1844-1893), Puntottam (1857-1946), Koun-gallur poets (1864-1913), Pandalam Kerala Varma and a number of other poets belong to this school. Vallattol, and Ullur are also successors in the field. A large number of quatrains were written during the period. There was a simultaneous movement, 'aksharashloka', a hobby of scholars and poetry-lovers, who took turns to quote from memory stanzas beginning with the first letter of the third line sung by the previous person. They learnt by heart a lot of stanzas suitable for aksharashloka and this tradition is still retained by some experts in various parts of Kerala.

Another field of interest for poets was 'samasyapurana'. This also paved the way to the writing of a lot of verses. This practice also is being continued in journals like the Bhashaposhini. Competition for writing poems on some theme was also a regular feature in the literary circles. All these promoted composition of 'muktaka' poems in Malayalam. Poets used to write letters in quatrains or couplets in Sanskrit or Dravidian metres. And there was a poetry-magazine too, called Kavana kaumudi edited by the later scholar-poet Pandalam Kerala Varma. That also served as a vehicle for the 'muktaka' style of poetry.

The 19th century muktaka poems were not of a single milieu. They depicted life in its multiple manifestations. Works like Kavipushpamala (which represents each poet as a flower) by Venmani Mahan are also notable assets of the period. The gentle poetic touches, clear meaning, emotional content and beautiful diction keep the muktaka tradition alive and healthy. Amidst the multiplicity of poetic traditions in Malayalam, the muktakas are highly individual and expressive.

MUKTAKA (Prakrit). The credit for the composition of muktakas goes to Prakrit poetry rather than to Sanskrit poetry. This view is held by Anandavardhana (about 850) and other rhetoricians. King Bhoja (11th century), who holds that there is only one dominant sentiment, namely the erotic, in poetry, quotes the largest number of Prakrit stanzas in his Sarasvatikanthabharana and Shringaraprakasha. The simple Arya metre (also known as Gatha), a special metre employed in Prakrit lyrical poetry for songs, appears to have belonged primarily to Prakrit poetry and later borrowed by Sanskrit poetry. Scholars have preferred to compose their poetical works in Prakrit because, as a popular dialect of the people, it was supposed to have a greater emotional appeal than Sanskrit. The great poet Dandin (7th century) in his Kavyadarsha calls Maharashtri Prakrit as the most elegant dialect containing pearls of wise sayings. Jayavallabha, the compiler of Vajjalagga, a well-known Prakrit anthology, has termed Prakrit poetry as charming, dear to young ladies and characterised with erotic sentiments. 'If that is so, who would like to read Sanskrit poetry' he asks:

He further compares Prakrit poetry with nectar. In this connection one may recall Govardhana (11th century) who asserted boastfully that he had carried over to Sanskrit erotic poetry which till then had found elegant expression in Prakrit only.

Muktaka literally means, detached, isolated, separate or independent. Muktaka poetry manifests itself as lyric poetry depicting a momentary sentiment, or an instant situation. Dandin has stated in his Kavyadarsha (1,13) that each and every stanza of muktaka is able to create fascination in the mind of cultivated reader. The rhetoricians have distinguished between sargabandha (divided into chapters), also known as mahakavya (great poetry), and muktaka. The former, which is predominantly epic, is a long narrative and its stanzas are dependent on each other (nibaddha). The latter type of poetry is lyric, expressing individual emotions, employing independent stanzas (anibaddha), presenting lively scenes or emotions, having no continuity of a narrative. Thus each stanza of this of poetry is complete in itself. It is a short composition with its effect more subtle and less comprehensive. The composer of muktaka poetry expresses his feelings with conciseness in a few selected words in an effective language. Prakrit poetry is essentially secular as it deals with worldly wisdom, and is predominantly erotic. Anandavardhana, while discussing muktaka poetry in his Dhvanyaloka, quotes musical stanzas from the well-known Amarushataka, composed by a lyric poet Amaru, with the remark that each of his stanzas conveys so much of sentiment that each of them appears like an independent work in miniature. It is believed that this immortal composition of Amaru was greatly influenced by Prakrit poetry. Excellent love poems were composed in Prakrit, out of which Hala's Sattasai (1st century A.D) is the oldest, and the chief composition of muktaka poetry is in Maharashtri dialect. Here we notice a spirit of closeness to life and common realities, hardly to be seen in Sanskrit poetry. This excellent anthology of love poems has undoubtedly exercised great influence on the later lyric writers of Sanskrit. Apabhramsha and Hindi literature of Riti kala. Vajjalagga is another Prakrit anthology composed by Jayavallabha. It is a collection of sayings of famous poets like Hala and others on matters concerning morality and worldly wisdom, thought it contains two-thirds of erotic verses. A certain lady in love gives expression to her feelings of anguish on account of love. She requests the Moon, who is full of nectar, to touch her with the same rays (hands) with which he had touched her lover, sojourning in a distant land. Another lady whose husband was to go on a journey abroad the next day, requests the Night, "My hard-hearted husband is going away early in the morning tomorrow, O goddess Night! extend yourself so that there never comes the dawn".

Thus the Prakrit poets have contributed a good deal to lyrical poetry.

MUKTAKA (Sanskrit) is a complete poem in a single stanza. According to the Sahityadarpana, it belongs to the class of 'shravya kavya' or poetry meant for hearing only. Vishvanatha Kaviraja, the author of this most remarkable work on Sanskrit rhetoric, says that when versified words assume a complete poetical shape, both in form and in content, without being related to any other, it becomes a muktaka. Two such independent poems constitute yugmaka, three sandanika, four kalapaka and five kulaka. Keith prefers to describe it as 'single verse'. The contents of the muktakas are varied, through erotic proverbs find their best mode of expression in them. Religious and philosophical themes are also found in the muktakas. The following example of the muktaka verse has been given by Vishwanatha:

Sandranandamanantam avyayamajam yadyoginopi kshanam, sakshat-kartumupasate prati muhurthyanaikatanah param;
dhanyasta Mathurapuriyuvatayastad brahma yah kautukad alینگanti samalapanti shatadha karshanti chumbanti cha

(Blessed are the young ladies of Mathurapuri who with glee embrace and kiss many a hundred time the supreme being and converse mirthfully with Him, that blissful, infinite, undecaying self-born Brahman whom the Yogis intending to visualise for a while engage themselves at every moment in deep meditation).

N.N.B.

MUKTAKA (Telugu) belongs to the division of 'shravya kavyas'. Vinnayakota Peddaya Mahakavi in his Kavyalankara chudamani defines muktaka as an independent poem, without any link whatever with previous or the next poem in contrast to what is seen in the kavyas. Muktaka is self-sufficient in respect of 'rasa' and 'bhava'. It is an entirety in itself in the subject of muktaka. 'Chatuvu' is considered to be a synonym of muktaka. Gathasaptashathi written in Prakrit by Hala is a garland of seven hundred muktakas. Of the scores of Telugu renderings of Gathasaptashathi, the translations of Srinatha (16th century), Rallapalli Ananta Krishna Sarma and Vesireddy Venkatasubhaiah acclaimed popularity. 'Shatakas' can be considered muktakas but for the rule of 'makuta'. The Panchashati by Viswanatha Satyanarayana and the Panchashati by Pydipati Subbarama Sastri are the original muktaka compositions in Telugu. Nanduri Ramakrishnamacharya's Pragati gita is a bunch of muktakas of varied hues. 'Ekkati' is the correct Telugu equivalent for muktaka. Ekkatlu written by Kalaprapurna Tummala Sitarama Murthy are the best muktakas in Telugu literature of the present day. Munamma padalu by Arudra, Narlavari mata by Narla Venkateswara Rao, Kiranalu-keratalu by Tirumala Srinivasacharya may also be considered as muktakas.

MUKTANANDA (Gujarati; b. 1761, d. 1830) was a monk belonging to the 'Swaminarayan' sect. An offshoot of the non-dualistic sect of Ramanuja, he has written philosophical poems propagating the non-dualistic doctrine in his longer poems like 'Dharmamrut', and has also written love songs Prem gita depicting various phases and moods of love of Krishna and 'gopis'. He is at home in both types of poems. Though himself a monk his love lyrics are erotic. In his poem 'Uddhavgita' he describes the pangs of separation of Radha and gopis, after Krishna has left for Mathura. Krishna sends Uddhav as his emissary to console Radha and gopis. Uddhav goes to them and asks them to take a philosophical attitude and concentrate on formless god, but he returns fully convinced that, devotional approach is far superior to philosophical approach, because he feels that gopi's attitude was more realistic. Many poems are written in medieval Gujarati literature on this episode of the Bhagavata, and the form of the poem is known as 'bhramarkavya'. Muktananda's Uddhavgita is recorded as one of the top ranking bhramar kavyas. His didactic poem 'Satigita' denounced the practice of Sati and asks widows to divert their love for husband to love for god. In his Ramlila he has depicted the childhood of Rama.

MUKTIBODH, GAJANAN MADHAVA (Hindi; b. 1917, d. 1969) was born at Shivpuri, district Gwalior. The family took its name from one of his ancestors, Mugdha-bodh or Mutkibodh, who had written a metaphysical treatise during the Khilji period. Educated at Ujjain and Indore, he started off as a school teacher. For some time he was on the staff of the All India Radio also. One of the notable events of his life was the proscription of his book, India: History and culture, after being approved as a text-book.

Muktibodh is one of the most talked about poets of the New Poetry movement, and his poems in Tar Saptak are an exercise in his search for identity. His poetry, on the whole, is the poetry of suffering and torture. He suffered greatly in life. Deprivation, personal tragedies, uncertainties, political harassment, all these clouded his life and filled him with a sense of uprootedness and dissatisfaction. But the main voice of his poetry is progressive and it goes beyond. This voice is predominant in the poems of Tar Saptak, Chanda ka munh tedah hai and Bhuri bhuri khak dhul. His sympathy with the lower classes and the exploited people is very much eloquent in poems like 'Punjivadi samaj ke prati' and 'Nash devata' and short stories like 'Vipatra'. His personal sufferings could not wreck him and he stood firm in the vicissitudes of life and his sensibility as a writer. Because of his close awareness of life, he has given a powerful expression to contemporary situations. Sometimes this awareness has been metamorphosed into fantasy on the level of creative process, blending reality and imagination into one single whole.

Muktibodh is unique among the poets of Nai Kavita because of his poetic technique. He regards fantasy as a daughter of experience. In his images, expressing the mental states by colours, he uses images of black, dark, brown and saffron shades. He has also used images drawn from the primitive, puranic, historical, cultural, and industrial backgrounds.

Though primarily a poet, he has written short stories and criticism also. A film based on his life, Satah se uthata hua adami, was produced recently, and his complete works have been published as Muktibodh granthavali (5 Vols.). His works include (1) Poems: Poems in Tar Saptak, 1943, Chanda ka munh tedah hai 1954, Bhuri bhuri khak dhul. (2) Stories: Katha ka sapana, 1967, Vipatra 1970, Satah se uthata hua adami 1971, (3) Diary: Ek sahityik ki dairy 1964, (4) Criticism: Kamayani: ek punarvichar 1961, Nayi kavita ka atma sangharsha tatha anya nibandh 1964, Naye sahitya ka saundarya shastra 1971, Akhir rachna kyon 1982.

MUKTIBODH, SHARATCHANDRA (Marathi; b. 1921, d. 1984) was a poet, novelist and critic. He was reputed as a writer with a commitment to the society through Marxism. After passing his M.A. in 1947 from Nagpur University he joined Government service as Deputy Director, Languages Department, and then from 1957 upto his retirement in 1979 he was a lecturer at Nagpur Mahavidyalaya.

Muktibodh came to lime-light with a book of verse of his own, Navi Malwat (1949). His poetry depicts the revolutionary thought of a new social order. His personality projected in his poetry is the inner emotional dynamism mixed with an emotional commitment and broad sympathy for the society as a whole. His second collection of poems was Yatrik (1957) showing him in a retrospective mood. Though optimistic, he comments on two poles of human life—life and death, giving them their due importance.

Most of his poems are revolutionary in spirit.

As a novelist, Muktibodh has a unique place in Marathi fiction. Kshipra (1954), Sarhadda (1962) and Jan he olatu jethe (1969) are his three novels which portray growth of an ordinary man's personality the different stages of boyhood, adolescence and youth. Vishu, the hero, in his boyhood experiences the death of his father, and is disheartened and defeated in his commitment to human values. At the second stage (Sarhadda) he is disturbed by social injustice and finding no solution to remove it, he is dragged in the freedom struggle as he thinks that the British rule is responsible for this evil. Finally, when freedom is within reach he suspects that the bureaucracy will not let the democratic spirit thrive. So he decides to switch over to teaching in a national school. In this trilogy he has tried to depict war atmosphere, suppression of common man and his search for finding a way out.

Muktibodh has earned a reputation as a critic also. His book Srushti, Saundarya ani sahityamulya got the Sahitya Akademi Award of the year 1979. Kahi nibandh (1963) and Jeevan ani sahitya (1972) are two collections of his critical essays.

Though not a popular writer, Muktibodh's contribution to literature will never be overlooked by Marathi intelligentsia.

MUKUNDAN, M. (Malayalam; b. 1942) was born in Mahe in North Malabar. He has a diploma in French language and literature, and is presently working in the French Embassy, New Delhi.

Mukundan is one of the prominent modern fiction writers in Malayalam. His stories are a protest against the realistic and romantic traditions in fiction. In his stories realism and fantasy are interwoven. He feels that imitating contemporary reality is impossible, and what a writer can do is to comment on the present condition through allegory, myth and parable.

In 1974 he won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award for his novel I lokam atiloru manushyan. His Mayyazhip-puzhayute tirangalil won the M.P. Paul Award in 1976.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels: Akashattinte chuvattil (Kottayam, SPCS, 1969); Delhi (Trichur, Current Books, 1969); Avilayile suryodayam (Trichur, Current Books, 1970); Kuttam tetti meyunnar (Calicut, Poorna Publications, 1975); Sita (Kottayam, SPCS, 1977); Criticism: Ertanu adhunikata (Calicut, Poorna Publications, 1981); Collections of short stories: Vitu (Current Books, Trichur 1967); Nadiyum toniyum (Trichur, Current Books, 1969); Veshyakale ningalkkorambalam (Kottayam, SPCS, 1971); Haridvaril

MUKUNDRAJ (Marathi; b. 12th century) was a pioneer Marathi poet in Yadav era, who was born one hundred years before Sant Jnaneshwar. Viveksindhu a treatise discussing the philosophy of the 'Shankar ved', was written by Mukundraj in the year 1188. Mukundraj was the first Vedanti Bhashyakar. Madhvacharya (1199) and Vallabhacharya (1401) were the only two Vedanti Bhashyakars after Mukundraj.

Mukundraj revolutionised the social thought by boldly preaching that it was not absolutely essential to discuss Vedic philosophy only in Sanskrit. It was he who first wrote the philosophy of the Vedas in Marathi, and brought it to the common man.

The Viveksindhu is divided into two parts. It is highly philosophical in content, but is simplified for the understanding of the common man. Mukundraj was the first scholar who combined the 'Vedic' cult with the local Marathi religious cult. He derived the spirit of 'Vedanta', the knowledge of the Upanishads from the Vedic literature, and advocated spread the Advait Siddhanta in the Marathi language for the first time. His writings bear a close resemblance with those of Sant Jnaneshwar.

He belonged to the court of King Jayantpal, for whom he wrote his immortal and socially revolutionary works.

MULANI MULSHANKER HARINAND (Gujarati; b. 1867, d. 1957) was a playwright. He got his secondary education in Junagadh, and thereafter, pursued intensive study of Sanskrit and English privately. In 1886 he joined Satyavakta, a weekly, in Bombay and also, undertook the job of transcribing copies of plays in Mumbai Gujarati Natak Mandali. It was during this time, too, that he started writing songs for plays. His knowledge of old folk-tunes and metres helped him considerably in this regard. His songs in the play Kuleen kanta became very popular. He had also started writing plays after trying his hand at the composition of songs meant for plays, and all of his plays were staged. In recognition of his contribution to the theatre, he was honoured by Gujarat Sahitya Sabha of Ahmedabad during its session of Rangbhoomi Parishad.

Among his most successful and popular plays, mention may be made of Raj-bij (1891), Ajabkumari, Shri Krishna-charitra, Saubhagya-Sundari, Dev-Kanya (1909), Jugal Jugari, Vikramcharitra, etc. Many such plays have remained unpublished so far.

His plays present before us a vivid picture of contemporary events along with mythological and historical episodes, and acquaint us with the conflict arising out of mutual human relations. His songs and pointed dialogues come out very effectively on the stage. In the history of Gujarati stagecraft, he occupies a prominent place as a playwright as well as a composer of songs meant for plays.

MULASHUDDHIPRAKARANA (Prakrit), also called Sthanakani, by Pradyumna Suri (11th century) is a Shvetambara Jain tract dealing with religious and didactic topics, and consisting of two hundred verses. Pradyumna Suri was the spiritual teacher of Gunasena Suri, whose disciple Devachandra Suri wrote a Sanskrit commentary on Mulasuddhi prakarana. This Devachandra Suri is none other than the spiritual teacher of the famous polymath Hemachandracharya. Mulasuddhiprakarana expounds the duties of a Jain believer with regard to sacred images, temples, texts, and the fourfold order. The book may not interest a general reader, but it inspired Devachandra Suri to write a Sanskrit commentary (1089-90) on it with illustrative stories in Prakrit, except one which is in Apabhramsha. The stories told by Devachandra Suri have a literary flavour of their own.

MULCHARA (Prakrit) is an ancient Digambara Jain work on mendicant discipline by Vattakera (4th-5th centuries A.D.). It is written in Jain Sauraseni Prakrit, consisting of 1251 gathas (couplets). It is divided into 12 chapters. Chapter I is devoted to enumeration and exposition of primary virtues which include observance of vows, vigilance, control of senses, essential daily duties, pulling out the hair, nudity, no bath, sleeping on the ground, non-cleaning of teeth, eating food in a standing posture, and taking only one meal a day. Chapter II enumerates the things a monk should renounce mentally on his death—bed. He should censure his own evil deeds, confess them before a worthy spiritual leader, and seek forgiveness for them. Chapter III gives an account of what is enumerated in the second chapter. Chapter IV expounds the constituents of the monastic conduct for a novice. Rules governing a nun's conduct are also given. Chapter V is devoted to the exposition of ideal conduct pertaining to darshana (right faith), jnana (right way of acquiring knowledge), charitra (right conduct), tapas (penance), and virya (energy). While dealing with purity of study, it is said that kalashuddhi is not required for the study of Aradhananiryukti, Maranavibhakti, Sangraha, Stutis, Pratya khyana, Avashyaka, Dvadashanupreaksa and Dharmakatha. Chapter VI deals with the purity of food and faults pertaining to it, and enumerates the situations when a monk is required to abandon food. Chapter VII is devoted to the exposition of six essential duties, viz., samayika (equanimity), chaturvimsatistava (praise of the twenty-four Tirthankaras), vandana (reverence to superiors), pratikaramana (ritualised confession), pratyakhyana (fasting) and kayotsarga (abandonment of the body, standing motionless in meditation). It is said that except the first and the last, the other Tirthankaras preached samayika-samyama (monastic discipline of equanimity), while the first and the last preached chedopasthapana-samyama (monastic discipline), the reason being that the pupils of the first were too naive and those of the last too crooked for samayika-samyama. Chapter VIII elucidates mental reflections (anuprekshas), Chapter IX is devoted to the exposition of tenfold purity, to be observed by a monk, with respect to insignia, vows, residence, tour, food, knowledge, renunciation, speech, penance, and meditation. Chapter X expounds the essence of the doctrine of moral conduct. Great learning without pure conduct, knowledge without religious activities, acceptance of insignia without self-control, and penance without right faith are worthless and futile. Insignia is fourfold, viz., nudity, pulling out hair, no cleansing and no adorning of the body and a peacock-feather broom. Importance of celibacy is stressed and causes rousing passion are explained. Chapter XI deals with numerical expansion of vows and virtues by multiplication. The final chapter is devoted to the exposition of paryapti (faculty of assimilating matter and transforming it into body, sense-organs, breathing organs, speech and mind) and related subjects, such as structures of body and organs, seat of birth, life-quantum, activity, sex, karmic order, sexual behaviour, transmigration of a living being from one class to another.

Some of the verses of Mulachara and Dashavaikalika are almost similar in wording. The improper times for study are similar in Mulachara and Thananga. Vasunandin, the commentator on Mulachara, says that Vattakera intended to give in his work a brief summary of the Ayaramga for his pupils. It is not unlikely that Mulachara is not a composition of one author but a collection of texts written by different authors during different periods.

MULEY BABA PADMANJI (Marathi; b. 1831, d. 1906), was born at Belgaon in a orthodox family. From a Hindu preacher (Hardas) he learned about the Ramayana, Pandav Pratap, Hari Vijay, etc. In 1849 he entered Free Church School and began to develop an interest in Christianity. He was against caste-spirit. He advocated remarriage of Hindu widows. He disliked idol-worship. He joined Paramahans Mandala which had similar ideology as his own but subsequently abandoned it due to differences of opinions with the members. He embraced Christianity in 1854. He worked in Poona as a missionary for sixteen years. He was the editor of Satya-dikika. In 1867 he became guardian of the Free Church Mission. In 1877 he was appointed editor of the Bible Society and the Tract Society.

In 1884 he wrote Arunodaya, an autobiography, containing a description of his former life as a Hindu and the causes for his conversion.

He edited a Marathi-English Dictionary from the dictionary of Molsworth (1863). Apart from this he edited Shabda ratnawali (Marathi Dictionary) (1860) and Sanskrit Marathi Dictionary (1891). Baba has written more than hundred books. His Yamuna-paryatan (1857) is supposed to be the first Marathi social novel. He is also described as the father of Marathi Christian literature. The prominent among the books are: Satik Marathi nava karar (1874), Vaidic Hindu dharma (1892) Hindu lokanchya sananvishavi nibandha (1881), Hindu dharma va Christi dharma yanchi tulana (1903), Bapakade jane (1904).

MULIYA THIMMAPPAIAH (Kannada; b. 1888, d. 1950) was a Kannada scholar and researcher. Thimmappaiah will be remembered for his Nadoja Pampa, a study of Pampa, and his Parthi subba and also for his research in 'yakshagana'.

Born in a village called Muhhiya in South Kanara in Karnataka. Thimmappaiah had his early education at Ermbu and Vittla. Later, he studied Sanskrit in Travancore and music in Mysore. He passed the Pandit Examination of Madras University and was appointed Kannada Pandit in 1917. He also won popularity as a gamaki.

Though always caught in the whirl of poverty, Thimmappaiah's life and breath were Kannada and its study. From his childhood itself, he was an ardent lover of Kannada. Popularly known as 'Pandit' for his compositions both in poetry and prose. He was very much interested in 'halagannada sahitya' (old Kannada literature).

His research began with the study of Andaya. He wrote original works and also edited old classics. He became famous for his Nadoja Pampa and Parthi subba. Other works are Andaya and Karnataka, Kavirajamarga viveka, Adipurana samgraha, Samastha bhāratha sara, Kannada Sahitya & Other Lectures, Tripura daha, Suryakanthi kalyana (a historical novel), Vira Bankeva (historical novel), Yakshagana, Chandravalivilasa (a work on poetics) and Sahitya sarovar of which only one essay, 'Kannada akshara male', has been published.

The ostensible subject of his Parthi subba is the famous yakshagana artist of that name. Thimmappaiah does justice to his subject; but the work goes beyond the particular artist and develops into a treatise on yakshagana itself. He has also written some poems.

Thimmappaiah's devotion to Kannada bordered on religious dedication. He presided over the Kannada Sahitya Sammelan in 1937.

MULLA, ANAND NARAIN (Urdu; b. 1901) is one of the outstanding and distinguished poets of Urdu. Son of a legal luminary of his time, Justice Jagat Narain, he was born in Lucknow. He completed his graduation from Canning College in 1921, and after receiving M.A. from Lucknow University in 1923, he started practising law. He became Judge, Allahabad High Court, in 1954, and Senior Justice in 1958. He was elected Member of the Lok Sabha in 1968, and was twice member of Rajya Sabha from 1972 to 1983. He also served some of the Urdu organisations in very senior positions, such as President, Anjuman Taraqqi-e-Urdu, 1969-1983, Vice Chairman, Taraqqi Urdu Board, Govt. of India, and Chairman, U.P. Urdu Academy. Author of five collections of Urdu poetry, Ju-e-sheer, 1949; Kucch zarre kucch tare, 1959; Mairi Hadis-e-umr-e-gurezan, 1963; Siyahi ki ek boond, 1973; and Karb-e-aagahi, 1977, he received the Sahitya Academi Award in 1964. He is also recipient of many other awards and honours, among them being the Ghalib Award, the U.P. Urdu Academy and the Delhi Urdu Academy Award.

Deeply influenced by Gandhi and Nehru, Mulla has been a major patriotic poet of Urdu writing for more than fifty years. He has expressed himself in both the ghazal and the nazm. His fourth collection contains a large number of translations from Sanskrit. Having a rare mastery over the medium, he has used it with such felicity and charm for expressing the noblest of human feelings of love, humanism and patriotism that in the sixties and seventies he dominated the literary scene. Basically classical in diction, his poetry is contemporary in its social and political concerns, and possesses a unique individual quality. Mulla has also written some long poems, e.g., "Andher nagari men deep jaleen" and "Aur ek din insan jagega", which echo his humanistic feelings. Mulla's faith in man is unshakable, and this lends a remarkable vigour and vitality to his poetry.

G.N.

MULLA DAUD (Hindi; 14th century), one of the eminent poets of Bhakti yug, is known for his famous work

Chandayan, the second Sufi romance in Hindi after Hansavali (1370) of Asait. He is said to be a contemporary of Ferozshah Tughlaq (1351-1388), and patronized by Juna Shah 'Khan-e-Jahan', the Sultan's minister. On the basis of some indirect historical evidence, it is surmised that he was born about 1321. The date of the composition of Chandayan, as given in the work itself, is 1379. The poet's portrait, as given in the manuscript of Chandayan found in the museum of Patiala, indicates that he must have been old enough when he wrote it. It appears that the poet was about 60 when he completed the poem. His place of residence was Dalmau, district Rai Braeli, Uttar Pradesh. It was one of the three main centres of education established by Sultan Feroz Shah. The poet was associated with this centre and was called Maulana (Scholar) Daud. He was a disciple of Zainuddin, a nephew of Sheikh Nasiruddin, Chirag-e-Delhi. Mulla Daud mentions his name with great respect.

Chandayan is a comedy dealing with the love of Lorak, a warrior, and Chanda, the beautiful princess of Govar Garh. The story is based on a folk tale, 'Chanva ka udaar', also known as 'Lorakayan' dealing with the traditional pride and bravery of Ahirs. It is a narrative poem written in Masnavi style and blended with the traditional technique of Karvaka and Ghatta of Apabhramsha literature. The poet narrates the story of Sirajuddin and Malik Nathan and makes full use of dialogue. The physical charms of Chanda have been described in a manner suggestive of the spiritual and the supernatural. In the use of the traditional motifs, the poet exhibits his craftsmanship. As a folk romance Chandayan reveals different aspects of the social and cultural life of the medieval age. The structure of the poem is skilfully built, incorporating in it the necessary elements of a romantic narrative. The language is Avadhi, and besides Sanskrit, Prakrit and Apabhramsha vocabulary, common Arabic and Persian words have been freely used. The poetic diction is full of sensuousness and beautiful word-pictures and colourful images.

As a work representing a link between Apabhramsha and Hindi, the significance of Chandayan can well be understood.

MULLAIPPATTU (Tamil) by Napputanar is the shortest poem of the Pattuppattu (Ten idylls) of the Sangam anthology running into 103 lines in akaval metre. Mullai is the forest region, as the creeper 'mullai' (jasmine) bearing fragrant flowers is found in the forest region in abundance. According to the poetic convention laid down by

MUMMADI KRISHNARAJA

Tolkappiyam the akam theme of mullai poetry should portray the patience shown by a lady who is separated from her lord. This akam theme is treated well in this work.

The hero is away during the summer on a military expedition leaving his wife in the forest home, promising to return before the rains set in. But he does not return home at the promised time. It rains incessantly. Her grief knows no bounds. Her attendants go out to the outskirts of the village, according to the custom of the time, to listen to words casually spoken by people which would serve as an omen to indicate the future. They worship at a temple and make offerings of mullai buds and wait for an omen. They listen to the words of a cowherdess addressed to a calf that its dam will soon return driven by Lordsmen. Taking this as a good omen, they report it to their mistress who is bewailing the absence of her lord. They try to console her saying that her lord will return soon after accomplishing his purpose. But pearl-like drops of tears come out from the painted and flower-like eyes of the inconsolable lady. However, she waits in patience for her lord. There is an alternation of paroxysms of grief and self-control. She at one time shakes with passion, sighs deeply and quakes like a peahen struck with arrows. She later on consoles herself. She suddenly hears the march of her lord's victorious troops and is filled with joy. Thus the poet's stress is more on the pangs of separation than on the patience of the lady, which is characteristic of mullai poetry.

The other side is on the expedition of the hero. After destorying the forest that serves as a guard of the enemy's country, he establishes his camp. The camp is surrounded by a fence of thorny plants instead of walls and moats. Several tents are erected for the stay of the soldiers. There stands a ruttish elephant which refuses to eat its food and is goaded on to eat by its keepers. There is a specially constructed house for the chief in the camp with rooms built by Yavanas. The Chief is sleepless at midnight before the day of battle, thinking of his animals and men wounded in previous engagements. The serving maids who are armed with shining dirks attached to their belts look after the comforts of the Chief and take care of the lamps. The bodyguards of the Chief are keen in their duty. The Yavanas are also guarding the house with whips in their hands. The mute 'mlechhas' (foreigners) are also guarding the place where the Chief stays. The Chief is successful in the battle and returns home in triumph with flags waving through the mullai lands. The noise of the hooves of the running horses which pull the chariot of the hero reaches the ears of the heroine. There the poem ends.

It is to be noted that the 'akam' and 'puram' elements are not separate sections, but are deftly inserted within the other in the poem.

We note a few customs and manners of the ancient

Tamil people. One of them is the observation of omens. In this poem the words of the cowherdess about the quick return of the calf-mother casually heard by the attendants of the heroine are taken to be a good omen and used to console the sorrowing wife. The water-clock was an ancient Tamil contrivance to ascertain time. The device was to place a small vessel with a minute hole in a larger one filled with water, and time was calculated according to the amount of water that trickled into the smaller vessel. The Yavanas mentioned in the poem may be the Greeks. They were employed for building and artistic works. The mlechhas were employed as body-guards by the Chief. The mutes of them were chosen to prevent secrets leaking out. Thus the poem throws light on the social life of the ancient Tamils.

The poem is significant owing to its literary merits also. The pen-pictures like the old matrons worshipping at the shrine, the inner room of the Chieftain with the serving maids, and the heroine in her bed alternating between grief and patient resignation are noteworthy. The love of the poet for Nature is revealed well in the description of the triumphant march of the hero with a background of varied vegetations.

MUMMADI KRISHNARAJA (Kannada; b. 1794, d. 1868) was a poet, musicologist and a patron of literature. After the defeat and death of Tippu Sultan, the kingdom of Mysore was restored by the British to the ancient Hindu dynasty. Mummadi Krishnaraja was a little boy of a collateral family of the royal dynasty when he was adopted by Maharani Lakshmiyammanni, the Dowager Queen of Mysore, after the death of her husband Krishnaraja Wodeyar II and her two sons, who had succeeded him. The adoption was made at the instance of Haidar Ali, the usurper to the royal throne. The boy Krishnaraja was only three years of age when he was installed on the throne. Until he came of age the Dowager Queen and Divan Purnaiya (under Tippu also) carried on the administration. The Dowager Queen passed away in 1810 and the Diwan also passed away the next year. Now the young king was 18 years of age, and was deprived of the sage counsel of those two experienced advisers. In 1830 there was some trouble in a corner of the State, and the British, taking advantage of the situation, took over the administration of the State. The State was administered by the British Commissioners from 1831 to 1881. Though dispossessed of administrative authority, Krishnaraja was loved and respected by his subjects on account of his great qualities of head and heart. 'Krishna Bhupa mane manegella dipa' (Krishnaraja is a lamp lighting up every home)—this saying was a household word in those days.

Krishnaraja was a generous patron of learning and arts. He was well-versed in Kannada, Sanskrit, Marathi and Persian. He wrote many songs and was a musicologist too. He had a particular fancy for the art of yakshagana and he invited many troupes to perform in his presence. This gave an impetus to yakshagana writers, and a good number of yakshaganas were written during this period. Parti Subba of South Kanara, the most famous among writers of this genre, flourished during this period. Aliya Lingaraja, who was not only the court-poet but also belonged to the royal family, was a prolific writer and his contribution to yakshagana form of literature is considerable. It was during the reign of Krishnaraja that litho-printing was extensively used to print books written by him and other writers under his patronage. Krishnaraja gave special encouragement to writing prose versions of important Sanskrit works. His own versions of the Ramayana and the Mahabharata are memorable. As a matter of fact, of nearly fifty works that he wrote all except three are in prose. It may truly be said that Krishnaraja laid the foundation for the development of modern Kannada prose.

The works of Krishnaraja may be roughly classified as: 1) Works describing the 'mahatmya' (greatness) of shrines; 2) Prose renderings of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata and the Bhagavata; 3) Prose versions of plays of Kalidasa and Harsha; 4) Stories of puranic personalities; 5) Songs and verse; 6) Miscellaneous works. The following are his works: Devi mahatmya (1815); Jaimini bharata; Commentary on 'Asvamedha Parva', Harischandropakhyaana, Shankara samhite, Suka-saptati (1820); Lalitopakhyaana (1823); Malavikagnimitra and Shakuntalopakhyaana (1847); Nanjunda shataka (1848); Samkhyaratnamala like (1849); Krishnakatharatnakara (1864); Ramayana Tike (1867).

MUNAWAR SHAH (Kashmiri; d. 1925) was born in the lovely village of Gamur near the famous town Bandipore. His father, Vazir Shah, was a poor man and could not afford to provide his son with the formal education. Munawar Shah, therefore, learned the Persian language on his own and became familiar with Persian poetry. He was also familiar with the variety of Kashmiri folk-poetry, and he chose the 'Ladishah' style of the Kashmiri folk-poetry, which was appropriate for didactic themes. He composed short and sentimental lyrics in which he narrated various incidents of common interest. In order to gain the favour of men of influence and title, he wrote elegies and eulogies in alliterative couplets. Akhbari mulk-i-Kashmir (The news of Kashmir) is comparatively a longer poem in which, besides praising the men of power, Munawar Shah has flayed the land-surveyers, clerks, mullahs and other exploiting classes for their ruthless plunder of the poor. His Persian verses collected under the title Zinat-ul-husn (The zenith of beauty) is dull and unskilled. Munawar Shah remained a forgotten poet till 1972, when Manzur Fazili edited and published his works for the modern readers

MUNAWWAR LUCKNAVI (Urdu; b. 1897, d. 1970). Munshi Bisheshwar Prasad, popularly known as Munawwar Lucknow, was born at Lucknow. He was the scion of a family which had produced Urdu and Persian poets and writers for five successive generations. He had his early education in private schools at Lucknow where also he joined the Railway Accounts office in 1913. From Lucknow he was transferred in 1927, first to Lahore (now in Pakistan) and then to Delhi where he retired in 1957, bought a house, set up his own publishing unit 'Adarsh Kitab Ghar', and gave all his years to the service of Urdu literature till his death.

Endowed with a profusely rich heritage and the natural gift of the muse, Munawwar, who passed his matriculation examination privately, was largely a self-taught man who acquired remarkable knowledge and proficiency in the Persian, Urdu, Sanskrit, Hindi and English languages and literatures.

His formal education was interrupted by the successive deaths in the same year, first of his elder brother, Babu Ramshankarprasad (1886-1913), a prominent journalist and poet, then of his father, Munshi Dwarkaprasad Ufuq (1864-1913), a prolific writer and reigning poet of his day who left behind 70 works.

To relieve his family of the acute economic strains caused by the untimely deaths of his elders, Munawwar joined the legendary Avadh Akhbar as a reporter at the age of 13, but he was already writing poems when he was just 10, which were being published in various journals of the country. He received guidance successively from his father, his father's friend, Munshi Naubatrai Nazar, an eminent lyricist and editor at various times of Avadh Akhbar, Khadange Nazar and Adib, and his own father-in-law, Munshi Lachmanprasad 'Sadar', a prominent poet of the day. This continued up to 1932, though he himself was an undeclared guide for others since his young age of 20. Later, at least 50 writers from various communities proudly called him their mentor.

He had a mastery over various departments of letters of Urdu, Persian and Hindi, but his forte was Urdu 'ghazal' or lyrical poetry.

His first publication Nazre adab, published in 1929, was an anthology of 90 terse and fluent 'rubas'. The book represents the young poet as a lover of wine and revelry.

But this intoxication soon turned out to be, as his next publication, Kainaat-e-dil (1939), shows, mystic and spiritual. This anthology of about 200 'nazms' (narrative poems) and 'qitaat' (quatrains) reflects a vast spectrum of the various aspects of life, nature, ethics, patriotism and eminent personalities. Divided into six sections, one section is devoted to versified translations (25) from Wordsworth, Shakespeare, Tennyson, Thomas Carlyle, Tagore and others.

These books were followed by his two anthologies of ghazals: Nawa-e-kufr (1961) and Ada-e-kufr (1962), both selections from thousands of ghazals, his prolific genius had composed.

Munawwar's ghazal is a departure from the conventional conversation with women. It is an interpretation of life, its oddities, mysteries, pesterings, paucities and potentialities. He believed that an understanding of all these was the basic condition for life's development which needed "constant and unconditional struggle". He trusted in the growth and greatness of life. His intellectual angles are invested with quiet intensity of feeling and artistic values of sweetness.

He did not transgress the tradition of ghazal but liked it to move in a new direction, eschewing superficiality and sentimentality. Says he: "In verse, mere pleasantries will not do. It must have some substance embedded with a style." Added with his love for style was his flair for precision in diction.

Temperamentally a puritan, a strict vegetarian and teetotaler, he took some pride and solace, as is also evident from the titles of his collections of ghazals, in paganism,—imaginary and allusive,—which helps the artist escape conformism. Maintaining a multireligious and humanistic outlook, he is essentially a poet of morality and ethics.

The warp and woof of his poetry is woven from the heritage of his soil, an Indianness par excellence. He celebrates the music of 'Krishna's' flute, wanting even to become 'Kali Nag' on whose head the Lord perched and played His flute, the 'piety' of 'Rama', the 'eternity' of 'Ganga', the 'pleasure' of 'Gulal' and 'Phag' (colour play of 'Holi'), as also 'Bider ka sag' and 'Sudama ke tandel' (poor men's offerings to their lords). The 'Jamna of his imagination' glows up with the 'image' of his 'Radha of impressions'. Hindu mythology and creed never had it so good in Urdu literature.

Historically, he is perhaps the best bard of the scriptures and classics of India. He believed his dedication to scriptures was a redemption of his debt (of life) to the Creator.

He was a prolific and inspired translator who picked up literary classics and scriptures from several languages and lands. These included the Bible and the Quran also but their translations remained unpublished.

The list below will show that the range was almost global. Among these, his Kumar Sambhav was the first to appear in Urdu and Shakuntala was the first to have come direct from original Sanskrit. Again, his Gita's translation, Nasim-e-Irfan ran into three editions and Malvik Agari Mitra won U.P. Urdu Academy's award (posthumous).

Basically a poet, he also wrote much in prose. Out of his 28 published works, nine are in prose. Their subjects vary from biography to fiction. He also wrote an autobiography "Meri Dastan" but this, like his 26 other manuscripts, which this writer saw at his residence, remained unpublished.

In a life of 73 years, he devoted about 60 to the service of literature. Though bedevilled by repeated family bereavements, economic strains and many personal chronic ailments, he was literally active till his end. He published a versified translation of Iqbal's Persian work, Armughan-e-Hijaz under the title Soze Iqbal a few months before his death.

His works include: Poetry—Kainaat-e-dil (1955), Prose—Dada Nehru (Biography of Pt. Motilal Nehru, 1961). Translated Works—Poetry: Dhammapadaya ya sachi rah (Teachings of Buddha, 1954); Durga saptshati (1955); Wijdane Hafiz (1955); Gajendra moksh (Maharishi Ved Vyas, 1956); Avadhut ka tarana (Swami Shankaracharya, 1956); Mudrarakshas (Visakha Dutt, 1958); Ruhani makalama (Swami Shankaracharya, 1960); Lamaat-e-urfuqa (1964); Gita Govinda (Jai Dev, 1964); Faust (Goethe, 1969); Arya abhi vinay (Teachings of Swami Dayanand, 1969). Prose: The Ramayana (1931), Lincoln ne kaha (1960); Zarre se aftar (1960); Eleanor Roosevelt (1962); Sagar sangit (Deshbandhu C.R. Das, 1962); Gitanjali (1963); Samundari jawan aur dusre nadir afsane (German contemporary short stories 1968).

MUNAZIRO (Sindhi) is yet another form of Sindhi folk-poetry. Munaziro (pl. munazira) is a long narrative poem embodying disputations in the form of dialogues between two parties. In this narrative verse form each party disputes the arguments of the other and tries to prove its own superiority. Munazira generally open with a prologue in the praise of God, followed by the mention of two parties concerned and the circumstances under which the dispute has arisen between them. Then begins the actual disputation or controversy. The composition of interesting dialogues is the basic technique in a munazira composition. Generally the opposite parties in these long narrative poems are formed by common people for discussing two personified abstract ideas such as, love and reason, youth and age or two characters from the romantic folk-tales of Sindh (Sasui and his mother, Sasui and Suhini, Marui and Mumal, Lila and Chanesar), two common family characters (husband and wife, mother-in-law and daughter-in-law), or two things (cap and turban, gold and steel), or two seasons (summer and winter), or two birds, animals or insects (parrot and mainah, parrot and bee, horse and bull, camel and bull, bee and mosquito), or man and animal or a bird (farmer and a bull or a crow). The party which is comparatively weak usually starts first, asserting its excellence, or pointing out weaknesses of the opposite party. The spirited arguments of both the parties often contain satire and humour. When both the parties almost exhaust their arguments, a third character is introduced. He is the arbitrator acceptable to both the parties. Sometimes, the poet himself functions as an arbitrator and gives his judgement at the end. A disputation between 'kanuro' (an earthen water-vessel with a spout and handle used by Muslims for ablutions, the word grammatically having masculine gender) and 'chilam' (hubble-bubble, the word is feminine grammatically) has been beautifully delineated by a folk-poet Chhato Sangi. In his poem, he creates a village court scene in which different earthen vessels are present to listen to the arguments of both the parties. Witnesses are produced in the court who speak against the chilam. Thereupon, chilam files an appeal in the court of a pitcher, where a scene of physical fight is created by the poet, which at last is averted at the intervention of some other vessels. At the end, a bowl plays the role of an arbitrator. He explains that all earthen vessels are important in their own places. The differences among them appear to be due to different shapes and names. The truth is one and one only, though it has various forms. After the realisation of this mystery, the disputation comes to an end. All go away fully satisfied. Thus, the folk-poet has given a philosophical touch to an ordinary quarrel.

In the words of N.A. Baloch (Munazira, 1961): "In munazira, the folk-poet has maintained a high standard of achievement both in the development of the theme as well as the style of expression. He shows a remarkable talent in initiating, developing and terminating the arguments. The setting provided, physical as well as social, is natural, and the language used, whether standard or dialect, is effective. The speech attributed to each party is appropriate to its character, as a male or female, or as a farmer or a landlord. The folk-poet is a keen observer and a natural critic who, through his treatment of the theme, holds a mirror to man, depicting the trifling nature of the disputes, aggressive behaviour and the just or partial attitude of the arbitrator."

Munazira compositions generally possess the characteristics of a short drama in which three characters play an important role, viz, the two opposite parties and an arbitrator. These narrative poems represent a variety of Sindhi folk-literature in which the rural bards show the best of their poetic imagination and literary techniques.

A collection of select Sindhi munazira has been compiled by N.A. Baloch. The material has been collected mostly from oral tradition and published as the tenth book under the Sindhi Folklore and Literature project. It contains 157 munazira poems. The earliest poem is by Shaikh Ibrahim (alive during 1776-1818), on 'Aqul' and 'I shq' (the disputation between reason and love). The poet belonged to Lasa B'elo region of Baluchistan. Munazira poems are still a favourite form of Sindhi folk-poets and are a popular way of entertainment among village folks. The form has found its place also in the written Sindhi poetry of the contemporary period.

M.K.J.

MUNDAKA UPANISHAD (Sanskrit) belongs to the Atharvaveda. It is one of the late principal Upanishads and is an eclectic one. It has three chapters in each of which there are two sections.

According to Mundaka Upanishad, there are two kinds of knowledge, the lower and the higher. The lower knowledge consists of all the four Vedas and the six Vedangas. The higher knowledge is that by which the Supreme is apprehended. The Supreme is described as the sole cause of the world. "As a spider sends forth and draws in (its thread), as herbs grow on the earth, as the hair (grows) on the head and the body of a living person, so from the Imperishable arises this universe". Those who perform sacrifices in accordance with the teachings of the Vedas attain the world of Brahma. But after sojourning in the high place of heaven they enter this world once again. Unsteady are these boats of the eighteen sacrificial forms. The deluded who delight in this as leading to good, fall again into old age and death. Abiding in the midst of ignorance, wise in their own esteem, thinking themselves to be learned, the fools, afflicted with troubles go about like blindmen led by one who is himself blind. But those who practise austerity become one with the Supreme. As from a blazing fire sparks issue forth by the thousands so from the Supreme issue forth all kinds of beings. Fire is his head, His eyes are the sun and the moon, the regions of space are His ears, His speech the revealed Vedas, air is His life and His heart the world. Out of his feet the earth (is born); indeed He is the self of all beings. He who knows that the universe has no separate existence from the Supreme cuts asunder the knot of ignorance. Taking the bow, the great weapon of the Upanishads one should place in it the arrow sharpened by meditation. Drawing it with a mind engaged in the contemplation of that Brahman, one should know that imperishable Brahman as the target. In the highest golden sheath is Brahman, without parts. The sun shines not there, nor do the moon and stars shine. Everything shines only after that shining light. His shining illumines all the world. Brahman is this Immortal. In front is Brahman, behind is Brahman, to the right and to the left. It spreads forth below and above. Brahman indeed is this universe. Two birds, companions, who are always united cling to the self-same tree. Of these two, the one eats the sweet fruit and the other looks on without eating. When a seer sees the creator of golden hero, the Lord, the person, the source of Brahma, then being a knower, shaking off good and evil and free from strain, he attains supreme equality with the Lord (3.1.) This self cannot be attained by instruction nor by intellectual power not even through much hearing. He is to be attained by the one whom (the self) chooses. To such a one the self reveals his own nature. Just as the flowing rivers disappear in the ocean, casting off its name and shape, even so the knower, freed from name and shape, attains to the divine person, higher than the high. He who knows the Supreme Brahman becomes Brahman himself.

MUNHIJO SHAHARU, MUNHINJA MANHU: SHIKARPUR

The fundamental principle of the Mundaka Upanishad is that the universe is one and there is no difference within it or without it. It corrects the statement of the Katha that there are two souls which taste the fruits of the deeds. The enjoyment of the fruits of deeds could be predicated only about the Individual Soul and not about the Universal Soul. According to the Mundaka Upanishad only the Individual soul tastes the fruits of the deeds and the universal soul merely looks on. The Mundaka Upanishad explains creation empirically by stating that just as a spider creates and retracts its thread, so from this immutable Brahman does all this universe spring. The world of name and form has its roots in Brahman, though it does not constitute the nature of Brahman. The Mundaka Upanishad insists on truth and the life of penance, right insight and the life of celibacy, as essential conditions for the unfolding of the Self within us. Truth seems to find particular favour with this Upanishad. Truth alone becomes victorious in the world. It points out that the Self cannot be realised by a man who has not sufficient grip and tenacity to lead the severe life of spirituality, nor can He be reached by a man whose life is a bundle of errors. The self cannot be realised unless a man regards the life of self-realisation as superior to the life of deeds. The cosmology adumbrated in the Mundaka Upanishad is suffused both by Samkhya and Vedantic ideas. It borrows freely from the Katha and other Upanishads. The Bhagavadgita borrows and improves upon the description of the 'vishvarupa' occurring in the Mundaka Upanishad. As the name suggests this Upanishad may be classed along with the later Samnyasa Upanishads.

The poetry of the Mundaka Upanishad rises to the highest level to which the Upanishads are capable. It is unparalleled in the analysis of the mystic thought.

MUNHINJO SHAHARU, MUNHINJA MANHU: SHIKARPUR (Sindhi) is a literary and socio-cultural history of the Sindhis of Shikarpur, a major city of Sindh, by Lokram D'od'eja published in 1976. The book is not like any other book on a town or a city. In its three volumes, the city in north Sindh is delineated in its actual places and true-to-life people under the British Raj.

Volume I presents, among other things, an ironical account of the joint family system prevalent during his days, the system in which a fast, hard-working person and a slow, lazy louse would have an equal share in everything in the house. If a family was poor and belonged to a backward class, the 'everything' would sometimes include the woman too; one of the brothers in the family would like the youngest one the most, and naturally so, it would give rise to heart-burnings and bickerings among them. Dowry was another social evil, as it is now, among the Sindhis. Every bridegroom had a price-tag, as it were, tied on him. People would justify the dowry system on the ground that sons had their share in the ancestral property and, therefore, daughters should also be given at the time of their marriage big sums which would help them build their 'new nests'.

In Volume II, the author gives a historical background of the city and reveals how it must have come into being when the Mohen-jo-daro civilization was at its zenith and subsequently called Shikaripur after one of the names of Vikramaditya II, i.e., Shakari (one who routed the Shaka invaders). Vikramaditya II had built two forts, Shalikot and Shikaripur. Shikaripur came to be known as Shikarpur during the Muslim rule.

Shikarpur was the greatest mart of Sindh, for that matter of North-West India. Situated on the highway to Qandhar, by the great pass of Bolan, it has always enjoyed a direct influence on the trade of the Indus and the five rivers beyond it. The Shikarpuris were the pioneers of the 'Banking system' in the world. The author appropriately quotes Richard F. Burton to say, "The Shikarpuri Hindu devoted his energies to banking transactions and extended his operations over the greater part of Asia, from China to Turkey, from Astracan to Hyderabad Deccan; there was scarcely a town without a Shikarpuri, or the agent of Shikarpuri in it. The crude instrument with which the Shikarpuri banker works is called 'Hundi' (These can be cashed anywhere). You may imagine, how useful a few bits of paper like these are, when you are riding through a region in which to produce a single gold coin would be the best arrangement for securing a sudden death."

Besides, it was in Shikarpur that the Britishers faced an armed opposition in 1843, though it did not succeed and Sindh was annexed to the British India. Again, it was from Shikarpur in Sindh that the national struggle for Independence was launched.

Volume III describes the main features of the city in its educational and literary institutions, temples, mosques and gurdwaras, reform bodies, recreational spots, etc., and also various persons associated with them. While every Sindhi knows that the Vedantin poet Chainrai Bachomal 'Sami' belonged to Shikarpur, not many Sindhis know that the leading contemporary Sindhi poet of Pakistan, Sheikh Ayaz, hails from this city.

MUNISHREE PUNYAVIJAYJI (Gujarati; b. 1895, d. 1971), whose real name was Manilal Dabyabhai Doshi was a scholar of Jain philosophy and literature of international recognition. He was a research scholar of Sanskrit, Prakrit and Gujarati works. He had his primary education upto standard 6th.

After 1909, he engaged himself in an exhaustive study of literature in the Sanskrit, Prakrit, old and archaic Gujarati language, as also the study of grammar, philosophy and logic under the able guidance of Pandit Sukhlalji and other eminent scholars. He prepared a complete catalogue of old manuscripts which had been preserved in different areas of Patan, after making an assortment and classification of these precious manuscripts. He was the inspiration behind the institutions like Hemchandracharya Jain Vidya-Mandir of Patan, and Shri Lalbhai Dalpatbhai Institute of Indology of Ahmedabad.

His greatest contribution to the field of Indology is his research work edited in about forty volumes. He had also prepared a number of volumes in collaboration with great philologists, such as Pandit Dalsukhbhai Malvania and Bhogilal Sandesara. He had also helped many researchers at national and international level, as an informal guide and examiner for Ph.D Degree examination. He is held high in esteem not only in Jain community but also in the field of education and literature and among many great scholars.

He was selected as the Chairman of History and Archaeology section at the 20th session of Gujarati Sahitya Parishad held at Ahmedabad in 1959, and also as the Chairman of Prakrit and Jain Religion section at the 21st session of All India Oriental Conference held in Kashmir in 1961. He was also awarded the distinguished title of Aagamprabhakar, which was considered the highest honour those days. He became an honorary member of the Oriental Society of America in 1970.

He prepared a long catalogue of the ancient manuscripts preserved so far in store-house of Khambhat, Limbdi, Palitana, Bhavnagar, Vadodara, Chhani, Bikaner, Jodhpur and Jesalmer, over and above those of Patan. He also undertook the job of microfilming the precious manuscripts of scriptures or religious texts that were written on palm-leaf, and at the same time, he commenced the basic work of preparing an authentic reading of the texts. He made a regular and systematic study of these texts based on published work, 'Niryukti', 'Churni', 'Bhashya' (detailed commentary) and criticism for facilitating re-reading of about forty-five 'Jain Aagams,' and made a careful note of differences in these texts, and edited them in a perfectly scientific manner. He had also started 'Jain Aagam Granthmala', in which Nandisutram with Churni (1966), Nandisutram with critical commentary, (1968), and Pannavanasut, part-1, 2, (1969, 1971), have been published.

His contribution to the gigantic task of preparation of a catalogue of ancient manuscripts and his impressive way of presenting the texts of the scriptures with precision is highly appreciated. Among his most meritorious and praiseworthy research works, mention may be made of the following: Kaumudimitranand natak, a drama by Ramchandra, taken from Sanskrit literature; (1917) Prabhuddha Rouhineya natak, a drama by Rambhadra (1918); Dharmabhyudaya natak, a drama by Acharya Meghaprabha (1918); Dharmabhyudaya Mahakavya by Udayaprabhasuri (1949); Kalpasutra niryukti, with Churni, Commentary and Gujarati version (1952); Kirti-kaumidi by Someshwar (1961); Ullasraghav natak (1961); Ramshatak (1966).

In addition to this, about twenty of his books on Prakrit and other subjects have been published so far. Even the average reader may be able to have a close acquaintance with his amazing power of interpretation, his perfectly scientific perspective, and his profound knowledge of the subject matter from the following works: Vasudeva Hindi by Vachak Sanghdas gani (1930); Trishashti-Shalaka-purush-Charitra, Canto, 2, 3, 4, an epic composed by Hemchandracharya (1950); Akhyanmanikosh by Nemichandracharya (1962); Katharatnakosh by Devbhadrasuri (1944).

Similarly, readers get a good appraisal of his profound scholarship especially about ancient manuscripts through his books such as Descriptive Catalogue of Palm-Leaf Manuscripts in the Siddhnath Bhandar, Cambay, part-1, 2 (1961-1966); Catalogue of Sanskrit and Prakrit Manuscripts of L.D. Institute of Indology, Part-1, 2, 3, 4 (1963, 1965, 1968, 1972); Jesalmer Gyan-Bhandar Suchipatra (1972), etc.

His books Bharatiya Jain Shrama-sanskriti ane lekhanakala (1935) and Jesalmer chitra-samrudhi, (1951) give a good idea of his deep knowledge about old scripts, sculpture, metal statues, coins and history of paintings.

MUNSHI DEVIPRASAD (Rajasthani; b. 1848, d. 1923) belonged to a Gauda-Kayastha family which had migrated to Bhopal from Delhi. His father, Nathan Lal, was an employee of Abdul Karim Khan, younger brother of Nawab Vazir-ud-daulah of Tonk. Deviprasad was born in his maternal grandfather's house at Jaipur. He was brought to Ajmer after three months of his birth, where his father was serving the Sahibzada, who was then residing there. Deviprasad learned Arabic, Persian and Urdu from his grandfather and father, and Hindi from his mother. He joined service of the Sahibzada in 1865, but had to give it up in 1878 on account of his bitter criticism in newspapers of the atrocities of Tonk-Raj on Hindus. In 1879, he took up a job of a naib-sarishtedar in the Appellate Court in Sir Pratap's administration in Jodhpur. With Sir Pratap's favour and by dint of his own outstanding abilities, he soon rose to the post of Munsif (Magistrate) and served there for twenty five years. He was appointed Assistant Superintendent, Census Operations in Marwad in 1891 and 1901, and was awarded a cash prize of Rs.5000/- for his detailed report which was considered a monumental work. Earlier, he was appointed a member of the Committee formed to write an authentic history of Marwad. He made extensive research in history and literature and wrote about one hundred books in Urdu and Hindi.

Besides 27 published works in Urdu, his Hindi books are: Rao Maldeo ka jivancharit, Maharaja Mansingh ki jivani, Amer ke Raja, Bikaner ke Rao Bikaji aur Naraji, Rao Lunkaranji, Rao Jaitsi, Rao Kalyanmal, Svapna Rajasthan, Marwad ka Bhugol, Insaf sangrah, Jantri. (1890), Vidyarthi Vinod, Maharana Sanga, Maharana Ratan Singh, Vikramaditya aur Banbir, Maharana Uday Singh, Maharana Pratap Singh, Marwad ke shilalekh, Raja Birbal, Maharaja Jaswant Singh, Akbarnama, Shah Jahannama, Mira Bai, Mahila Mriduvani, Jahangirnama, Rajrasanamrit, Pariharvamsha Prakash, Krishna Kumari Bai, Yavanaraj Vamshavali, Kaviratanamala, Honhar balak, Rajasthan mein Hindi Granthon ki khoj, Rajputane mein prachin shodh, Surdasji ki jivani, Nari-navaratna, Sadbodh shatak, Yuvati-yogyata, Chamtkari balak, Baharam Baharoz, Sadupadesha samgrah, Raja Kamaketu-kivat, Nausherwan ki nitisudha, Bazbahadur aur Rupmati, Bikaner Rajya ka pustakalaya, Purani janmapatriyan, Samvat 1968 ke mere daura, Maasir-ul-Umara Kavi Kalash, Shrimati Naina Bai, 350 Varsh ki itihasa-sahayak jantri (Unpublished), Bikaner ka Rajvamsha, Bhati Goyanddas, Rao Maldeo ki ruthi Rani, Maharana Pratap ke patte and Suba Bihar ka vrittant (from Ain-e-Akbari). These works are very important for Rajasthani literature and its history.

Munshi Deviprasad was a philanthropist. Out of his hard earnings he gave away many donations.

A series of publications is carried in his name by the Nagari Pracharini Sabha, Kashi.

MUNSHI, KANAIYALAL MANEKALAL (Gujarati; b. 1887, d. 1971) made an outstanding contribution to Gujarati literature. He was a man with a multi-dimensional personality. Professionally he was a lawyer and by temperament a cultural crusader. He was not a man of the masses but was certainly a towering public figure. He was one of the distinguished advocates of the Bombay High Court. As an author, he dominated the Gujarati literary scene for many years. He was a freedom fighter and a close associate of Mahatma Gandhi for a short period but had major political and ideological differences with him. He left and rejoined the Congress Party several times. He became the Home Minister in the first Congress government of the then Bombay province in 1937. He played a crucial role in the merger of Hyderabad with the rest of India. He was also a member of the Constituent Assembly and one of the architects of the Indian Constitution. He was the Minister for Food and Civil Supplies in the Central Cabinet and after Independence the Governor of Uttar Pradesh. He was one of the founders of the Swatantra Party, but subsequently retired from active politics and devoted all his time and energy to Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan which he had established in 1938. During a life-span of 84 years he touched law, literature, politics, arts, culture, journalism, education, administration, religion and philosophy, and on most of these he left his stamp. He has carved a permanent niche for himself in the history of Gujarati literature.

Munshi graduated from Baroda College in 1907, and obtained his LLB from the Government Law College, Bombay in 1910. In 1913 he became an advocate of the Bombay High Court. It was during this period, in 1912, that he entered the field of Gujarati literature with the publication of 'Mari Kamala', a short story in Stribodha, a leading Gujarati periodical then. Next year, i.e. in 1913, he wrote his first novel, Verani Vasulata. Both the first short story and the first novel were initially published under the pen-name of 'Ghanashyama Vyasa', but subsequently he gave up this pen-name and published all his works under his real name. He wrote novels, short stories, plays, biographies and autobiography, essays and articles, literary criticism and history of literature. He has left behind 56 books in Gujarati and 36 in English. Many of his works written originally in Gujarati have been translated into English, Hindi, and other Indian languages.

Munshi's first novel Verani Vasulata (1913) centres round the age-old theme of love, hate and revenge. To some extent this novel is influenced by Sarasvatichandra but the predominance of story, forceful narration, effective use of direct and simple prose style, larger than life characters etc. made this novel an instant success both with the masses and the literary critics. This was followed by Kono Varika (1915) which deals with the problem of widow remarriage. Govardhanarama Tripathi, too, in his Sarasvatichandra dealt with this problem but his widowed heroine Kumuda ultimately does not remarry but takes to the life of a Sanyasini. Whereas Munshi's widowed heroine Muni ultimately remarries Mukunda, the hero. This was a step forward from the social point of view. Svapnadrashta (1924), a somewhat autobiographical novel, depicts the national awakening and the resultant activities of the Independence Movement. Snehasambra (1931) is a social novel seasoned with humour. It was after a gap of 26 years that his last social novel, Tapasvini (1957-1958) was published. This novel, published in 3 volumes, aims at presenting a faithful picture of social and political trends and incidents that stirred the life of Gujarat during the period 1920 to 1937.

Gujarati readers first came to know Munshi as a writer through his social novels, but it was through his historical novels that he captivated his readers for a long time. His trilogy, Patanani Prabhuta (1916), Gujaratano natha (1917), and Rajadhi raja (1922) deal with the Solanki period, the golden age in the history of Gujarat. Even a high-brow literary critic like Narasimharava Divetiya had all praise for Gujaratano natha. However, some critics think that the author has taken undue liberty with some of the historical facts and characters in these three novels. Jaya Somanatha (1940), though published after many years of Patanani Prabhuta, is, as far as the narrative is concerned, precedent to it. For sometime, these novels raised a heated controversy amongst some critics because of the marked influence of and at some places direct borrowings from the works of Alexander Dumas. Munshi himself at a later stage acknowledged his indebtedness to Dumas.

Many of Munshi's works became controversial when they were published. Prithivivallabha (1920), a historical novel, enraged many orthodox critics and earned for Munshi a sharp rebuke even from Mahatma Gandhi. This is because through his characters Munshi displayed in this work his marked preference for the joy of life, unabashed love, enjoyment of the worldly pleasures and almost ridiculed the ideals of religious austerity, self-sacrifice and abstinence. However, as an artistic creation Prithivivallabha easily ranks amongst the best works of the author. Bhagavana Kautilya (1923) and Bhagnapaduka (1956) are his other historical novels.

Lopamudra (1933), Lomaharshini (1945), Bhagavana Parashurama (1946), and Krishnavatara (1963-1974) are his novels based on mythological themes and characters. The last one was the most ambitious and on a very large canvas. It tries to present the life of Lord Krishna in all its variegated splendour. But unfortunately the work has remained unfinished due to the author's death.

Munshi has written 9 social plays and 6 plays based on historical or mythological themes. His social plays are: Vavasethanum svatantrya (1921), Be khavaba juna (1924), A jankita (1927), Kakani sasi (1928) Brahmacharyashrama (1931), Pidagrasta prophesura (1933), Do madhurikta (1936), Chie te ja thika (1948) and Vaha re main vaha (1949). His historical-mythological plays are Purandara parajaya (1922), Avibhakta atma (1923), Tarpana (1924), Putrasamovadi (1929), Lopamudra (1933-34) and Dhruvasvaminidevi (1929). Many of his social plays are purposeful and yet pleasant comedies and have won him accolades. His historical and mythological plays represent characters and events larger than life. These plays are open to the same criticism that has been levelled against his historical novels. However, these too have met with some success on the stage. Mention may also be made of the dramatization of his own novel Prithivivallabha which was highly successful on the stage as well as on the silver screen of Hindi films. Some of his other novels and plays were also turned into Hindi or Gujarati films.

Munshi entered the literary field by publishing a short story but later on preferred writing novels and plays. He has published only one collection of short stories Mari Kamala ane biji vato (1921). His humorous stories are more readable than the serious ones.

Munshi has written 5 autobiographical works, Shishu ane sakhi (1932) Adadhe raste (1942), Sidham sadhana, Vols. 1-2 (1943), Svapnasiddhini sodhamam (1953) and Mari Binajawalsadara kahani (1943), covering different phases of his life.

Munshi has written some biographies as well. Narasaimyo bhakta harino (1933) deals with the life of Gujarati saint-poet, Narasimha Mehta. In this work the author has tried to provide rational explanations for the miracles normally associated with the life of the saint-poet. Narmada, arvachinomam adya (1939) is biography, evaluation and tribute, all rolled into one. It speaks, with emotion and admiration, of the life and works of Narmadashankara Lalashankara Dave, the pioneer of modern Gujarati literature.

Munshi's essays, articles and attempts at literary criticism have been collected in Ketalaka lekho, Vols. 1-2 (1924), Gujaratana jyotirdharo (1926), Thodanika rasadar sano (1930), Adivachano Vols. 1-2 (1933-1943), Gujaratani asmita (1939), Gujaratani kirtigatha (1953), and Narasimhayugana kavio (1962).

Munshi's English works include Gujarat and Its Literature (1935), a history of Gujarati literature, the autobiographical I Follow the Mahatma (1940), The Early Aryans in Gujarat (1941), Akhand Hindustan (1942), The Glory that was Gurjara Desha (1943) and Imperial Gurjaras (1944), dealing with the history of Gujarat, The Indian Deadlock (1945), The Ruin that Britain Wrought (1945) and The Changing Shape of Indian Politics (1946) dealing with the political problems of the day, The Creative Art of Life (1946), Bhagavad Gita and Modern Life (1947), Gandhi, The Master (1948), Linguistic Provinces and the Future of Bombay (1948), Somanatha, The Shrine Eternal (1951), Sparks from the Anvil (1951), Gospel of Dirty Hand (1952), Our Greatest Need and

Other Addresses (1953), To Badrinath (1953), Janu's Death (1954), City of Paradise (1954), The Wolf Boy (1956), collections of open letters written for the periodicals of Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, The End of an Era (1957), The Saga of Indian Sculpture (1957), The World We Saw (1961), Replies to the Readers (1961), Warnings of History (1961), Reconstruction of Society through Trusteeship (1961), Foundation of Indian Culture (1962), President under the Indian Constitution (1963), Chinese Aggression (1963), National Emergency and Its Problems (1963), Bombay High Court, Half a Century of Reminiscence (1963), News and Vistas (1965), Gandhiji's Philosophy in Life and Action (1965) and Pilgrimage to Freedom (1968).

During his long career Munshi was associated with many periodicals and institutions. In August 1912 he started Bharagava traimesika, a Gujarati quarterly. In July 1915 he became, along with Indulata Yajnik, editor of Navajivana ane satya and in November of the same year he edited Young India in cooperation with Jamanadasa Dvarakadasa Mehta. Subsequently both these periodicals attained national importance when they were taken over by Mahatma Gandhi. Munshi started in 1922 Gujarata which was considered a leading literary journal for many years. He established Gurjara Sabha in 1913 and Gujarata Sahitya Samsada in 1922. From 1937 to 1955 he almost singlehandedly managed the affairs of the Gujarati Sahitya Parishad, the premier institution of letters in Gujarat, founded in 1905. He also has the unique distinction of being elected its President thrice, in 1937, 1949 and 1955. The last few years of his life were devoted to the consolidation and strengthening of Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan which he had founded in 1938.

Munshi essentially was a dreamer, but he also had the strength and the courage to work for the fulfilment of his dreams. He loved power, position and prestige, and was frank enough not to camouflage them under the smoke screen of service. In literature, in social and public life, in politics and government, he fought many battles, and came out with flying colours in quite a few. When he entered the literary field, he had to face the obvious disadvantages of being a successor to a literary giant like Govardhanarama Madhavarama Tripathi (1855-1907). During the major part of his literary career he was constantly over-shadowed by the ideals, ideas, and influence of Mahatma Gandhi. Any person with lesser creative genius would have failed before this dual challenge. But it was because of his genuine creativity, coupled with inborn practical acumen, that he was able to chart his own course against heavy odds and earn for himself an everlasting place in the history of Gujarati literature.

MUNSHI, LILAVATI (Gujarati; b. 1899, d. 1978) has contributed significantly to the fields of pen portraits and personal essays. Her character-sketches, written in precise, poetic style, are important landmarks in Gujarati. Her collection of pen-portraits Rekhachitro ane Bija Lekho was published in 1925.

She was born in an aristocratic, cultured Jain family but could not go beyond the stage of primary education. At home she did intensive study of Sanskrit and English literature. Her first marriage in 1913 with Sheth Lalbhai, who was older than her in years and who was completely different in temperament, turned out to be a failure. Her soul, yearning for new, free, wide horizons in life, felt fulfilled, when she got married to Kanhaiyalal Munshi, the eminent litterateur of Gujarati. She had been a great source of inspiration and strength to Munshi. Since the establishment of the Bharatiya Vidya Bhavan, an institute of knowledge and learning, and during the years of its advancement, Lilavati imparted active co-operation and support to K.M. Munshi, and after his death, she herself managed the affairs of the Institute for some years.

The collection of her essays Kumardevi was published in 1929. Her stories and short plays were collected in Jivanni Vate (1977). Sanchaya (1975) is the compilation of her stray articles. Her essays have an element of humour and wit. Her prose is full of freshness and vigour.

MUPPINA SHADAKSHARI (Kannada, b. 1500) was a Kannada poet, who probably belonged to a town called Uppinahalli or Ukshapura. He is a Virashaiva poet, the author of 74 'kaivalya' poems, Shivapujashtaka and Shivayogashtaka. He seeks Lord Shiva's grace so that he might control the wandering mind and achieve self-realization. His catholicity of outlook is striking. A dominant image in his poetry is that of a maiden longing to go back to her parents' home.

MUQADDAMAH-E-LATIFI (Sindhi) is a critical work on the life and works of Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752), written by Hotchand Mulchand Gurbaxani (1883-1947). Shah Abdul Latif was the foremost among the medieval sufi poets of Sindh. The text of the book originally formed a part of Shah jo Risalo Vol. I as an introduction. Gurbaxani had planned to publish Shah Abdul Latif's poetry in four volumes with critical introduction, annotations and etymological notes. The first three volumes were brought out in 1923, 1924 and 1931 respectively. The fourth volume remained unpublished due to the sudden demise of the compiler. The manuscript of the fourth volume is yet to be located and brought into print.

Muqaddamah-e-Latifi, which, as stated above, originally forms part of the first volume of Shah jo Risalo, was published by the author as a separate book in 1936, with some minor changes and additions. The book contains ten chapters on the subject, viz. (1) Biography of Shah, (2) Physical appearance and character of Shah, (3) Religion of Shah, (4) 'Vedanta' and 'Tasawwuf' (5) Shah's poetry, (6) Subject-matter and style of Shah's poetry, (7) Formal structure of Shah's poetry, (8) Shah's language, (9) Grammatical peculiarities of Shah's language and (10) compilations of Shah's poetry and its different printed versions and manuscripts.

Gurbaxani has critically studied written documents available to him and anecdotes pertaining to Shah which were current in oral tradition. After carefully going through the entire corpus collected by him, he has critically prepared geneological history and biographical sketch of Shah Abdul Latif. It is given in the first and the second chapters of the book. The third chapter deals with the religious beliefs of the poet. The writer explains that the poet lived his daily life according to the tenets of Islam. He observed religious fasts and performed daily prayers. He did this only to be an example for the Muslim community at large to lead a pious life and follow in spirit the word of religious scriptures. Shah Abdul Latif was a sufi mystic in a true sense, and when living within spiritual realms, he was beyond the observance of religious formalities. In the fourth chapter, Gurbuxani has briefly explained similarity between the basic principles of 'advaita' vedanta and sufi mysticism. In the fifth chapter, the writer points out that spiritual message pervades the entire poetry of Shah Abdul Latif. He explains briefly the main features of poetry which are visible in Shah's verses, such as eloquence, simplicity and vigour. In the sixth chapter, Shah's poetry has been classified according to its subject-matter, the seven classifications being mystical, didactic, love poetry, nature poetry, war poetry, verses in praise of God or hero, humorous and satirical poetry. The writer has very rightly mentioned that the most of the verses of Shah come under the first four classifications.

The seventh chapter contains a brief discussion on 'Doho' metre and its innovations as noticed in Shah's poetry. Here the writer has pointed out an element of Indian classical music in Shah's verses. The eighth chapter includes a brief discussion on the origin and development of the Sindhi language. Here the writer explains that the Sindhi language has originated from Sanskrit and after passing through the stages of Pali, Prakrit and Apabhramsha it entered the New Indo-Aryan Stage around the tenth century. There is a slight difference between Shah's Sindhi and the one as spoken today. Gurbaxani discusses in this chapter the general laws of the changes noticed in the growth of the language. The ninth chapter explains grammatical peculiarities of Shah's Sindhi, and the tenth chapter gives information on the different manuscripts and printed versions of Shah's poetry available to the compiler.

Muqaddamah-e-Latifi, no doubt, is a landmark in Sindhi literary criticism. Gurbaxani was a scholar of Persian and English literatures. He was well-conversant with Sanskrit and some modern Indian languages. In the work under review, he has critically studied the poetry of Shah on the basis of Western as well as Indian principles of criticism. He is the first critic in Sindhi, who, while compiling Shah's poetry, has excluded from his edition the verses of other poets which somehow got mixed up in the earlier versions of the poet's work. He explains in the present book the principles of literary and textual criticism applied by him while preparing the edition of Shah jo Risalo. After Independence about thirtyone more manuscripts of Shah's poetry have come to light. These were however, not available to Gurbaxani. These additional manuscripts could have made a difference in the edition prepared by this scholar. In spite of this fact, the principles put forth by Gurbuxani regarding the compilation of classical poetry, and his general observations on the life and poetry of Shah Abdul Latif are still important and valid. Muqaddamah-e-Latifi still continues to be one of the main reference books for the research scholars and students in this field.

MUQADDAMA-E-SHE'R-O-SHA'IRI (Urdu) .In 1893 Altaf Husain Hali (1837-1914) brought out his collection of poems to which he appended a long essay on the nature of poetry. In his discussion of Urdu poetry, he showed it to be wanting in many respects. Making a powerful plea for reform, he mapped out the lines on which Urdu poetry should develop. The essay soon became detached from the poems and was reprinted several times as an independent work, entitled Muqaddama-e-she'r-o-sha'iri (Preface to poems and poetry). Hali's considerable reputation as a poet was almost eclipsed by the fame of the Muqaddama. In spite of some early opponents and modern denigrators, the Muqaddama is widely regarded as the major theoretic-al pronouncement on the nature of poetry in Urdu.

Hali's thought was generally derivative. Much of it came from a second hand knowledge of western literature drawn from authors and works popular among the British in India during Hali's time. His acquaintance with Arabic, Persian, and Urdu literatures was much more profound. He is the first modern comparativist in Urdu literature. The ease with which he transits between East and West is astounding. He also makes interesting observations on linguistics, and about the nature of metaphor and imagination. These observations do not seem derived from any known source.

If Hali's thought was partly derivative, his plain but forceful prose was not. As well as being a gifted reasoner, he was the creator of a prose style suited to critical discourse. He wrote without condescension, and with clarity and firmness. Above all, he wrote with deep sincerity. Almost as much as his persuasive powers, it was his passionate sincerity which won him many followers.

Near the beginning of his essay, Hali wrote, "In order to lay the foundation of the new poetry, it is necessary to describe in some detail the nature of poetry, and the conditions which one must satisfy in order to be a poet". Near the end, he said, "I have hopes from my young compatriots who are... cognisant of the mood of the times, that they will grant... Even if none of the humble suggestions made in this essay toward poetry's reform are accepted, I would consider it my full success if this essay helped spread the idea in the country that our poetry needs reform."

Hali succeeded beyond measure. He pronounced "Imagination" (a term then unknown in Urdu poetics) to be the most important quality of a poet, and urged Urdu poets to use the power of imagination, and give up tilling the old turf over and over again. He defined imagination in terms that were almost Coleridgean. His second plea was for 'sadagi', 'asliyat', and 'josh'; terms which he borrowed from Milton (simplicity, truth and sensuousness). It is clear that Hali didn't quite know what Milton meant by these terms. But he constructed a theory of "Natural Poetry" out of these concept-words. He criticised the 'ghazal' for being largely artificial in its themes and for its undue complexity and lack of true passion. The other well-known genres of 'Qasida' (Praise poem), 'Marsiya' (Elegiac poem) and 'Masnavi' (Long narrative poem in couplets), were criticised for being full of hyperbole (the 'qasida'), lack of verisimilitude and ennobling passions (the 'marsiya') and lack of coherent plot and character development (the 'masnavi').

The Muqaddama was most telling in its criticism of moral effectness and lack of social concern that characterised Urdu poetry in Hali's eyes. Individual opinions in the Muqaddama were opposed, more often with passion than reason; but the book struck a responsive chord in the Urdu writer's psyche, and is still read with respect. There is no doubt that much of Urdu criticism and a good bit of Urdu poetry since the Muqaddama are coloured by it.

The Muqaddma's greatest fault lies in Hali's failure to recognize Urdu literature's right to its own rules. Hali did not realize (very few of us do even now) that many of the concerns of western literary theorists are not necessarily relevant to eastern literature, and that one literature should not necessarily be judged in terms of another.

Given his shortcomings, Hali created in the Muqaddama a firm base for modern Urdu criticism, and became perhaps the first Indian to attempt a serious account of the nature of poetry based on western ideas.

MURAD FAQIR (Sindhi; b. approx. 1729, d. approx. 1800) was a saint poet, and a mystic. He was a Shia Muslim. He was a disciple of Rohal Faqir, and like him he was an exponent of Hindu philosophy in his poetry. He was an official under Ghulamshah Kalhoro, the Nawab of Sindh. When about 43, he along with Rohal Faqir renounced the world and became an ascetic. After wandering for a few years he settled at Kotri, a small town in central Sindh, where his tomb still stands. His descendants now live in Kandri, a village in upper Sindh. He has written copiously not only in Sindhi, but also in chaste Hindi and Siraiki, which was his mother tongue. Many of his writings are not extant, but a few that are available bear an eloquent testimony to the mastery he had over the language and the art of poetry. He seems to have acquired amazing proficiency in the employment of both Indian prosody and Persian metres. Among his extant works are Persian ghazals as well as one shastra, Prem Jnan, written in chaste Hindi. This shastra is a beautiful poetical work on 'jnan marg' as well as 'bhakti marg'. His Sindhi 'bayts' available at present do not number more than 150. A greater number of his compositions are in Siraiki and Hindi. His diction and control over rhymes and rhythm as well as Sindhi language compare very well with those of the greatest Sindhi poet of all times, Shah Abdul Latif.

MURTHY RAO, AKKIEBBALU NARASIMHA (Kannada; b. 1900) is best known to the Kannada reader as the propagator of the essay form. He was educated in the Wesleyan Mission High School and the Maharaja's college, where he did his B.A. and M.A. majoring in English Literature and Language. He joined the teaching staff of the Mysore University and distinguished himself as one of the finest teachers of English. After he retired from the University as Professor in 1955, he became

MUSAFIR, GURMUKH SINGH

Director of Literature and Cultural Development of the then Mysore State. He was also the President of the Kannada Sahitya Parishat. He was for sometime the Head of the Broadcasting Station in Mysore. He has been a member of the Advisory Council of the Sahitya Akademi. As a student and as teacher Moorthy Rao was closely associated with eminent men like Sarvepalli Radhakrishnan, H. Hirianna and B.M. Srikantiah. He has travelled widely in the West.

Although a keen student of literature, Murthy Rao firmly believes that human life is of greater cosmic dimensions and vaster than literature. We find this faith prevailing all his writings. No wonder that the life and thought of Socrates (who believed in realising good life through knowledge acquired in the light of relentless investigation) attracted him when he began his career as a writer. His first work was a translation of the story of the death of Socrates as narrated in Plato's Dialogues. The 'Preface' to his Socratesana koney dinagalu (1933) is an illuminating analysis of Plato's classic. Right from his high school days, Moorthy Rao studied French as his second language, and Moliere's great human comedies captivated him. Ashadabhuti (1931), his adaptation of Moliere's Tartuffe, opened new vistas for Kannada drama and has continued to delight and entertain play-goers. Moorthy Rao is a consummate craftsman in the essay form and its protean prose-style. Miugu minchu, Hagaluganasugalu (1937), Aleyuva mana (The rambling mind), Minugu minchu (1962) are his collections of essays which bear testimony to his artistry. He seems to let his fancy wander where it pleases and it looks as though he writes as his mood dictates him. But the essays are replete with ripe wisdom and broad human sympathy. He is full of sweet persuasiveness, tolerance and gentle and playful irony which permit an ability to laugh at others and at oneself. His style is so delightfully pliant that he can flex it to serve any purpose. For example, when he sets out to reminisce about his college days, his teachers, professors and colleagues of yester years in 'Chitragalu-patragalu' (Portraits and letter, 1978) he takes us through a veritable picture gallery, a spectacle whose dramatic quality is increased by its documentary value. A whole epoch revives and the collegiate world of the 20's and the 30's peopled by eminent scholars and men of letters, assumes once again all its topical interest. In these pages we see an author who knows how to observe and note typical details, fix them in words, exact, vivid, and expressive. Here is a writer and a style, but there is not the slightest trace of self-conscious art. 'Aparavayaskana America yatre' (An old man's American travels) is more than a travelogue; it is a narrative drawn with delightful sobriety, wit and wise contemplativeness. It is the work of a man gifted with a sharp sensibility for landscape and with a deep sense of catholicity which can transcend cultural and racial barriers.

The greatest work of Murthy Rao is perhaps in the field of criticism. His Shakespeare is an epoch-making work. It not only presents a conspectus of the plays and poems, but also provides rare insights of immense interest both to scholars and to laymen. His recent works Vimarshatmaka prabandagalu (Critical essays, 1982) and Sahitya mattu satya (Literature and truth, 1982) contain crystalized wisdom and unerring good taste for what is excellent in literature. His essay on 'Poetic Truth and Philosophical Truth', his 'Purva surigalodane' (1982) and analysis of the theme of Sita's repudiation in the Ramayana as treated by Valmiki and by Bhavabhuti reveal a sensitiveness and perceptivity which are rare in modern Indian literature.

Murthy Rao's Chitragalu-patragalu won the Sahitya Akademi Award for 1979. He was honoured with the D. Litt. degree conferred on him by the Mysore University. He presided over the Kannada literary conference at Kaivar in 1984.

FURTHER WORKS: Play: Ashadabhuti, Critical Essays: Mastiyavata Kathegalu, B M Srikantiah; Translations: Chandamaruta, Yogana punargamana, American Sahitya, The Return to the Soil (Tr. of K S Karanth's novel).

MUSAFIR, GURMUKH SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1899, d. 1976) was a poet and short story writer. He was born in the village Adhwal (now Pakistan). He started as a primary school teacher, and also edited the daily Akali. He was elected President of Punjab Congress many times, remained Member of Parliament up to 1962 and the first Chief Minister of newly formed Punjab (1st November, 1966). He entered the political field in the course of the Gurdwara Reform Movement of 1920-21. This resulted into direct confrontation with the British administration. For many years he was President, Punjabi Likhari Sabha, Punjabi Sahit Samikhyia Board, and a member of the General Council of the Central Sahitya Akademi. As a representative of the Indian writers, he participated in the World Writers Conference held at Stockholm in 1954, World Progressive Writers' Conference in 1961, World Peace Conference in 1965, and led a three-member delegation of Indian writers to Afro-Asian Conference on Vietnam and peace in 1966. He courted arrest a number of times, and when he was in jail in 1942 for participating in the Quit India Movement, his son, daughter and father died, he refused to be released on parole. He has narrated this heart rending incident in one of his short stories, 'Baghi di dhi' (Daughter of a rebel). His experiences in jail are a saga of his wide human sympathy, his love for the people and his intense patriotism. Prison life is the dominant theme of some of his short stories. Translucent clarity and simplicity characterise his writings.

His works include: Poetry—Sabar de ban (Shafts of contentment, 1921), Prem de ban (Shafts of love, 1933), Jivan pandh (Life's pilgrimage, 1949), Tute khambh (Clipped wings, 1951), Mussafaran (The itinerants, 1951), Kav-sineha (The poetic messages, 1955), Sahaj seti (Tranquil mood, 1964), Vakhra vakhra katra katra (The scattered drops). Short Stories: Chonvian kahanian (Selected stories, 1949), Sasta tamasha (Cheap entertainment, 1952), Sabh hachha (Yet all is well, 1953), Gutar (The dove, 1953), Vakhri dunia (A different world, 1954), Aalane de bot (The offspring of the nest), Kandhan bol paian (The eloquent walls), Al ah vale (The godly people), 27 January. Biography: Baghi jarnail (The rebel general), Vihvin sadi de shahid (The martyrs of the twentieth century). History: Netaji te ithas Azad Hind Fauj (History of Azad Hind Army and Netaji).

MUSHAIRA (Urdu). The collective recitation of poetry by poets themselves seems a typically eastern institution. It is quite different from the poetical soirees of the West where a number of persons recite their favourite poems which may or may not be their own creations. In India, such sittings where different poets recite their poems, have become a regular institution, particularly so in Urdu, Hindi, Sindhi and Punjabi. Urdu surpasses all other languages in the observance of this tradition.

Every poetic sitting is not a 'mushaira'. In a mushaira, the number of poets is at least a dozen, and generally poets are seated separately from the audience, who may number anything from one hundred to a few thousands.

Mushairas in the present form were first witnessed in old Iran. We can trace two sources of this institution: first, the poetic sittings held in the houses or 'diwans' of well-to-do persons, who had developed literary taste for these sittings, remained the only literary gatherings after the decline of old durbars due to the Mongol domination in the 13th century; and secondly, the practice of composing ghazals and qasidas by new poets to copy some old masterpiece in the matter of rhyme and metre. The purpose of the latter practice was to show that one could write like an old master. It is not known when 'tarahi mushairas' (in which all poets recite ghazals written in a single metre and with a common rhyme) were introduced and by whom. According to Ehtisham Husain, till the time of Shaikh Saadi (1193-1292) mushairas were not held, but the practice of emulating old master was there. However, both Maulana Shibli and Ehtisham Husain hold that in the 15th century regular tarahi mushairas were held in Shiraz and other Iranian cities.

In India, it is not known when regular mushairas were held out of royal courts, but the practice developed tremendously during the regime of Aurangzeb, who stopped recitation of poetry in the royal court. Princes and nobles, however, were not discouraged from holding such sittings at their houses, and they organised these regularly. Probably Shah Alam II again introduced poetic gatherings in the Red Fort and the practice was emulated thereafter by all kings, nawabs and nobles. At the same time, other rich persons also organised such sittings. During the British regime, such gatherings were held at educational institutions, besides the residences of princes and affluent persons. After Independence, educational institutions, literary organisations, rich persons, the A.I.R. and the Doordarshan have been organising such gatherings.

Original Mushairas were competitions in ghazals. In the later half of the 19th century, Halroyd, the D.P.I. of Punjab, introduced 'munazima' to replace mushaira. In munazima, the participating poets were expected to recite poems written on a common topic. This institution did not last long, but it popularised non-ghazal poetry, and ghazals out of the given 'tarah' crept into regular mushairas, at first only once in a while, and later as more or less a regular practice. In the post-Independence period non-tarah mushairas in which non-ghazal poetry is also recited are the general rule rather than exception.

In mushairas the beginning is made by the youngest or the least known poet, and gradually the poets of greater and more important standing are called upon to recite poems. After the most famous poet has recited, the president of the mushaira rounds up the sitting with his poem in case he is a poet.

In the 18th and 19th centuries great decorum was maintained in such gatherings. In the matter of decoration of the hall and entertainment of guests, great care was taken. The guests, too, observed a lot of formality in behaviour, matching the host's courtesy with their own courteous bearing, making no vulgar posture, gesture or remark and keeping up a pleasant atmosphere. Good poetry was rewarded with vociferous approbation and bad and ordinary poetry was punished with nothing more than silence. Such gatherings were instrumental in cultivating the taste for poetry in the common people as in the absence of the press and other modern mass media, face-to-face recitation was the only way for poets to make themselves known. In fact, to see a poet reciting his poem is more effective with the audience even at present.

Mushairas in the present time are generally finished within two or three hours. It is because life is busier now and, secondly, educated people are not so much immersed in poetry as their elders were. In the 19th century and up to the 50s of this century, big mushairas billed at least 40 poets, and the function never took less than six hours. Generally poets and the audience came to the venue of the mushaira after having an early supper and the mushaira ended not before 3 a.m. It was not unusual for a successful mushaira to end after the sunrise. As an alternative, a few mushairas began at about 2 p.m., i.e., after lunch hours, and, with breaks for evening refreshments and supper, lasted till about 10 p.m.

The fame which mushairas brought to the poets also resulted in groupism and rivalries. Famous poets came with a whole retinue of disciples and admirers. Generally these rivalries remained within the limits of decorum, but sometimes sarcastic remarks and even ugly scenes were witnessed. As a result, while organising a mushaira tactful handling of the rival groups of poets posed problems and the nobles or the rich persons or the heads of educational institutions holding mushairas had to learn the technique of handling rival groups which is almost a psychological tight-rope walking. In the present times once in a while unruly sections of the audience create difficulties for the organisers, and have to be dealt with in a tactful show of authority.

Even with these minor drawbacks mushaira in its pure form, with poets being face to face with the audience, remains the most effective means for enjoying good poetry and cultivating public taste.

MUSHAIRO (Sindhi). The tradition of organising 'Mushairo' (i.e. a gathering of poets competing with one another in poetic excellence, pl. mushaira) in Sindhi is not very old. This tradition came to Sindhi through Persian and Urdu poetry. Although Sindh had contacts with Iran from the pre-historic period of the Indus Valley Civilization, the discernible influence of Persian on the Sindhi literature is noticed after the migration and settling down of Iranian sufi poets in Sindh, like Qalandar Shahbaz Usman during the thirteenth century. The Persian language gained popularity slowly and gradually in the days of Samma rulers in Sindh (1350-1520), and then it became the language of the court and administration up to the advent of the British rule in Sindh in 1843. In the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries of the Christian era many Sindhi poets vied with one another to show their excellence in Persian poetry.

In spite of the fact that Persian poetry got its firm roots in Sindhi literature long ago, the trend of organising mushairo on composing ghazals in Persian is first noticed in Sindh during the eighteenth century. Mir Ali Sher Qani has referred to such Mushairo in his Persian work, entitled Maqalat-ul-Shuara (Treatises on poets written in 1760). The trend continued in Sindh during the rule of the British also. As the British government replaced Persian by Sindhi in the field of administration and education, the literary activities in Sindhi increased. In course of time, Sindhi, the language of masses, became the main vehicle of expression in the literary field. Sindhi poets, in the later half of the last century, mostly followed and imitated Persian poets in content and form. It gave rise to mushaira activity in the Sindhi poetry also. The beginning was made in this respect through some literary journals of the last century, such as Sindh Sudhar (started in 1866) and Muaavan (started in 1885), by 'Daavat-e-ghazal' (i.e. inviting one particular poet or some other poets to compose a ghazal in answer to a composition published already in the magazine); thus, it was a type of mushairo conducted through literary journals, in which one poet challenged another poet or poets in general to prove their poetic excellence in the composition of ghazal. The activity at first started with Persian ghazals, and later on switched over to Sindhi ghazals. Hence, most of the Persian poets of Sindh got inspiration to compose poetry in their mother tongue. The trend of Daavat-e-ghazal continued in some Sindhi magazines during the present century also.

Ayaz Husain Qadiri (b. 1924), in his thesis entitled Sindhi ghazala ji osari (The development of Sindhi Ghazal', published in two volumes in 1983-1984), mentions that the beginning of Sindhi mushaira was made by Mir Abdul Husain 'Sangi' (1851-1924). Almost on every Sunday, a number of Sindhi poets would present their ghazals in poetic gatherings organized by Sangi under his chairmanship. Later on, such activity of mushairas spread in other parts of Sindh also. 'Bazm-e-Mushairah' of Larkana (established in 1915) was perhaps, the first centre in Sindh, which conducted mushaira on a large scale, and was the first to publish the selected ghazals; presented in mushaira, in literary journals. As a result of this, many young poets got inspiration to compose poetry in Sindhi, and in course of time, Larkana became popular as Bulbuluni jo akhero (The nest of the nightingales). Thereafter organizing mushaira on various occasions and in literary conferences became popular in different towns of Sindh.

After Independence, the mushaira activity has undergone many changes. It is not limited to compositions of ghazals or other Persianized forms of poetry, produced in response to a particular poem. Nowadays, almost on the occasion of every literary conference, one or two sessions are exclusively devoted to presentation of poetry by different poets. Generally a well-known Sindhi poet presides over the function. Different poets recite or sing their poetic compositions, based on Persian or Indian metres, or even without following any metric rules. Hence, the Mushaira in Sindhi, which started strictly on the basis of Persian poetry, especially that of ghazal form, has undergone great change. Now, it is a 'Kavi sammelan', MUSINGS (Telugu) is a beautiful and unique work in Telugu literature. During the nineteen-twenties Chalam revolted against the institution of marriage. He fought for the freedom of women all through his life. He wrote hundreds of short-stories, several novels, essays and plays to enlighten the Telugu public on this social problem. Of all his writings Premalekhalu (Love-letters) and Musings are the best.

Chalam wrote his stray thoughts and recorded his feelings on men and matters in a special kind of writing which he called Musings. He expressed his thoughts beautifully and at times powerfully.

Chalam is a poet by temperament. In Musings one can find his poetry at its best. He dedicated the book to his sweet-heart Leela. Chalam started his Musings while he was working as an invigilator in the examination hall. He put his unending stream of thoughts in a literary form.

Chalam praised Yenki patalu (written by Sri Nanduri Venkatasubba Rao in folk-style). He loved 'Yonki' for her purity and innocence. He mused on several topics like Tagore's Gitanjali, ladies who pretend that they are doing social service, Brahmosamaj, jasmine flowers, women, cruel head-master, the children who suffer from the present system of education and several other things.

Musings has been a favourite book with the enlightened readers for four decades.

MUTHIRINGOD BHAVATHRATHAN BHATTATHIRIPAD (Malayalam; b. 1905; d. 1944) was a well-known author and a distinguished leader of the movement aimed at reforming the Namboothiri community. His name as recorded in the histories of Malayalam literature is Bhavathrathan Namboothiri.

He had erudite ancestors on his paternal and maternal sides. He was a follower of the Sama Veda. Tarka and Vedanta were the other principal subjects he studied. He had his English education under private tutors.

Having founded the youth wing of the Namboothiri Yogakshema Sabha, he started a magazine called Unni Namboothiri. To this and other periodicals like Sahiti and Yogakshemam Bhavathrathan contributed articles exhorting the Namboothiris to discard their superstitious practices.

His contribution consists of four books, namely

Apphante makal (The paternal uncle's daughter), Poomkula (A bunch of flowers), Atmarpanam (Self-dedication) and Marupuram (The other side). The first is a social novel widely acclaimed, and regarded as his masterpiece. Its characterisation, atmosphere, development and style have been admired by critics. The second and third are collections of short stories and the last is a collection of essays.

MUTIYARASAN (Tamil; b. 1920), is a poet of repute in Tamil. He was born at Periyakulam in Madurai District, Tamilnadu. His parents were Thiru Subbarayan and Thirumati Seethalakshmi Ammal. He had his early education in his birth place. A poet in the footprints of Puratchik Kavinar Bharatidasan, Mutiyarasan got his 'Pulavar' title from Ganesar Chentamilk Kalloori at Melaicchivapuri. After serving for two years as Tamil teacher in the Muthialpet High School in Madras, he joined the Minakshi Sundareswarar High School at Karaikkuti.

Mutiyarasan had participated in hundreds of poetry symposiums at various places in Tamilnadu. His passion for Tamil is reflected in almost all his poems.

His collection of poems under the title Mutiyarasan kavitaikal won him an award from the Government of Tamilnadu. At a festival held to celebrate the memory of the benevolent Chieftain Pari of the Sangam Age, in 1966, Tavattiru Kunrakkuti Atikalar honoured him with the title 'Kaviyafasu' (A king among poets).

Apart from Mutiyarasan kavitaikal, the poet has written two epics, viz. Punkoti and Vira kaviyam.

Punkoti is an epic in thirty-one 'katais' or parts. Following the pattern of Manimekalai of Chittalai Chittannar (2nd century A.D.), Kavinar Mutiyarasan has portrayed the main character, Punkoti. Just like Manimekalai, the daughter of Kovalan and Matavi, who lived as a spinster, spurning worldly pleasures and preaching Buddhism, Punkoti also did not get married and lived for the propagation of the Tamil language and literature.

The work, in each and every part, speaks of the richness and beauty of Tamil. There is no other work which is written for the cause of Tamil. Preserving all Tamil classics, producing new books, protecting the purity of Tamil language from the influence of other languages such as Sanskrit and making Tamil the medium in all walks of life are the four main principles propagated by Mutiyarasan in this epic (Punkoti, Part 29, lines 44-52).

Kaviyappavai is a collection of lyrics. Kaviyarankil Mutiyarasan contains the verses of the poet recited at many symposiums held in various parts of Tamilnadu.

MUTIYETTU-MUTTOLLAYIRAM

His other works include Pantiyanukku, a collection of essays in the form of letters and Patum paravai. Some of his poems have been translated into Hindi and English for the Sahitya Akademi.

MUTIYETTU (Malayalam) is one of the theatre-forms of Kerala having a folk origin. In mutiyettu, puranic stories are dealt with. Unlike in the classical theatre of kathakali, in mutiyettu the characters talk, and sing with musical accompaniment. Dialogue is satirical. The dialogues are very interesting and humorous also. Stories like Darika vadha are presented on the stage by characters wearing simple folk costumes. Mutiyettu has devotional content, with an emphasis on ritual.

The performers are of the 'Kakkan' community, a nomadic people. Mutiyettu is popular in some villages of South Kerala.

MUTTASSI (Malayalam) is a collection of 21 short poems written by the eminent poetess, Balamani Amma. Her five-decade long, dedicated, eventful life as daughter, wife, mother and grand-mother and the richness and variety of her experiences are clearly reflected in the collection. Published in 1962, it won her the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in 1964 and the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966.

The collection is remarkable for the meditative expression of the poetess's deep affection for children. In the very first poem entitled 'Dukkham', we enter the superrational realm of poetic experience along with the poetess and find that sorrow itself is transformed into bliss.

The title poem 'Muttassi', which means grandmother, was written in 1959 when she actually began to enjoy the company of her first grandchild. This glorifies the charm, sweetness and innocence of small children. "I feel," says the poetess in a part of the poem, "a pleasure hitherto unexperienced spreading throughout my body like an electric current when your charming face touches my breast." Perhaps she believes that this is the best in the whole collection.

The poems were composed in her fifties, between 1958 and 1962. In the preface to the collection she herself has made this clear. Now she is over 78 and is still writing poems now and then.

MUTTOLLAYIRAM (Tamil) is a post-Sangam Tamil classic of which only a part is available. Its date of composition and the name of its author are lost and there are perhaps no hopes of retrieving them. The poem itself gives no historical account of this that can be dated and no personal details account of this that can be dated and no personal details about its author.

It is evident that the classic was known to the learned commentators of the 12th, 13th and 14th centuries. They seem to have had the text before them in complete form. Perasiriyar for instance commenting on sutra 239 of Tolkappiyam in the section on prosody gives Muttollayiram as an instance of what Tolkappiyar called 'viruntu', a poetic composition in a new style and form. Naccinarkiniyar the other commentator tells us that the majority of verses in Muttollayiram consisted of four lines while some were of six; this information is confirmed by Perasiriyar also.

The name 'Muttallayiram' seems to imply either a total of nine hundred verses or of two thousand seven hundred verses depending on how we interpret the name; it might mean the three together nine hundred or the three nine hundreds. The implication seems to be that the original work consisted of three equal number of poems (either three hundred or nine hundred each) on the three kings of the Tamils—the Cheras, the Cholas and the Pandyas. But only 109 verses are available of the work today, the rest being irretrievably lost. Of these 109 verses 56 are about the Pandya, 30 are about the Cholas. And there is no means of knowing which particular Cholas, Pandays or Cheras are talked about. They are all styled by generic names and no historical contexts are indicated.

No personal details about the author can be gleaned from the verses available to us today except for a guess that he was a worshipper of Muruga and Shiva and for a far more distant guess that he was a dweller of the Chola country.

That the poet of Muttollayiram was a poet of considerable merit there can be no doubt. Working well within the conventions of his time he is able to array a series of metaphors and conceits that are memorable and unique. In one verse for instance he describes the flowering of the lotus in the pond, in these unique poetic terms:

"When the red lotuses opened their buds and inflamed the well-watered fields, the birds, startled, try to protect their young in Kothai's land protected by his mighty spear.

The style here is a bit more sophisticated and advanced than in the Sangam poems. There is a larger influence of Sanskrit and a larger influence of Sanskrit and a larger number of Sanskrit words than in the Sangam poems.

Even talking of a conventional topic like the love of a teenage adolescent for the prince of the land the poet manages to make it somewhat original.

MUVAR ULA

"Open the doors wide when Urantai's king walks the street wearing cool garlands lest any young girl die of disappointment not having been able to behold the noble chief".

In yet another example of the poet's art:

"Pearls are produced not only on Korkai shores:
Nor are they all of oyster origin;
They roll from maidens' eyes also when they behold Korkai's lord with the bloody spear."

The rediscovery of the Muttollayiram verses that we have now come about in this way. From the times of the commentators except for the one verse quoted in full by the commentator Ilapurannar, nothing else was known of the text till at the turn of the twentieth century. Scholars came upon 44 of the verses in an anthology known as Purathirattu under several heads and in an appendix to it of 65 poems dealing with love and together pieced out what we have of the Muttollayiram now. The author is likely to remain unknown for all time. The date of the composition of the poem by a single hand as the poems themselves seem to evidence it was sometime between the sixth and the thirteenth centuries. In what order the poems were written or originally composed and put together by the poet we have no means of knowing.

The first edition of the present text of Muttollayiram was published in 1905 and was reissued in 1935 edited by Mahavidwan R. Raghava Iyengar for the Tamil Sangam, Madurai. Subsequently, it had several editions, and also an English translation by P.N. Appuswami (Published by Kurinji, Calcutta, 1977).

MUVAR ULA (Tamil). Ula, considered as one among the ninety-six varieties of minor poems (termed 'chirrilak kiyam' in Tamil) is explained as having its roots in the Tolkappiyam colophone 'Urotu torramum urittena moli-pa' and its germination in the epics. A king or a chieftain, or deity is chosen as the hero and is pictured in the ula as riding over an elephant, when women belonging to the seven successive stages of womanhood, namely the 'petai' (5-7 yrs); the 'petumpai' (8-11 yrs); the 'mankai' (12-13 yrs); the 'matantai' (14-19 yrs); the 'arivai' (20-25 yrs); the 'terivai' (26-31 yrs) and the 'perilampen' (32-40 yrs) rave madly and give vent to their feelings of endearment over him.

The first work to appear under this genre was Tirukkayilaya jnana ula (8th cent.) in praise of Lord Shiva. The others to follow were many in number.

Muvar ula (i.e. The ulas of the three kings), considered the second best only because, unlike the Inana ula, it portrays earthly kings as its heroes, is actually a compilation of three works on three Chola kings of three successive generations (12th cent.), viz., Vikrama Chola, Kulottunga II and Raja Raja II of the imperial Chola dynasty. It was written by Ottakkuttar.

Vikrama Cholan ula alone was first published in 1914, in the journal Chentamil by the Tamil Sangam of Madurai. Next, all the three together, under the title Muvar ula were published by the Tamil Pandit A. Gopala Iyer, in 1926, followed by U.V. Swaminatha Iyer's with an old commentary, notes, special notes and text variations in 1946 and one in 1960 by T. Sanku Pillai through S.I.S.S.W.P.S. LTD.

Ottakkuttar, the author, was a great court poet of the 12th century, an erudite scholar of pedantic but sweet and imaginative style in a Sanskrit mixed-Tamil language. Ottakkuttar, a native of Manakkudi of Thanjavur district, being a scion of the warrior caste Sengunthar, composed two war poems Takka yaga barani and litti ezhupatu apart from so many minor poems.

In the Muvar ula, the first part deals with the ancestral glory of the Chola dynasty and praise of the present hero's valour and deeds. Then follow his awakening to the accompaniment of music, the ceremonious bath in incensed water, adorning himself in attractive attire and then riding over the state elephant to go in procession around the town. The second part of the book consists of the emotions and expressions of the women of the seven stages. The book ends with the note: 'thus, amidst great pomp, splendour and adoration, the hero came in procession around the streets of his capital'.

The book written in couplets called 'kannikal', surpasses all the others belonging to this genre, in its literary merit which lies in the highly imaginative and rhythmic verses. To cite a single example from each, in the Vikrama Cholan ula, the lines depicting the beauty of the petumpai stage, run as follows:

"To the parrot, she gave her lisping,
And borrowed from flute, sweet music;
Before dusk she gave Mullai her laughter
And replaced by pearls the teeth which glitter;
The maiden's coy look, she gave it to the deer
In their place fixed two poisonous spears;
The curves to Matavi, the creeper, she gave
And got them back from the sky's lightning wave."

In the second book, the innocence of the petai is beautifully expressed thus:

"The unruly curls tried into a knot
Flying in the breeze, a war they fought
The string of pearls around his broad chest,
The stream for her swan, she considered just
His necklace of feathers, the home for her parrot
His elephant huge, the hill for her peacock,
His umbrella, she called the moon with shadow
She begged and bellowed to have them her own"

MYMANSINGHA GITIKA-MYSORU MALLIGE

In the third book, a woman is pictured as lamenting over the attack of Cupid and beseeching the lord to save her:

"O king, your weapons that save all the world
Won't they kill Cupid and suck the blood?
Your bow that sent an arrow to dry the sea
Won't it send an arrow to save poor me?
The Chakra that killed the bereaved crocodile
Won't it kill the fish? I cry in vain.
Won't your sword cut the moon that kills?
Won't your conch blow in the morning that I live?
Oh, will my doubts ever have an end?
Oh, will my pining never have an end?"

MYMANSINGHA GITIKA (Bengali) is a collection of ten poems selected and edited by Dineshchandra Sen and published by Calcutta University in 1923. They belonged to the oral tradition of the peasants of the district of Mymensing of Bangladesh. They were collected by Chandrakumar Dey. Like all folk literature these compositions are also anonymous. Occasionally names appear in the text but they are only the names of their singers, not their authors. What is singular about these poems is that they are predominantly secular in tone and often end in tragedy whereas most other contemporary tales are religious in character and normally end in comedy. These works are undated and it is impossible to fix with any certainty the dates of their composition. But internal evidence indicates that they could not have been composed earlier than the eighteenth century. It is possible that their authors were influenced by the romantic tales of Laila and Majnu which the Muslims had brought with them to Bengal. Some of these compositions can be truly described as ballads while the rest are folk tales and devotional stories in verse.

The incidents described in the ballads are mostly dramatic. The characters among whom the women predominate, move very fast and take vital decisions on urgent matters of life, e.g., marriage and death with utter disregard to their parents or to the approved social code. They obey the dictates of their conscience only. Mahua, a gypsy girl, disobeys her foster-father, marries and then dies for the cause of love. Mahua disobeys her husband and Chandravati turns herself to stone as she refuses to see the face of her beloved even at the time of his self-inflicted death. Thus the women of the ballads are unlike the traditional Hindu women and this is what impresses the readers most.

Social life as depicted in the Maymansimha gitika is altogether different from those of the Hindus and the Muslims prevailing at the time. There is no rigid social code for marriage. Parents normally do not interfere and arranged marriage is not the use and wont. Young men and women choose their own partners of life. Women are more faithful in love and marriage than their men. There is no caste or social restrictions in marriage. Rigidity of the Hindu caste system and the Muslim purdah system do not seem to exist. Marriage ritual presided over either by a Brahmin priest in the case of a Hindu or by a Maulavi in case of a Muslim marriage is generally observed. Chastity of the women is not made much of and society do not always take any serious notice of sexual lapses.

D.C. Sen believed that the ballads were composed in a remote age when the Brahminic influence had not yet spread upto the other side of the Brahmaputra. But it appears that the society in which these ballads originated was basically of a tribal character inasmuch as it was relatively more permissive and egalitarian. Probably the basic population of the society belonged to the Bodo group of Assam which was matriachal in character like the neighbouring Garo and the Khasi peoples of Assam.

MYSORU MALLIGE (Kannada) is a collection of K.S. Narasimhaswami's 45 lyrics first published in 1942. It is perhaps the most popular collection of songs in modern Kannada poetry, having run into seventeen editions. It contains the poems that were composed from time to time between 1931 and 1941 and had been earlier published in Prabuddha Karnataka. In these simple and effusive songs the poet sings the paen of married love, and creates a tender world of warmth and devotion. What we find here is the simplicity and directness of folk-poetry, the drama and poetry that are inherent in the ordinary, everyday incidents of life. Almost every line is poetry springing straight from life, always intense, vivid and utterly spontaneous, and eminently singable. 'When she lets her dark hair spread/All over her shoulder, it's like/Night's garland lining the distant hill tops/.../ 'She never longs for jewels and ornaments/My beloved golden girl/ 'On the coconut fonds, the Full Moon comes/Milching the silvery cows/ 'We paddle the stars, row beyond the moon/We are one in love/We know no pain, no death/ 'Her cheek like the dusk/Her eyes, the little star in the clear sky/' Such lines are legion and they breathe a spirit of naivete conjuring an atmosphere at once touching and sweet. And occasionally, sorrow breaks in causing a mild flutter in this rain-bow world of silken fancy. But it is sorrow which can be laughed away when love in pair canter cheek by jowl.... 'Laugh, my darling, let a tiny pearl drop away/ Laugh, quickly, casting off our care/'. Narasimhaswamy's mastery over liquid syllables and pictorial phrases is amazing. But his best works were still unwritten.

MYSTICISM (Assamese). Mysticism is not only a loaded word, but it lends itself to many different kinds of interpretations. It can be broadly defined as a state of consciousness and a part of man's religious experience. Mystical traditions of the different religions spring from varied religious traditions. The Upanishadic mysticism of Hinduism is different from Sufi or Christian mysticism. Religions of Indian origin are in their higher form essentially mystical. Within Hinduism there are different traditions of mysticism which at times may appear to be very different from one another. But though the religious traditions may be different, there is a common thread which binds all mystical experiences together.

One aspect of religious mysticism may be found in the cult of bhakti. Hindu bhakti can be seen as theistic mysticism. The story of Prahlad's devotion to Lord Vishnu is an important myth for the Bhakti poets. Prahlad's love unites him with Vishnu. In such a state the personal beloved Lord of ordinary theistic religion expands into the mystical All-Being which is the Supreme One. Mysticism of the Assamese Vaishnava saint poets would come under this category. In the Vaishnavite literature of Assam the mystical element is present in the awareness of God being at the heart of all creation, though his manifestation may be different. Shankaradeva has a narrative poem on Bhakta Prahlad which tells of Prahlad's mystical experience of oneness with the Lord. But Shankaradeva does not always convey the intense mystic experience of bhakti in his writings though the realisation of the oneness of all beings is present in his poetry. It must, however, be said that the mystic experience of bhakti is a secondary experience in him. He is more concerned with bhakti as faith and as a social reform movement. Though mystic bhakti experience appears to be of the secondary type in Shankaradeva, we must not forget that he was inspired by the old Hindu mystical bhakti texts like Vishnu-purana, Maha Bhagavata, and the Bhagavata-purana in which mystic devotion to the Lord takes the supreme place. In the Namghosha of Madhabadeva the usefulness of the path of bhakti in attaining communion with the Lord is stressed. The "rahasya" or mystery which the mystic poets want to comprehend is in Hari's (Lord's) name. So chanting the name of Hari and Rama has assumed mystic significance for the bhakti poets of Assam. There is no doubt that this efficacy imputed to the reciting of the name of the Lord is imbued with a clear mystical significance as otherwise it becomes a meaningless ritual. S.N. Dasgupta regards the bhakti type of worship as one of the chief forms of Indian mysticism.

Before the advent of Shankaradeva and the Vaishnavite movement in the 15th and 16th centuries in Assam, the bhakti cult was prevalent in the area now known to us as Assam. Sacrificial mysticism was prevalent in Assam then known as Kamarupa. Yogini Tantra, an important tantric text, was composed in Kamarupa, and it can be definitely said that tantric mystic rituals formed an integral part of the religion there. As in other religious mystical experiences, so also in sacrificial mysticism there is no rational explanation as to why by sacrifices certain mystical results could be achieved. S.N. Dasgupta has written on the mystical significance of the Vedic sacrifices and Hindu religious rituals. The shakti cult in Assam is imbued similarly with a belief in the value of sacrifice and in the ancient time even human sacrifice was made in some of the temples to propitiate the Goddess and to bring good fortune to the king or to the one who made such sacrifice. There are references to sacrificial mysticism in the shakti literary texts as well as in the popular religious literature of Assam which have come down to us in the form of popular religious devotional songs. The shakti cult was widespread among the original Austro-mongoloid races of Assam who brought their own non-Hindu religious traditions of the worship of the mother to the shakti cult. These races also attached mystic significance to mother-worship and fertility rites. So the Hindu and the Buddhist tantric mysticism had a curious blending in ancient Kamarupa. There were religious communities practising tantric mystical rites around temples such as Kamakhya and many other such shrines which are scattered throughout Assam. Along with the convergence of Chinese-Buddhist-Taoist mysticism and Hindu tantricism a new indigenous shakti mystic cult was born. This was a creative achievement of cultural transformation and interaction. But apart from the Yogini tantra and some other Sanskrit texts, the literature of this cultural creativity is mostly found in oral form or in the form of art works and icons and images in the temples. Oral literature in the form of devotional songs, stories and myths have come down to us from this pre-Vaishnava and ancient history of the tribes of Assam. But we do not find much literature regarding the shakti mystical tradition in Assam. This was perhaps because it gradually became a secret cult whereas the Vaishnavite mystical tradition of bhakti remained an open and all-embracing religious tradition in Assam leaving behind a rich crop of creative literature.

The romantic movement in Assamese literature started with the publication of Jonaki from Calcutta in

MYSTICISM-BENGALI

1889. The Assamese romantic poetry has mystical poets within its canon, though we cannot say that the mystical tradition is a powerful tradition in Assamese romantic poetry. In modern times Lakshminath Bezbarua (1864-1934), a pioneer of romanticism in Assamese literature in its various genres, has written a few very beautiful mystical poems. He was deeply inspired by the bhakti poetry of Assam and had a deep love and reverence for Shankaradeva's "Namdharma". In one of his poems, written after the death of his young daughter, Bezbarua finds that the notes of sorrow merge into those of 'ananda' (joy). In the poem which has the key line "Aketi surar bahiti bandha aketi ananda gan" (the notes of sorrow and joy merge into one another), the joy and sorrow are according to the poet not different notes, but they form a harmonious whole. This realization of the unity and harmony which the poet conveys so successfully at the moment of sorrow, is surely a mystic experience of the first order. In the poetry of Chandrakumar Agarwala (1867-1938) we find traces of nature mysticism. Mafizuddin Ahmed Hazarika (1870-1958) is famous for his collection of poems Jnan malini. The elements of sufi mysticism can be seen in his poetry which has a deceptively simple style. A sufi does not recognise that he is separate from God. He believes that man's lower instincts have to be constantly refined until they are made instruments of a higher purpose. He also believes that God should be worshipped for his eternal beauty and that God's love precedes man's love of God. The sufi mystic poet also sees God's hand in every minute act of creation. Sufi poetry describes the growth of the soul in images taken from gardens. These aspects of sufi mystical poetry are seen in Mafizuddin Ahmed Hazarika's poetry. In his preface to his verse collection Jnan malini, he describes his mystical visit to the garden Hafez perhaps referring to a sufi saint poet by that name. The poet returns with a garland from this celestial garden and writes of God's mysterious creation—the universe. He also exhorts his fellow brothers to prepare themselves to receive God's higher knowledge and be fit for God's love. In beautiful homely rural idiom the poet urges us to think of the eternal life and not be merely engrossed in the mundane in life. Hazarika's poetry in clearly sufi mystic poetry and he has assimilated sufi mystical insights.

Ambikagiri Roy Choudhury (1885-1967) is another important mystic poet. Through yoga sadhana of various types, the mystic loses contact with the transient outward reality and an inner light shines forth in the soul. This realization is the awareness of God-head in himself which is the mystic's supreme achievement. It may happen through tantra advaita or bhakti forms of mystical experience. The mystic seeks in all his life to achieve certain moments of extreme ecstasy and glory through self-transcendence. But as such a state is rarely achieved, the mystic laments his separation from his God or Beauty or by whatever name he may call that Supreme Being. Ambikagiri's poems "Tumi" and "Bina" have been described as mystical poems by Maheshwar Neog in his book Modern Assamese Literature. The preface to "Tumi" is a clear mystical document. Nilamani Phukan's 'Manasi' is also a mystical poem. Nalinibala Devi is a mystical poet of the early twentieth century. In her poem 'Shesh argha' (The last offering) a mystic experience is conveyed to us. Her love is passive but intensely passionate. The pining for the beloved even at the far end of her life takes the form of love which transcends even death.

In the nineteenth century Assam's horizons opened and poets wanted to comprehend the whole universe. They were also, no doubt, open to the influence of the English romantic poets many of whom were nature mystics. The Assamese romantic mystic poet wanted to see the universe in a particle of dust. He wanted to be in harmony with the universal soul which pervaded all creation, more particularly the beautiful. Modern Assamese literature deals with the part rather than the whole. As it deals with the fragmentary in experience and does not often venture to be comprehensive, mystical vision is lacking in such literature. Moreover, the mode of apprehending reality is now analytical rather than mystical. Mystical mode of apprehension is not often trusted by the modern poet or writer. However, in the works some individual poets with vestiges of romanticism still present in their consciousness, we can yet see in flashes a mystical insight. Such a mystic poet of our time is Parbati Prasad Barua (1902-1964). His poem "Ahis baragi andhar batat" (The minstrel on the dark path) conveys a mystic experience which has not yet achieved fulfilment. The poet is hesitant and yet he hopes to finally unravel the universal mystery. Mystic elements can also be seen in the poetry of Durgeswar Sarma (1885-1961) and in some of the poems of Nilmani Phukan, Jr. (1933).

MYSTICISM (Bengali) As a religious practice mysticism is a quest for the hidden truth or wisdom. Its goal is union with the divine or the sacred. The path to that union is usually developed by the following four stages: purgation of bodily desires, purification of the will, illumination of the mind and unification of one's will or being with the divine. Some literary qualities can easily be found in at least some of the expressions of religious thought, sermons, and the devotional songs of any ancient people of any land. The early Bengali literary specimens, like those of other Indian languages, can be traced in the practices of various religious sects existing in Bengal during the 9th and 10th centuries, when the new Indo-Aryan speech was taking shape from Avahatta or proto-vernacular stage of Apabhramsha. Curiously enough, specimens of the earliest Bengali literary works were mystic songs known as 'charyagiti' or practice-songs. Approximately dated between 1050 AD and 1200 AD these songs, originally discovered with an elaborate commentary in Sanskrit, incorporate the mystic practices of some Buddhist Tantriks and non-Buddhist Yogis. Tantrism in Bengal was generally professed by the Mahayana Buddhists, the Shaivites and the Vaishnavites, and all these sects took women as mates in their practices. This is evident from some of the charyas where the fatal amour of a shavara couple and the love of Kanha, one of the charya poets, for his Dom mistress are clearly mentioned. The 'yoga-sadhana', however, forbids such amours and insists on celibacy; and songs by Lui, Saraha, Bhusuka Kanha, etc. echo thoughts of such strict austerities of the yoga. On the other hand, a few names and terms such as Tathagatas, Nirvana, Mara, Heruka and Buddha clearly testify to the Buddhist Tantric beliefs of some poets. The term 'sunya' mentioned in many songs and not exclusively a Buddhistic term, also indicates the mystic practices of both the Buddhist (Mahayana and Sahajayana) and the Shaiva sects of that period. These charya songs carry a double meaning or 'sandha bachana' (code language), the outward meaning guarding the inner sense which suggest mystic practice, experience and emotion of the masters in their process of self-realisation. Among the poets of the charya songs we can detect at least two generations of writers. Lui was the guru of Darika and Kanha refers to Jalandhari as if the latter were his guru. If this Jalandhari were the commentator of Suddhivajrapradipa of Saraha, as suggested by Sukumar Sen, we should find at least three generations of poets of these old Bengali mystic songs: Saraha to Jalandhari to Kanha.

The writers of these mystic songs were generally known as Siddhacharya inasmuch as they were spiritual masters and were believed to have attained the final spiritual goal or siddhi. Some were reputed as great yogis (mahayogis), others were known as avadhuta (literally, purified i.e., washed clean of ignorance and delusion). According to the yogis or mystics the human body and mind form a microcosm and the outside universe, the macrocosm, is only its replica. When a person succeeds in controlling his body-functions, when he commands his vital and mental operations, and when he attains the blissful state of complete neutrality (technically called 'sahaja') by liquidating volition, he becomes truly immortal in the sense that life and death become indistinguishable stages to him. Kanha, in one of his songs addressed to his disciple who grieves at the imminent death of his guru says: 'Only a fool suffers grief at the annihilation of a mere appearance. Can breakers ever drain out the sea?.....In this existence no one really comes in or goes out. With this attitude Kanha the yogi enjoys himself.'

Being mystics the make-up of the mind of the mystic poets was predisposed to poetic fancy. But as the poets were anxious to hide the real meaning of their songs from the curiosity and sceptic attitude of the merely learned, they adhered to the old tradition of the riddle verse in a few songs. Thus reads a song ascribed to Dhendhana by an anonymous follower: 'Not a grain of rice is left in the boiling pot, but lovers are always (knocking at the door). The stream of life flows on swiftly; but can milk, once milked out, ever go back to the teat (of the cow)? A bullock has claved while the cow remains barren, and he gives milk in pailfuls thrice daily.'

Some poets wrote songs in the older literary tradition of Avahatta. These songs were used only in the secret rituals of Tantric worship and were called Vajragiti (the song of thunder) some of which were invocations of Heruka, the deity of the thunder, by his beloved yogini, put in the form of a passionate appeal from a girl trying to awaken her sleeping mate. The third type written in the same archaic dialect but didactic in nature was called 'doha'. These doha songs of ten explain straight away the difficulty of exposing the secret truths coming down to the yogis from their masters.

Through the Buddhist Tantra, Indian religious thought along with mystic practices saw new developments. The spirit of pure devotion, the attitude of absolute surrender and the highest reverence for the guru—all these characteristic features of the Vaishnava movement of the 16th century had already been evident in the workings of some of the Buddhist mystics. The form and subject-matter of the charya songs reappear with necessary changes in the sixteenth century and later in the Ragatmika (belonging to mystic love) songs of the Vaishnava Tantriks, generally known as the 'bauls'. But mystic poetry was always outside the pale of accepted literature.

The Turkish invasion at the beginning of the 13th century followed by the Muslim occupation of Bengal shattered the cultural set-up and silenced the pundits and poets writing in Sanskrit, but not the singers of the mystic cults and the rhapsodists of the popular deities. During this dark period of the literary history of Bengal, indigenous myths and legends from the various ethnic and cultural groups began to blend and crystalize round popular deities or semi-mythical figures like Manasa, Chandi and Dharma, and a new myth cosmogony evolved. The new cosmogony received some new tales which included the legends of the Natha-gurus and that of Dharma worship. These legends have some mystical elements in them as they came under the influence of the Shaivite asceticism and tantric yoga in the later period. The story of Gorakshanath and Minanath (known as Gorakshavijaya or Minaketan) came to figure together in the legend of the Natha gurus, Minanath being very much known to the early Buddhist mystics. During this dark period (13th-14th centuries) the tradition of the Siddhas was already forming among the Buddhist Tantriks. The high lord Ratna, son of Nrsingha, wrote at the instance of a female mystic (Dakini) two works describing the glorious activities (abadana) of fifty Siddhas and thirty-five Jnana-Dakinis, some of which can be traced later in some middle Bengali dramatic and narrative poems.

MYSTICISM-DOGRI

With the advent of Chaitanya and his followers (15th, 16th century), a new creative urge was felt in the spiritual and intellectual life of Bengal, particularly among the Vaishnavites. The traditional lyrical writings based on the love of Krishna and Radha coming down from Avahatta literature and enriched by Vidyapati and other poets of Mithila and Gaud were already there. With this tradition the 16th century poets, particularly the Vaishnava poets, took Chaitanya as an 'avatar' representing Krishna and Radha simultaneously, and sought mystical union with them or either of them through Chaitanya. After the death of Nityananda, the main propagator of Chaitanya's faith, the Vrindavana school of Vaishnavism dominated the Bengal Vaishnavites and somewhat smothered the Bengali lyrical outbursts by their stress on theology. Still the Bengal Vaishnavites, tintured with the tantriks, found a way for their own Sadhana and thus Krishnadas Kaviraj in his Chaitanya charitamrita attempted a synthesis of the learned theology of the Goswamins of Vrindavan and the mystic approach.

The bauls of the later centuries were the true representatives of what may be called the underground mystic school of Vaishnavism. There is a dash of Sufism in it, but some touch of it was already there in Chaitanya's faith as one of his right-hand man, Haridas, was a Sufi before he had come to the Vaishnava faith, and Sufism was not unknown to Sanatan and Rup, the two brothers who followed Chaitanya's faith.

In the seventeenth century court of Arakan, a neighbouring province of lower Burma, Alaol, a sufi poet and a Persian scholar, abridged and revised the story of Jaisi's famous narrative poem 'Padmavati' at the request of Magan Thakur, a minister of the king of Arakan and an admirer of Sufism. Some portions of the free translation of the poem particularly that which relates to Ratan Sen's efforts to win the heart of Padmini or that which describes the elusive beauty of Padmini bear witness to Alaol's mystical experience. In the eighteenth century, Ramprasad Sen in some of his devotional songs appeals to the Mother Goddess or Shakti in such a manner as to express his mystical union with her in a very frank and homely way. In some of his songs the Mother turns to a typical Bengali daughter (Shakti) who comes to stay for a few days in her father's house (agamani) only to return back (bijaya) to her husband (Shiva) for the rest of the year, and the father-poet or the mother-poet expects eagerly for the daughter or craves for her longer stay with her parents. This father-daughter or mother-daughter relationship between God and man is definitely a new dimension of the mystical experience in our literature.

Besides these Shakta and Vaishnava mystical songs some religious sects retained their own way of seeking truth in spite of Aryanisation of so many of non-Aryan religious sects. These sects, not getting sanctions from the Hindu theologians, imbibed and blended some characteristic practices of the various Shakti and Bhakti cults only to survive among the lower classes of people for their own religious cravings. Among these popular songs baul, kartabhaja, marfati and gurusatya deserve mention baul being the most powerful and influential among them in expressing a complete surrender to the inner being (maner manus) after the style of lover-mistress relationship of the Vaishnava mode of worship.

This search for the inner being became the motto of the Romantic school of poetry which started with Biharilal Chakravarti in the early fifties of the last century. His Saradamangal (1879) and Sadher asan (1888-89) describe, though rather loosely, the tryst with the Deity of poetic imagination and give us a taste of the mystic experience of a vision of beauty underlying this vast universe. A great admirer of Biharilal, Rabindranath Tagore in his romantic outbursts during the Swadeshi period starting from 1905, pinned his faith on the bauls of Bengal some of whom he had met in North-Central Bengal. The baul mode influenced his patriotic and mystical poems and songs particularly those of Kheya (1906), Gitanjali (1910), Gitimalya (1914) and Gitali (1914). Even when he came out of his shell to respond to the greater call of humanity he was called from within himself and throughout his life there was a continuous duel between the ego and the super-ego. It is evident, for instance, in one of his songs from the 'Crossing'. 'This melody that overflows my life only I know and my heart knows. Why I watch and wait, what I beg and from whom, only I know and my heart knows'. This mystical and devotional strain continues in the songs of Atulprasad Sen, Rajanikanta Sen and Nazrul Islam. Like Tagore they blended skilfully the two apparently contradictory tendencies; political response and mystical devotionism. From the 1930's onward, in a changed social perspective, the mystical-devotional approach has gradually receded though the search for the inner being is and will always be there.

MYSTICISM (Dogri). Dogri poetry has a fairly large segment of devotional element in it, but the bulk of it is inspired by the tradition of 'Saguna bhakti' (worship of the Divine in the form of gods and goddesses and local deities), although one comes across the glimpses of mystic trends and strains here and there. These stray expressions of mysticism in poetry are not enough to justify their inclusion in the category of mystic poetry. Two Dogri poets, Swami Brahmanand Tirth (1891-1962) and Gogaram Sathi (1926-1984), however, are essentially mystic poets. A monograph on the former under the 'Markers of Indian Literature' series by J.C. Sathe, has been published by the Sahitya Akademi. Swami Brahmanand's mystic poetry finds of place in his work, Shri Brahma sankirtan, published by the Research and Publication Department of Jammu and Kashmir State Government in 1958, and Amrit varsha and Shri Brahmanand bhajanmala, both published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu in 1959. Gogaram Sathi's work is included in his three books of poetry, Dikhane ali akh nayin, Hirakhi dhage and Manai da ata, all published by Dogri Sanstha, Jammu in 1972, 1981 and 1985 respectively.

Swami Brahmanand was a sanyasin, well-versed in the Sanskrit texts on Yoga and Vedanta, the Quran, the Bible and poetic works of sufis like Farid and Nirguna saints like Kabir. He sang of divine bliss and merger with the Supreme as the ultimate goal.

Amar Sukhan di ichha jagi
Surg bih pichh-chen rehi gaya (When the aspiration for the eternal bliss rose
The charms of paradise even were of no use.)

Gogaram Sathi belonged to a scheduled caste, worked in army messes and retired to the life of a farmer. He started writing poetry and in course of time became so popular that his lyrics are widely sung in religious congregations, particularly in his native environs, even after his death. Even the titles of his works are significant: Dikhane ali akh nayin means there are no such eyes that can see Him. No human eyes can see God; one has to look within:

Andar terai Sajjan
there baithe chup-chapiten
Jhund guhari tun nin dikheya andar jhanki mari nayin
(Your beloved is sitting silently in your innerself Only you have not lifted your veil and glanced within).

Gogaram, like Kabir, draws his images and symbols from the peasant life around. He found the symbol of human life in a spinning wheel, like Kabir who saw life as a woven cotton sheet. According to him, prayers and rituals do not help. There must be a call from within.

MYSTICISM (Gujarati). In India since early times mysticism and poetry have been closely associated with one another. In the Vedas and especially the Upanishads we have a clear evidence of mystic poetry. In fact the Upanishads are replete with mystic descriptions of religious experiences. This resulted in the development of an idiom which suited to the expression of the peculiarities of an ineffable spiritual communion between the individual seeker's self and the universal self or God.

Generally mysticism means a direct relationship between the soul and god. God is actually supposed to dwell in the soul that is in a state of charity and grace. In a mystical experience, apart from theological notions, the mystic knows that God is in him and with him and his body has literally become a 'temple' of the holy spirit.

It is well known that most of the medieval saints of India who expressed their yearnings and feelings through different Indian language as such Hindi Marathi, Kannada, Gujarati etc. followed, by and large, a mystical cult called the Sahajiya cult. Coupled with the principle of the Sahajiya cult were the prominent traits of sufism. Even the devotional songs were influenced by these cross currents of a religious nature.

All in all in ancient and medieval times, a deep quest of mysticism has been made in this country, and many a beautiful composition is imbued with that concept. This tradition dates back from Kabir, Surdas, Tulsi to Rabindranath in the present century. We are fortunate that in India mystic poets have created immortal compositions in enlightened languages full of deep insight in all the regions of India. In Gujarat poet Narasinh Mehta, the saint, comes out with mystic creations in all their deep dimensions. Meera, Bhalan, Morarsaheb, 'Jeevan Sakhi', Anandghan, Dhiro, Mitho, Premanand, Brahmanand, Nishkulanand, Nirant, Padmanabh, Raje Dayaram, Manilal, Kalapi, Balashankar, Makarand Dave etc. all these poets have composed beautiful poetry couched in experiences of attaining oneness with the ultimate reality. Their poems ring with the tunes of love and unity and mysticism of knowledge and understanding. They are the fascinating documents of melodious wisdom of God and Nature. These verses sing the immortal experiences of the supreme peace of the soul, There are poems of romantic mysticism savouring of the experience of separation and a longing for a meeting. In them one sees a deep quest for attaining the entirety of world's mystery, thus making Gujarat and India rich in wisdom with their contributions.

MYSTICISM (Hindi). It is difficult to define the term 'mysticism' (rahasyavad) precisely. There is always something inexplicable about it because of its being experiential by nature. The word 'rahasya' is derived from the root 'rahas' with the suffix 'asun' added to it. 'Rah' means

'renounce', but when conjoined with the suffix, it denotes loneliness, seclusion, secret, and becomes synonymous with 'secrecy'. When the word 'vad' (ism) is added to 'rahasya' it denotes a tendency. In coining this word, the English term 'mysticism' was perhaps the determining force. In other Indian languages we have many other terms for mysticism. In Marathi, it is 'gurhgunjan' or 'gurhavad', in Bengali, it is called 'marmiyavad'. The English word, mysticism, itself is derived from the Greek word 'mustes' which means an initiated person who attains the knowledge of the secrets of life and death.

Thus the word 'rahasyavad' implies such knowledge or experience of the Supreme which cannot, normally, be expressed in words, but which has a great significance. It is an experience beyond the reaches of understanding, a communion with the Absolute Self which fills one's being with transcendental ecstasy. Kabir calls this experience pudding for the dumb, one that cannot be adequately described.

In India, the knowledge enshrined in the Upanishads, refers to mystic experiences. The very first mantra of Ishopanishad proclaims it. Mundakopanishad, Kathopanishad, Swetasvatara upanishad have many mystic observations. Tantric, Yoga and Siddha literatures too have contributed to mysticism. There is a mystic element in Bhakti also. The Gita too expounds the mystic cult by pointing out that it is through mystic love that a devotee attains proximity to the Supreme.

In Hindi, the 'Nath yogis' and the followers of other kindred sects were the first to write about their mystic experiences. Their emphasis was on 'kaya siddhi' (discipline of the body) and 'yogabhyas' (ascetic practice), and they spoke of their experience in highly esoteric terms. Later, in Kabir and other 'sant' (saint) poets of the 'Bhakti yug' we find the influence of the 'yoga' tradition. The mystic poems written by them, particularly by Kabir, are extremely personal, sometimes even paradoxical, but rich in the expression of the music of the soul. Besides these 'Nirgun' saint-poets, there were some 'Sufi' poets also who wrote mystic poetry. They sought the knowledge of heart (Ilmeseena) rather than the knowledge of the book (Ilme-safina). The best known amongst the Sufi poets of Hindi are Jayasi, Kutuban, Manjhan, Usman, Mubarak and Sheikh Nabi who wrote in allegories about their mystic experiences.

For the next great flowering of mysticism in Hindi poetry, we have to wait until we come to the close of the Dwivedi Age. This was the age of 'Chhayavad', and poets like Prasad, Pant and Mahadevi Varma wrote remarkable poetry, highly symbolic and intensely personal. When we analyse the mystic trends in their poems, we find Prasad rooted in the cultural heritage of the country, Pant expressing a certain pantheistic vision of the cosmic reality, and Mahadevi revealing the anguish of the soul, seeking relationship with the Absolute. Here is poetry rich in new metaphors or analogies of metaphysical significance. In fact, mysticism is one of the natural urges of man, seeking liberation from the mundane and aspiring for an ecstatic vision of the Supreme.

MYSTICISM (Kannada). Traditionally, literature is broadly divided in India into secular and religious, the latter accommodating the various forms of the devotional strain also. By the beginning of the twelfth century, Karnataka saw the rise of new movements representing the masses, and protesting against the outworn and encrusted dogmas of orthodoxy which had kept them out of the spiritual values for centuries. The movement in its inception was mainly of individual mystics like Devara (or Jedara) Dasimayya who devised a new literary form of poetic prose known as vachana to share their treasured experience of God-realisation in a commonly understandable language, without the technical jargon of the Sanskrit darshanas or philosophical schools. Their inspiration was drawn from Tamil Shaiva saints. We might note here a single specimen of Dasimayya's vachanas which embody a mystic vision in figurative imagery, without losing the fresh breath of rhythm and melody, inherent in the spoken idiom of Kannada:-

This earth is thy gift, its harvest too,
The wind that blows around is thy gift;
What is one to say of curse which praise thee not,
O Ramanatha!

(The last is a pseudonym embedded like a seal into the composition, which is a characteristic of literary forms like vachana and pada in Kannada).

Soon this movement assumed wide dimensions and swept over the country under the guidance of saints like Allama Prabhu and Sri Basavesvara at kalyan. Innumerable were the sharanas who heralded the new socio-economic as well as religio-cultural protest movement of Virashaivism. But the stalwarts at the centre of it all were the great mystic saints like Allama Prabhudeva whose perfection was admitted by one and all, and Basavesvara, who combined profound faith with executive ability and selfless service devoted to the new cause. Their epigrammatic sayings or musings were preserved with profound reverence by posterity and collected into anthologies compiled by scholars in the reign of the Vijayanagar emperor, Praudhadevaraya (1419-1446).

In the present century, several translations and studies of the major mystic vachanakaras have appeared in English also. Hence we might content ourselves here with specimens taken at random. It should be noted, however that this vast galaxy includes not only godmen, but also women like Akka Mahadevi dedicated to God-realization. But the father figure remains Allama Prabhu, whose words are as universal and esoteric as his intuition is original and far-reaching. Often his sayings appear like riddles which require the aid of an extensive commentary by the adept. These 15th century compilations of text and commentary are known as Shunyasampadane. This is a dimension of mystic composition which is unique to Kannada literature. Here is a specimen vachana of the great mystic saint, Allama:-

My body I have made a garden, My mind a spade.....

I have dug up illusion's weeds,
Broken up the clods of worldliness,
Harrowed the earth, and sown the spirit's seed.
The thousand-fold lotus is my well,
My water-wheel, my breath;
From my subtle never I have channelled the water.
And to keep out the bulls of sense
That might trample my crops,
I have set up all round
Patience and poise as fence.
Behold, O Gohesvera!
Night and day I have lain awake
To protect my tender plants.

Basaveshvara's musings abound in poetry and similes solidified as in:-

The 'Chakora' waits, intent
The moonlight's silver dawn;
The lotus' heart is bent
Upon the splendid morn;
The bee's on the flower's scent
Even thus, for Thee, even thus,
My heart is tremulous,
O, Kudala Sangama Lord!

Akka Mahadevi, who renounced her queenly comforts and went in a quest for Lord Mallikarjuna, her self-chosen husband, addressed every tree, bird and beast in the forest telling them about her spouse; when she got the realization at last, she sang fervently:

Thou art the wood,
Thou the trees in the wood,
And the birds and beasts
Playing in the wood.
O Chennamallikarjuna!

Reveal thyself to me
In Thy myriad form!?

Her mystic vision rings true in her passionate words pulsating with feeling.

The sixteenth century saw the rise of two other mystic Vaishnava saints in the Vijayanagar empire. Both were influenced by the great Vaishnava teacher Vyasaraya. The first was Purandaradasa (1484-1564) and the second Kanakadasa (1509-1607). Both were musicians of a high order, and they evolved to perfection the literary form of pada to be sung to the accompaniment of the lute and the cymbal in classical ragas or melodies. This form, which might have arisen earlier, undoubtedly reached perfection in their hands; and all the simple musical compositions capture the glory of Lord Vishnu with anecdotes of his human incarnations found in the puranas and delineate all the nine types of Bhakti recognised by the Bhagavata.

R.D. Ranade observes that Purandaradasa must have passed through what the European mystics call 'the dark night of the soul' in 'padas' like:

"I am an absolute stranger to this place. There is no friend, no relative, no king will show me any consideration. There is no vigour left in my body. The strength of my limbs has passed away. Whatever I desire never comes to fruition.

When I look ahead of me, there is a big boar to swallow me. When I see behind me, there is a big tiger to pursue me. I stand between the two. How shall I be saved, O God!"

I have been trying to cross the over-flooded river of existence by means of a small leather basket. How is it possible for me to cross this ocean? Where shall I go? I shall go into a deep whirlpool where the poisonous cobra resides. He will surely make a mouthful of me. Oh, save me, my Lord!

And here is a sample of his capturing the supernal experience in radiant words:-

"When the devotee sings the praises of God in a sleeping posture, God sits up to listen to them; if he praises God in a sitting posture, God stands up to listen to it; and if the devotee prays in a standing posture, God listens to him in a pleased and nodding pose; and if the devotee praises God while nodding himself, he throws open the doors of heaven, makes him the master of heavens, and allows him to plunder its treasures".

If Purandaradasa is a greater musicologist, Kanakadasa is a more accomplished poet, besides being a great mystic. Here is what he sings about his God-realization:-

"For all these days, I was thinking that Vaikuntha, the city of God was far far away. But when I saw it with insight given by my master, I found it here, in my heart, in the form of God Rangashayi, the Lord of creation. Vaikuntha was wonderfully beautiful on account of the dense forests, beautiful gardens, and great overflowing lakes, and on account of majestic places with golden turrets.

I came out triumphant like a hero after having crushed eight 'madas', and defeated the six enemies; after having trodden under feet the five mischievous vices, and having murdered the powerful and troublesome opponent, viz., 'egoism'.

I saw the refulgent main door of the palace, and inside it the beams of diamond set in jewels of different kinds, and the houses of the best gods, and last of all, God Rangashayi, who is the destroyer of the wicked. I saw a number of sages, who had conquered old age. I saw in this palace of God, the nymphs, Ramba and Urvashi, Tumburu and Narada and the main gods, including Brahma, Vishnu and Rudra.

Nijaguna Shivayogi (17th century) is the last of the great mystics in Karnataka who have also given expression to their ineffable experience. R.D. Ranade is all praise for what he calls the 'super-advaitic' or the absolutistic position in contemporary philosophy. The highest aim of meditation, according to him, is an absolute tranquillity which even transcends and supervenes upon an already achieved state of the highest spiritual realization. His Vivekachintamani, a philosophical work in Kannada, was translated into Sanskrit by King Lingaraja of Coorg in 1775. How high he held this work is indicated in the eulogy he offers at the beginning of his work. It seems Brahmadeva weighed in the scales the weight of this Chintamani against the weight of Devendra's heavenly Chintamani, and found that Nijaguna-Shivayogi's was greater! His other works are: Kaivalya paddhati, Anubhava-sara, Paramarthaprakashike and a number of padas meant to be sung musically.

Indeed, the number of sharanas and mystics who have followed in the footsteps of these masters and contributed to mystical literature in Kannada is almost countless; and their representatives are to be found even today. But the most outstanding and leading lights only we have noticed as representative of all these.

In modern times, the two stalwarts in the realm of Kannada letters, viz., 'Ambikatanayadatta' (D.R. Bendre) and 'Kuvempu' (K.V. Puttappa) have imbibed in their vision the western strain of mysticism also besides the Indian. In the former, we find the subtle influence of W.B. Yeats, while in the latter, the nature mysticism of Wordsworth and Vedantic visions of Shelley are subtly present, though they have suffered a seachange by their influence of the mystic visions of Tagore and Aurobindo in the former and Ramakrishna Paramahansa and Vivekananda in the latter.

MYSTICISM (Kashmiri). Poetry is the only guide to explore, understand and unveil the various phases of mysticism in Kashmiri literature. So far as the different schools of mystic thought are concerned, nothing original or outstanding has attracted our attention in prose. Everything written in prose on mystic trends in Kashmiri is based on second hand sources and has not the virtue of perception and experience.

Madhyamika philosophy of Nagarjuna (150-200 A.D.) is the earliest school of mysticism which has a direct and dominant impact on Kashmiri poetry from the very beginning. It is strange that this phase of our poetry has not received any attention from the scholars so far. The reason of the impact of Madhyamika on Kashmiri poetry is not very difficult to discover. Kashmiri remained the centre of 'Mahayana' for a long period. Kashmiri monks and pandits preached the doctrine of Mahayana in Central Asia, Tibet, Mongolia and China. Nagarjuna, the great Buddhist philosopher and Bodhisattva, lived in Kashmir during the rule of Imperial Kushans. In the 7th century, the great Chinese traveller and savant Huen Tsiang had his education in Madhyamika Shastras from a Kashmiri scholar during his stay in 'Jayendra Gihara' at Srinagar. Although Buddhism, as a living religion of Kashmir, disappeared from the scene in the late Sultanate period, yet its philosophy of 'Shunyavada', which befitted the speculative mind of mystics, is still a living reality. Shunyavada has been given the name of 'Kaihna' or 'Kaina' in Kashmiri. It appears for the first time in the vakhas of Lal Ded. We could interpret this kaihna as the 'Neti-Neti' of Vadanta, but Lal Ded is by faith a 'Shiva-Yogini' and is opposed to the 'Mayavada'. She interprets her conception of 'Shunya' in a way which has nothing to do with Vedanta, but is very close to Madhyamika:-

I questioned my perceptor ten hundred times.
Tell me what is that which is beyond the name and form.
Asking him again and again I am broken now.
I perceive it is void that is the reality above all.
It is this void which is the source of something that exists.

It is not at one place only that Lal Ded explains void with poetic glamour. This word occurs at several places in her vakhs with the same shade. The philosophy of Shunyavada discussed by other Shaiva and sufi poets include, besides Lal Ded and Nund Rishi, Rahman Dar, Asad Parrey, Quadir Sabkaihna, Shams Faqir, Samad Mir and Ahad Zargar. To illustrate the influence of Shunyavada in Kashmiri, I would like to quote a few examples from some later and modern sufi poets:

What is heard and experienced is a void beyond expression
I delved deep in self
There is nothing other than the void

The seers have come to understand that the eternal truth is nothing other than the void and Ahad Zargar has to say in this connection:

The void is the sum total of all the spiritual quest
The void is the source of our very breath
It is this void which is the confluence of celestial beauty
I have experienced nothing other than void with my eyes.

MYSTICISM-MAITHILI

Another important mystic trend in Kashmiri is the 'Monistic Shaivism'. There is a lot common between Madhyamika and 'Kashmiri Shaivism'. It is very difficult to draw a line of demarcation between the two schools. Lal Ded is the first great genius poetess who made the philosophy of Shaiva School public for the first time through her vakhs. After Lal Ded this school of thought has greatly influenced the 'Nirgunavada Shiva bhakti' school of poets. Some sufi poets too have derived inspiration from this source. The Shaiva school has some influence of 'Vaishnava' and 'Nathpanthi' philosophy also. In addition to Lal Ded, other poets of the school include Lacha Kak, Bona Kak and others. That portion of Kashmiri poetry which has been placed under the head of vakh is in letter and spirit the expression of the experiences of Shivayoga.

The poets of Kashmiri 'Rishi' order form a separate school. Rishis were by faith Muslims, but in practice they seem to be more Buddhist monks than Muslims. These Rishis were more near to Hinyana and had a little common with Mahayana. Nund Rishi, the symbol of our cultural fraternity, was the founder and the remarkable poet of this order. Practically this school has come to an end, but its impact on Kashmiri literature is still a living force. The echo of Rishi thought can be heard in the poetry of some of the later sufi poets. The main features of Rishi school of mysticism are vegetarianism, celibacy, asceticism, public welfare and universal brotherhood. Like Shaivism, Rishi order also preaches that for understanding the eternal, one should understand and know his self.

One can infer the influence of Vedanta in the compositions of later bhakti poets of Rama and Krishna schools, particularly in the poetry of those poets who flourished in later 19th and early 20th century.

The last but not the least the school of mysticism is sufism that made its way in Kashmir from the 5th decade of the 14th century through Central Asian Islamic missionaries. After the advent of Islam in Kashmir, four prominent orders of Islamic mysticism have flourished here. The orders are 'Suhrawardi', 'Kubravi', 'Naqshbandi' and 'Qadari'. All the sufi poets have been attached to one or the other order.

But they have at the same time benefited from the other local as well as foreign schools of mysticism. It is because of the multifarious influences that the sufi poetry of Kashmiri cannot be classed as purely Islamic in nature. The philosophy of unity of being is common between the Shaivite and sufi schools. Although this conception is un-Islamic in nature, it was absorbed by the Islamic mystics in the early centuries of Hijra under the influence of Indian and Greek philosophies.

At present the mystic tradition of Kashmir may be seen as a colourful rainbow containing the best of the important mystic schools, but having an individuality of its own.

MYSTICISM (Maithili). Maithili literature starts off on the track of mysticism, though it leaves the track abruptly. A host of Buddhist monks, called 'Siddhas', mostly drawn from Mithila, propounded a new cult of erotic mysticism at the universities of Vikramashila and Nalanda during the 9th, 10th and 11th centuries. They composed in old Maithili couplets and songs for popularising their theory and practices. These verses are known as Doha and Charyapada. The subject-matter of these verses is highly mystical, centring round esoteric doctrines and erotic and yogic theories and practices of Buddhism. Bauddha gana mein tantrik siddhanta by Jayadhari Singh is the best authentic treatise on the subject. Varnaratnakara of Jyotirishvara (b. 1250) enumerates the names of 88 Siddhas of this mystic cult. Vidyapati (1340-1420) has written a drama on the life of Gorakhnath, a great saint belonging to the said mystic cult, but there is no trace of mysticism as such in it. The lyrical poems of Vidyapati depicting the love episodes of Radha and Krishna have been regarded by a section of scholars as mystic ones. According to them, Radha and Krishna symbolise Prakriti (Nature) and Purusha (Supreme Soul) respectively. George Abraham Greirson was the pioneer of this theory and the neo-Vaishnavites of Bengal have been nourishing this notion traditionally, but the critics of Maithili tradition find no indication of mysticism or spiritualism in the songs of Vidyapati; rather, they see in them the fine expression of love of worldly man and woman in disguise of divine beings. Their tendency, therefore, is to interpret the songs of Vidyapati only in terms of social, cultural and historical background. Likewise the devotional erotic songs of Govindadas have nothing to do with mysticism.

During the 18th and 19th centuries Vaishnavite saints like Saheb Ramdas and Lakshminath Gosain composed a large number of devotional songs. Some of these have a clear tint of mysticism, influenced by the sufi and Kabirite saints. We find in Gitiratnavali, an anthology of the medieval Maithili songs compiled by Kavishekhar Badar-nath Jha, a few songs on the theme of mysticism or spiritualism expressed allegorically in folk-style. In the Modern period Jayanarayan Mallik, Buddhidhari Singh 'Ramakar' and others, in their lyrical poems, have occasionally dealt with the mystery of nature, but none of them deserves to be called a mystic poet. Manipadma in some of his novels refers to occult practices and philosophy which is in fact far away from the accepted meanings of the term mysticism.

MYSTICISM (Malayalam). The essence of mysticism is in the human heart opening up to a larger reality. In the process of communion with this power, the mind is amazed, overawed, sad or ecstatic. The littleness of man and the vastness of Reality is sometimes a cause of despair and agony.

In Malayalam the foremost mystic poet was also the most eminent poet of the language. The poet was Ezhuttacchan, the Vaishnavite devotional poet of the 16th century. In his transcriptions of Adhyatma Ramayana and Valmiki Ramayana, Mahabharata and Bhagavata as well as in his independent works like Harinama kirtana, Ezhuttacchan sings of the glory of the union with Vishnu in a lyrical manner. Vishnu is immanent in the human heart and is also the Oversoul with whom the cosmos is identified. In his Harinama kirtana he sings:

Whatever I see is Narayana's form
Whatever I hear is His name
Whatever I do is His worship
Whatever exists is all Him
Let me bow to Narayana.

I cannot describe the anguish I feel
When you who are One
Is seen as Two by me.
Have mercy on me Lord
So that I see you as One as before

Ezhuttacchan's poetry is suffused with this religious mysticism and has the dynamism characteristic of all mystic poetry.

In the 20th century mystic poetry in Malayalam was chiefly associated with the poet G. Sankara Kurup, recipient of the first Jnanpith Award in 1966. In the beginning Kurup's was a kind of nature mysticism. He stood with folded palms before the glory and mystery of nature. In his early poems he looks through the chink of a momentary phenomenon as lighting in a vanishing rain-cloud to see a permanent world of exquisite beauty as, for instance, when he writes:

I clasp my palm before Nature
That paints a beautiful rainbow
On the blue slate of a rain-cloud
And flashes the arcs of lighting
With her glorious bangles

One could see in these lines the essence of a mystic experience in that a momentary beauty reveals an everlasting glory.

In the later phases of this poet's development, the mystic experience of love is conveyed through symbols like the sun-flower and the sun in the vast sky. The humble love of the human heart for Godhead is symbolised in the poem 'Suryakantri' (1933). In the tender love of the sun-flower for the sun, her lover. The destiny of the flower to fade and drop on the earth and the majestic heavenliness of the sun are a point of contrast that breeds fear and nervousness in the flower. And yet she lifts her eyes up to him when he fondles her while on his way across the sky. Kurup has used such eloquent symbols as the flute and the cuckoo to mean the heart of man in search of God as in Odakkuzhal (The flute, 1931); the flower, the cloud, the morning lamp are some of the other symbols he uses for the human heart. And there is 'Savita' to mean the Sun, the Cosmic Being. In a poem entitled Anveshanam (Quest, 1931), the quest of the human heart for God is the subject matter. The influence of Rabindranath Tagore was a powerful formative factor in Kurup's mysticism. In 1931 this poet translated the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam, the Persian mystic poet. The Malayalam work has the title Vilasa jahari (The intoxication of mirth). Kurup's theistic mysticism is evident in such later works like Vishvadarshanam (A universal view, 1960), Jivanasangitam (The song of life, 1964).

Another poet who came under the influence of Tagore was Tevati Narayana Kurup (1913-1963). He published a magazine by name Tagore for some time and wrote a number of poems. Some of them were collected together in a volume entitled Atmagitam (Songs of the self, 1935).

MYSTICISM (Marathi) A mystical vein of thought has been present throughout the development of Indian philosophy from the Upanishadic age downwards, but it assumes extraordinary importance when we come to the second millennium of the Christian era which sees the birth of the 'practical spiritual philosophy' taught by the saint poets of various Indian Languages. This can be called mysticism which implies "a direct, immediate, first-hand, intuitive apprehension of God". It was the natural outcome of a heart full of piety and devotion, a consciousness of sin and misery, and finally a desire to merge oneself practically into the Divine. It was a kind of devotional mysticism not only for men who lived in cloisters, but "Come one, come all" was the call given by the medieval Indian mystics like Tukaram and Kabir. As Ranade says, "As we pass from the Upanishadic mysticism to the mysticism of the Middle Ages, we see the spiritual life brought from the hidden cloister to the market-place".

In the field of Marathi literature it needs to be from the age of Jnanadeva downwards to the age of Ramdas, i.e., from the 13th century to the 17th. The beginning of the mystical line was effectively made by Jnanadeva who came from the spiritual line of the great Gahininath. The tradition was: Adinath—Matsyendranath, Gorakhanath—Gahininath—Nivrittinath—Jnanadeva. It was the Natha sect all right but as Ranade says, "Behind Matsyendranath, we have mythology, but after Matsyendra, we have history". The foundation of the mystical edifice was laid by Jnanadeva, on which Namdev and other saints later erected the divine sanctuary of which Tukaram became the pinnacle. Of the three works of Jnanadeva, the Jnaneshvari, the Amritnaubhava and the Abhanga, the Amritan bhava is a philosophical work, the Abhanga's or devotional lyrics, are mystical, while the Jnaneshvari contains both philosophy and mysticism. Ranade aptly characterises Jnanadeva's mysticism as intellectual mysticism because it is rooted in the firm philosophical groundings of the Bhagavadgita. Jnanadeva's most original contribution to the philosophy of mysticism is his theory of Asymptotic Realisation, or the Doctrine of Approximation, which he puts forth in the 18th chapter of his Jnaneshvari. The aspiring mystic according to him, goes on asymptotically approaching God. Instead of there being a final and perfect identity between the mystic and God, the mystic moves towards God and meets Him at infinity. This is what Jnanadeva calls 'Karma-mukti'.

Based on the intellectual foundation laid by Jnanadeva whom Farquhar rightly calls 'the Coryphaeus of the whole Bhakti movement of Maharashtra', was erected the structure of the 'Bhagavata Dharma' by the contemporary saints led by Namdev. They came from different strata of the society and a kind of spiritual democracy was built up all round. The group included a simple maid-servant like Jani and a mahar, or an untouchable, like Chokha Mela, and all together sang to the glory of God. In the second place, all these saints are characterised by a contrition of the heart, the helplessness of human endeavour to reach unaided the majesty of God, by a sense of sinfulness inherent in human nature, by the necessity of finding out a Guru who may release them from the sufferings of the world, and finally, by the phenomenon of conversion almost in every individual case. Thirdly, they show an all-absorbing love for God which would not allow a rightful performance of one's duties before devotion. In fact, they gave themselves up to God-love, and forgot everything else before it. This intuitive and all-absorbing faculty of God-realisation is well brought out in an abhanga of Namdeva.

Who sends the calf to the udders of the cow?
Who makes the mogara flower give out fragrance?
So also, says Nama, the art of realising God is inborn.

All of these saints including the great Jnanadeva and Namdeva, were devotees of god Vitthala of Pandharpur and the conflict between the Saguna and the Nirguna, or between the Personal and the Impersonal aspects of God, no more existed for them. As their leader Jnanadeva said, How should I call you, oh God? Saguna or Nirguna?

But it's no problem;
For the Saguna and the Nirguna are really one.

Jnanadeva thus solved once for all this philosophical problem in the typical mystic way and paved the path of God-realisation for the saints to come. He stands supreme as the pioneer of the Bhakti cult which flourished in Maharashtra for centuries.

There was another mystic trend born with Chakradhara, or rather reborn with him. He was a contemporary of Jnanadeva. His memoirs are collected in the Lilacharitra, his biography in prose, and they speak about his life as a mystic. His way was the way of contemplation of the Divine Name and as such it was not very different from the practice of 'Namasmarana' as taught by the Bhagavata saints like Jnanadeva and Namdev.

Coming back to the main mystical current originating with Jnanadeva, we find it rather dried up during the 'Dark Age' that followed him. For about two hundred years after Jnanadeva, Maharashtra was under Muslim domination and the influence of Sufism.

This blend of Indian Bhakti and the Sufi mysticism is seen in the life and writing of saint Ekanath (1533-1599) of Paithan. His age begins with Narasimha Sarasvati (1378-1458), the founder of the cult of god Dattatreya which arose probably as a reaction against the activities of the Sufis who were systematically encroaching upon the traditional religion of Maharashtra. This cult ostensibly initiated by god Dattatreya himself, shows a peculiar blend of Hinduism and Islam in its presentation of the life of Sripada Srivallabha (1323-1353) who is at once its first historical figure and the first 'avatara' of Dattatreya. His life-story is narrated in the Gurucharitra (Ch. V, IX). Narasimha Sarasvati is the central figure in the cult of god Dattatreya who was in a way the forerunner of Ekanath and Ramdas who synthesised mysticism with humanism. His life-account is narrated in the Guru-charitra, the basic religious book of his cult, and forms a kind of sacred 'mantra' with a piety all its own. This work occupies an important place in the religious life of Maharashtra even today, and is almost held in awe and read devoutly by the common man in the faith that it is a great healer of ailments, both physical and spiritual.

The blend of Hinduism and Islam inherent in the cult of god Dattatreya is reflected by Janardana, the guru of Ekanath, who, according to recent researches, belonged to the Sufi tradition. The story of god Dattatreya appearing before Ekanath in the form of a Muslim mendicant (malanga) is a clear twist of the historical truth about the guru of Ekanath being a disciple of a Sufi in the line of Sijra-i-Kadri. Ekanath himself was a very powerful writer carrying on the tradition of Jnanadeva and adding a social bias to it. His insistence on the singing of the Divine Name, or Kirtana-bhakti, had a popular basis and his mysticism is rightly called Democratic mysticism by Ranade. There is a unique reconciliation of worldly and spiritual life in him unattained either before or afterwards. With Jnanadeva, mysticism had reigned the clouds; with Ekanath, it came down on the earth and dwelt with humans. His teachings, whether in his work on the Bhagavata or in his heart-felt abhangas, are such as could be appreciated by the populace. It is principally Ekanath who made the ideas of mysticism and devotion familiar to the man in the street.

If the mysticism of Ekanath was democratic, that of Tukaram was personal. He exhibits all the doubts and the disbeliefs, the weaknesses and the sufferings, the anxieties and the uncertainties, through which every aspiring soul must pass before he can come into the life of light, spirit and harmony. Tukaram will be known for the human element predominant in his abhangas which are the outpourings of his heart full of devotion.

Ramdas, who was a contemporary of Tukaram, follows the same path and experiences the same vicissitudes of spiritual life; but he was an activist by nature and naturally his teachings are slightly different from those of the other saints. Ramdas, more than any other saint of the 'Maratha' school, called people's minds to the performance of duty, while the heart was to be always set on God. He tells us repeatedly that the first thing that a man should do is to believe in God, and the next thing is to do his duty to himself and to the nation. For it is only when our efforts are backed by devotion that they are likely to succeed. It is of course true that while the other saints like Jnanadeva and Tukaram went one way, Ramdas went the other. But their ultimate goal was the same and that was God-realisation. The means were also the same, namely devotion to God, and it is from this point of view that the mystical teachings of all these saints are identical. Mysticism in Maharastra never degenerated into eroticism as it did in the North. It was for the Maratha saints always a rational and sober way, unpolluted by either blind faith or magical charms or the Madhura bhakti. Here we have literature that takes us from the bewildering diversity of the phenomenal world to the soul-consoling kinship of the Ultimate Reality.

MYSTICISM (Punjabi). In Punjabi literature, the middle age is found to be the most fertile ground for the manifestation of the mystic tendency. The earliest poets (Natha Yogis—Gorakh, Charpat, Chourangi, Ratan, etc.) were the exponents of a truly mystic way of life. They aimed at controlling the chittavritis or tendencies of mind with the help of an integrated spiritual practice (Sharir-Man-Prana-Sadhana). The poetic compositions of these Natha Yogis present various thematic patterns woven with the mystic outlook which looks upon the world as a mystery to be understood through intuition of spiritual knowledge rather than reason.

The poetry of the Adi granth also contains a very powerful element of mysticism. But mysticism is only a part of its total world outlook. Its other major concern is ethics. As a consequence, the world-view presented by these saint-poets becomes mystico-ethical in nature. Whereas the mystic element of Gurubani projects the ideal of the ultimate union of man with the Divine, its ethical content aims at harmonious social relationships. This variety of mysticism advocates a way of self-transcendence where the narrow boundaries of the 'self' and the 'other' are dissolved, and the good of all (sarbat da bhala) becomes the summum bonum of human existence.

In order to analyse and elaborate the theme of mysticism as reflected in the poetic universe of Gurubani, the exposition of its metaphysical speculation is imperative. This speculation is based on the three fundamental categories, namely 'Brahm' (The Absolute), 'Jagat' (The cosmos) and 'Jiva' (man). The Brahm is the ultimate Reality as well as the ground and source of all being. He is also the creator, sustainer and destroyer of the whole cosmos. The cosmos is nothing but the material manifestation of the Brahm Himself. The Jiva has his being as a result of His will and is bound eternally by His order. The spatio-temporal existence of Jiva or man is the primary cause of his bondage which is metaphorically expressed as a state of separation or alienation from the Divine. The other major poetic tradition of medieval Punjabi literature where the tendency of mysticism manifests itself is the Sufi poetry. Baba Farid is the first Sufi mystic who created the Punjabi Sufi poetic tradition with his 'shabada' and 'shlokas'. Other Sufi saints like Shah Hussain and Bulhe Shah enriched this poetic tradition which was followed by succeeding generations of Sufi poets well into the modern period. The mystic experience of these Sufis finds expression in the imagery of love. This imagery introduced into Punjabi 'kissa'-writing provides another form in which mysticism has entered Punjabi literature and consciousness. Muqbal and Waris Shah of the eighteenth, Hashim of Ghulam Rasul and Kishan Lal of the nineteenth centuries can be cited as the writers of such 'kissas'.

In the poetic works of modern Punjabi literature, the mystic tendency is often dissociated from the sacred realm and the expression takes the shape of nature-mysticism. The poetry of Puran Singh provides ample evidence of this mystic tendency.

MYSTICISM-PUNJABI

MYSTICISM (Rajasthani). Numerous definitions of mysticism have been attempted and, on that very basis, instances of mysticism have been found in the preachings of various ascetic saints. The encounter between 'Atma and Parmatma', or the Soul and the supreme Soul, and the pursuit related to the encounter constitute the essence of mysticism which is essentially religious in this country. Realization of Parmatma (the Highest Truth) is the ultimate goal of mysticism. The pursuit of mysticism is a spontaneous and natural activity of mankind which transcends barriers of country, age, gender and creed. This pursuit is inspired by intuitive knowledge and sometimes direct experience. The attraction towards the Supreme element, inquisitive urge, astonishment, curiosity, desire, eagerness for a union, and the joy of the state of union that can be known only by experience, all these constitute the experience of mysticism. In this experience the 'knower' and the 'known' are united. Mysticism which begins with the attraction towards the Supreme element is not a subject of knowledge, but rather a matter of experience. For them experience is truth and not the sayings of the learned. Mysticism is a matter of the heart and not a subject for learned speculation

Basically, there is no difference between the Soul and the Supreme Soul. The utterances such as 'Tattvam Asi' (you are That), 'So Aham' (I am He), and 'Aham Brahmasmi' (I am Brahman) articulate this eternal truth. Similarly, the soul of man is also beyond description and beyond the senses. By a proper spiritual pursuit one can attain the knowledge of God. The exponent of mysticism takes for granted 'mayavad', or the unity of man, God and the universe. Accepting both the doctrines, he believes in the similitude of the 'Atma' and 'Parmatma'. First comes belief and thereafter one acquires knowledge and experience.

It is worth noting that in the preachings of the Nath sect that are available, the influence of Rajasthani mysticism is highly predominant. In the preachings of Gorakhnath and other Naths one finds several references or allusions to the nature of the Supreme element residing in the inner soul and the mode of realising it.

The saint-literature (sant sahitya) of Rajasthan is enormous in volume. In the preachings of nearly every saint and spiritual seeker in Rajasthani and Pingal languages, there are striking suggestions and descriptions of mystical experience, but a mention is made here of only a few major saint-preachers. In the Padas by Pipaji (1383-1453), we find an expression of his faith in the indissoluble nature of the relations between him and God, and of his feelings experienced through submission of his self at the feet of Lord Rama. There is a joyous description of his vision of God, the drinking of the nectar of Ramanama, and the manifestation of the Lord in the organic and the inorganic world. Qazi Mahmud (14th. century) and Mirabai (1498-1547) are exquisite mystic saints. Their pursuit of spiritual love and articulation of the experiences related to it are expressions of mysticism of the highest order. One finds in his compositions the deep absorption in love depicted with pristine innocence and allusions to union with the Beloved. His padas are impregnated with depiction of mystical experiences. Mira's poetry is in fact a description of her total self-dedication to her Beloved. Such experience and expression of self-dedication is rarely found elsewhere. In the various worldly manifestations, she saw only the supremacy of Krishna. It is only through the Padas of Mira that one can get the right idea of the various ordeals that the soul has to undergo before it can attain Brahman. There are numerous emotionally rich Padas depicting her experience of separation and her passionate and irrepresible eagerness to be united with her Beloved. He, too, appears before her but she unfortunately remains asleep. Such mystical experience is rare elsewhere. In the poetry of Udoji Nain (1448-1536), we come across striking utterances of experience of God and separation from Him. There are to be found several descriptions of the desire for union with the beloved, the joy of union and the emotional states following union all treated from the feminine point of view. At the same time the gradual evolution of spiritual pursuit connected with these processes also manifests itself.

In the preachings of Jambhoji (1451-1536), there is a very powerful description of the utterances 'Main Brahman hun' (I am Brahman), and 'Main vahi hoon' (I am That) based on an experience of one's own self. In no other saints' work does one ever come across such an expression. He provides a striking description of the Supreme element based on experience. In the preachings of Jasnathji (1482-1506) also, one finds a description of the identity between the soul ('Atma'), and the Supreme Soul (Parmatma), as well as the form of the Supreme element. In the preachings of Haridasji Niranjani (1445-1453), there is mainly an exposition of philosophical subjects and abundant suggestions towards the experience of attaining the Supreme element. Devotion to the 'Formless' aspect of the Godhead, and Yoga are the techniques to be adopted.

In the poetry of Dadu (1543-1603), there is a blend of humility, love and sweetness. He portrays the 'Formless' in the form of a personal god through his preachings. While doing so, he has presented unique pictures of love. In the padas of Dadu, which deal with the theme of separation, there is an extremely heart-rending depiction of the craving of the finite for the Infinite. Acharya Parashuramdevji (1520-1600) has dealt with the existence of the all-knowing Brahman that pervades every particle of the universe like a seed. There is an undertone in his preachings that he had come face to face with the omnipresent Brahman.

Laldasji (1540-1648), laid emphasis on remembering the name of one's deity. His devotion is the one based on love. He regards Brahman who resides within his heart as the greatest of all and he bids him to manifest himself to him. It appears from his preachings that he himself achieved such an experience.

Barhat Isardas (1538-1618) has laid stress on God as a lover of his devotees. For him, Rama alone is everything; he is the sole support. From his work, Hari rasa, one comes to know of his spontaneous mystical experience. While singing of the greatness of Ramnath, Santdasji (1642-1749) makes a mention of the possibility of an encounter with Brahman through 'Nijatma Bodh' and its reactions. Dariyavji (1676-1758), while pointing out that the 'formless' and the 'concrete' are not different, has presented a unique depiction of love towards the Supreme element. From his padas one gets a hint of his having had a vision of that element in the firmament. Charandasji (1703-1782) presents a description based on actual experience of the name, form and location of the Supreme element and its attainment. Ramcharanji (1719-1798) has given an unequalled description of love towards Rama and of the form of Rama. He regards the path of love as of prime importance. He furnishes hints of his acquisition of knowledge of the self and enlightenment by the Supreme Light. According to Hariram Dasji (d. 1778), love of Rama is the very essence of life. He describes the attainment of the Supreme element and also depicts its form. His work, Ghaohar nisani, is a composition on yoga in which he discusses the worship of Rama on the pattern of yoga. The recitation of Rama's name in an incessant manner is the very basis of the spiritual pursuit of Ramdasji (1726-1798). The flame kindled by 'Ramanama' (reciting His name) burns out the craving for pleasures of the senses, and a vision of Rama becomes manifest in the soul. His works give a hint of such a vision.

While dwelling upon the greatness of God, Opo Adho (1752-1843, approx) lays emphasis on the worship of God because He never disappoints. He has attempted a very fluid and influential depiction of a steadfast faith in God, and an indissoluble association with Him.

According to Lalgiri (19th century), the Lord resides in nothingness. A good teacher imparts us knowledge of the word, Brahman. While expounding the identity between 'I' and 'You', he expressed its actual experience. To his technique of composition the vocabulary and methodology of yoga are acceptable. It may therefore appear that the experience and the vision that three saints talk of are mytic in that. They can be attained only through an intuitive understanding of life and reality which reason cannot fathom.

Hi.M.

MYSTICISM (Sindhi). Mysticism in Sindhi literature is associated with sufism and manifests itself through the influences of vedantic thought, neo-Platonism and Judaic, Christian and Islamic teachings. Plotinus (205-270), the founder of neo-Platonic school, held the same belief about the existence of God as the Upanishads had held long before him. The same old doctrine holds it possible for the human soul to find the Super Soul, to see God and to be one with Him. The Semitic thought as contained in the Judaic, Christian and Islamic teachings shows that the prophets of these traditions were different person in the state of 'uruj', or exaltation. They were at that time the Person Himself. The other state of 'nuzul', or downed spirits, brought them a sense of separation from God and was responsible for their teachings in general as enshrined in their holy books.

Qazi Qadan (1463-1551) was the first major Sindhi mystic poet who provided a great link in the history of Indian sub-continental mysticism, which is essentially monistic. Indian mysticism has been through the centuries describing the relationship between God and humans as between the familial husband and wife. This conjugal relationship is the basic metaphor for the fuller understanding of our material and spiritual life. No type of mysticism outside India has in it the sweet and sublime resolution of the antithetical forms of subject and object of love. For instance, Kabir (1398-1518) says, "Rama is my Husband and I am His little bride." And Qazi Qadan extends this metaphorical relationship to include the in-laws, the relatives on the Husband's side, also. He says:

True are my relatives on the Husband's side,
They dwell in the city of Truth;
Whatever they speak comes out from truth,
They say the truthful words

Historically from the days of Abu Ali Sindhi Sufi, the instructor of Bayzid Bistami (d. 874) to this day, the Sindhi sufi poetry has deeply influenced the Indian subcontinental sufi poetry and made it distinct from the purely Islamic sufi poetry, if any, produced elsewhere. In fact, sufism as Islamic mysticism is a contradiction in terms, for mysticism as an idealistic philosophy does not lend itself to a label of any organised religion. Moreover, sufis have had no comfortable place in Islam.

Though far beyond the labels of religions, mystics, particularly sufis among them, came to belong to some orthodox orders. But the Sindhi sufis do not seem to have belonged to any of these orders, for these orders observed the routine of prayers and fasts and did not bypass 'zuhd', 'ibadat', 'taqwa' and 'riyazat', the limits set by their founders. Shah Abdul Karim (1536-1623) says, "Some people engaged themselves in reading holy books and some in other occupations, but I learnt the 'sama' the mystical dance, and did not care for any other occupation". He says:

MYSTICISM-TAMIL

First lose yourself,
Then only you find Him;
The Beloved is not separate from you, just turn your face within.

The mystics hold that the world contains no other reality except the Absolute Spirit. Everything except the Absolute is an illusion; the so-called individual soul is the Absolute itself, and no other. Consciousness or soul admits of no limitation and denomination; it admits of limitation only with reference to something which is not consciousness. When related to a body and mind, it is called an individual. The unrelated and unalloyed Consciousness is the one, of which individuals are only appearances. Every individual is this One Consciousness, basically. There is no duality. Duality is fiction; non-duality, or not-two-ness, is reality. Shah Abdul Latif (1689-1752), the premier Sindhi mystic poet, says:

Damn the two, go to the One.
He tolerates not even a single difference
And you, o squint-eyed, talk of three.

In the context of the Sindhi mystic poets, Christopher Shackle rightly analyses that "It is through God's indwelling in man that the mystic may come to find Him and realisation of this entails the rejection of a dualistic level of thinking and its concomitant reliance upon the exterior commandments of one particular religion." Sachal Sarmast (1739-1827), who followed the same mystic tradition, held opposite of what the orthodox priests of his days said:

To be one with Him
Set aside the chapters of 'shari' ah' (law) and be 'kafir' (infidel)

Hinduism is not a religion in the Semitic sense of the term. The Semitic religions of Judaism, Christianity and Islam make a distinction between God and man and establish a personal relationship between them. But the Hindu 'religion' (the term is used for the sake of convenience) doesn't make such a distinction and has nothing to do with the religion's etymological sense (based on Semiticism) of "binding together" or "relatedness". Hinduism means the 'Way of Life' (dharma), even as sufism means the 'Path' ('tariqah'). Under the canopy of Hinduism and sufism, man does not relate to God in the manner he does under that of the Semitic religions. Whereas he cannot identify himself with God under the latter, he does so within the former ('Tat twam asi', or 'thou art That'; 'hame ost', or 'everything is He'). The real mystical experience is possible in the pantheistic Hinduism and sufism, for in both of them man identifies with the Universal Being and is a part of the unity of existence. Chainrai Sami (1743-1850), another distinguished Sindhi mystic poet, wrote 'bayts' (which he called 'shlokas') embodying the central doctrine of mysticism, i.e. unity of existence. He says:

Six, eighteen, four describe the only One;
Why do you then go from door to door?
He is in you, look within
And experience His Presence now and here.

Dalpatrai (1769-1849) echoed what his senior contemporary Sami said in his poetry. As a rule, mystics can never be communal in their outlook. He (Dalpatrai) criticised the communal hatred if it showed up in Sindh sometimes, the generally prevalent sufi ideas notwithstanding, and posed a pertinent question to his fellow-beings:

From where comes this disharmony among the people?
If God is in the 'Peepal' tree,
Who is there in the 'Babool' one?

Mystical dimensions of Sindhi poetry present one of the finest expressions of Indian composite culture.

MYSTICISM (Tamil). If mysticism is taken to mean intuitive awareness of the unknown, an intensity of contemplation which transcends the pathways of reason and empirical experience and if such flashes present a unity, the earliest intimation of such intuitive flights may be discerned, in the Tamil context of literary and philosophical tradition, in Karaikkal Ammayar, the woman saint-singer of the 6th century A.D., who saw herself as a ghost; she was an ordinary housewife given to the worship of Shiva, before she became a saint. While a set of her poems, Mootha tiruppadiyam, is a masterpiece of achievement in evolving the spine-chilling atmosphere of cremation ground where Shiva performs his 'Oorduva tandavam' with admiring reverence, where the horrid becomes beautiful and are inspiring, in other set of poems, particularly in Arputha tiruvandadi, as she waxes in appreciative eloquence of the outlandish appearance and choice of dresses and ornaments of Shiva, she rises to heights of mystic profundity on the formlessness of form, the infinite expanse of it, the personification of the five elements, the knowability of the unknown by the unknowing in an unknowing realisation and so on. It is this mystic awareness, not reached by scholarship, but realised in the intense fire glowing within, that spurts out spontaneously out of these saints/singers in varying degrees. One can see the peak of such attainments in the mystic pronouncements of Manikkavachakar in Tiruvachakam and Nammalwar in his several 'pasurams'. Both these appear towards the end of the 8th century to mark the climax of the bhakti wave of 'Nayanmars' and 'Alvars'. Their visions are expressed, not in abstract formulations but in descriptions of intense emotional outbursts of experiences in simple language, for they were not men of scholarship. Most of them were unlettered, engaged in ordinary occupations of life.

MYSTICISM-TAMIL

There is Nammalwar, for instance:

"When I see
The, 'poovai', the 'kaya', the 'neclam', and the 'kavi' flowers, Unworthy though I be
My weak spirit and body thrill and grow in pride and joy.
that all these are but Lord's form (Peria thiruvantati, 73)
He is within, and he is without
If you say He is within
He is,
And all these are His forms
If you question it,
Why, all these shadows
Are His shadow
But He is, He is
With these twin attributes
Being within, being not within, He is.
(Tiruvai mozhi 1-1-7)
(A Srinivasa Raghavan's translation)

It is evident that Nammalwar talks of his own experience and the joy of it and leaves it to the Acharyas who come later to give their interpretations armed with Upanishadic texts.

Right from the 6th century to the 10th-century A.D. which was the Bhakti era, such mystic insights are discernible in Tamil. Of these, Thirumoolar, who is canonised as a Nayanmar, was an intellectual rather than a mystic or a visionary. Thirumoolar is said to have come from Kailasha (Himalayas) and his arrival on the Tamil scene closely followed the time of Pratyabhigna Darshanam (the Kashmir Shaivism). In his deceptively simple, but profoundly abstract Timmandiram, he establishes his own system of Shaiva Siddhanta, merging Agamas with Vedanta, a comprehensive system of Yoga, Tantra, Gnana, etc. But he lived and spoke as a mystic, an outsider to society and the religion around him in his time and perhaps for this reason, he is revered as the leading light of the disparate band of social drop-outs who lived between the 14th and 16th centuries known collectively as 'Siddhas', though Thirumoolan himself belonged to the 6th century. These Siddhas were rebels in all senses of the term, for they acknowledged nothing their contemporary society regarded as sacred. They lived as mendicants, castigated all the prevalent and established social mores, wrote poetry in a colloquial tongue. Each of them is different from the other known by fancy names like 'Pampatti siddhar' (snake charmer), 'Idai kattu siddhar' (the shepherd)', 'Kudambai siddhar' (the one with the girl's ear ornament)', 'Ahappei siddhar' (who has the ghost of a mind) and so on. Often what was commonplace and trite, they spoke in the language of their occupation, but their sayings meant something entirely different and profound that has universal significance. For instance, a poem runs like this:

There was a humble man in a garden, full of bloom
He begged and begged the potter for month, four and six and got his pot, at last
But, he danced and played and broke the pot and lost

This means that human life is a precious gift of the Lord and once obtained it is spent in frivolous pursuits and wasted away.

In the middle of the 18th century from the world of music and philosophic scholarship rose a mystic who renounced the world and lived under his Guru. He was fond of philosophic disputation and one day his Guru admonished him, "Why don't you keep quiet?" He never spoke in his life thereafter. But it didn't, however, stop him from composing kirtanas of undying sweetness and spell-binding profundity. He was Sadashiva Brahmendra, who was hated, and banished from society for his amoral and unconventional mode of life.

Late in the 18th and the early 19th century Tamil land saw the emergence of two great mystic visionaries as poets. Thayumanavar and Ramalinga Swamikal. Though nominally they were Shaivite poets, their visions and utterances had a universality, where the name of Shiva, when at times they chanted, did not evoke the image of Shiva but of the Supreme Godhead. Ramalinga Swamikal preached Universal Brotherhood that transcended all social barriers. These saints did not belong to any established Shaivite religion or institution of which there were powerful many, but they were on their own, as individuals, conversed with the masses moving from place to place and singing their verses.

Subramania Bharati (1882-1921), the modern poet, is no less a heir to this tradition. He was as much a nationalist and modern a minstrel as a heir to the Nayanmar/Alwar tradition and occasionally to their emotional intensity. He was very much, on occasions, prone to losing the awareness of his own self. The rising levels of transcendence have been achieved by some of his poems like 'Qzhi koothu' (Dance of destruction), 'Kuyil pattu' (The song of the cuckoo) or the Kannama poems. Many a time the imageries he employs, which may superficially look as fanciful metaphors, are in fact verbalizations of realised experiences of a mystic mind. Such instances show that there was a streak of the mystic in him.

Lastly Ramana Maharshi is the mystic in the Vedic tradition who lived in Thiruvannamalai and died in 1948. As a boy of 10 he left his home and withdrew into a cave and he did not return home or to society thereafter. Late in life he met those who went to see him in his Ashram in Thiruvannamalai.

MYSTICISM-TELUGU

His realised experience could be capsuled in just two words; 'Know thyself'. This might sound dangerously like a cliché. He was self-taught, to the extent one could have taught oneself as a recluse in a cage from the age of 10.

MYSTICISM (Telugu). According to Oxford Dictionary, a mystic is one who seeks by contemplation and self-surrender to obtain union with or absorption into the deity, or who believes in the spiritual apprehension of truths inaccessible to the understanding. According to the Encyclopaedia Britannica, 'mysticism is a phase of thought, or rather perhaps of feeling... It appears in connection with the endeavour of the human kind to grasp the divine essence or the ultimate reality of things, and to enjoy the blessedness of actual communion with the highest... the thought that is most intensely present with the mystic is that of a supreme, all-pervading, and in-dwelling power in whom all things are one. Hence the speculative utterances of mysticism are always more or less pantheistic in character. On the practical side, mysticism maintains the possibility of direct intercourse with this being of beings, intercourse not through any external media... but by a species of transfusion or identification in which the individual becomes in very truth "partaker of the divine nature"... God ceases to be an object to him and becomes an experience.' Further, mysticism is "the tendency to draw near to the absolute in moral union by symbolic means".

There is some difference in opinion among Telugu scholars in suggesting a native equivalent to the word 'mystic poetry'. C. Narayana Reddy suggests 'devotional poetry' while Duvvuri Rami Reddy suggested 'marma kavitwam'.

Mystic poetry has three channels: 'Paramatmika kavitwam', 'Madhura bhakti kavitawam' and 'Tatwika kavitwam'.

The poet thinks that the whole visible universe is but an imperfect picture of the infinite. The moonshine, the cool breeze, the murmur of the bees, the colour of the flowers, the tenderness of the buds, the infinite variety of sounds, sights and scents that vary by the minute are all the sheer smile of God, an invitation, a beckon from the infinite. The earthbound being strains at the bonds that tie him down, yearns to rise up, tries to leave behind this 'samsara', to shed all material effects and longs to reach up to the beyond. The twin poets Venkata Parvateeswara Kavulu in their Ekanta seva write nothing but this, the bhakta renouncing his self and surrendering himself totally at the feet of the divine. Devulapalli in his 'Mahati' echoes the same sentiments, praying to the Lord to permit his lowly wayside flower to be in the garland round his neck. This lowliness, this self-effacement culminating in an assurance and guarantee of absolution epitomise the 'Paramatmika kavitwam'.

In Madhura bhakti the poet adopts the stance of a woman and craves for union with her lover, the God. In this, too, total self-surrender to and intolerance of separation from God are the two important factors. The cult of Gopikrishna shringara, or 'rasa lila' dates back to the dusty dawn of ancient Sanskrit literature. To examine but a few, Jayadeva's Gitagovinda, songs of Mirabai, Maha Bhagavata, Krishna karnamrita, songs of Annamacharya, Pothana's Srimad Andhra Maha Bhagavata, songs of Kshetrappa and so on are cast in this mould. In the modern times we see the ancient tradition remodelled by a novel influence, that of Tagore's Gitanjali.

Among the modern Telugu poets we can cite Ekanta seva of Venkata Parvateeswara Kavulu as a typical example of mystic poetry. The eternal yearning of the human soul for the union with the being of all beings has been brought out in a beautiful manner in this poem. The two strands of devotion and love have been harmoniously blended. In this poem the poet turns into a woman longing for the mere sight of her lover, craving for his presence and yearning for a union with him. She (the poet) requests the help of the bees and the nightingale, her confidantes, and sends for the flower car of the love's garden to bear her love-message to her Lord. At last the two come face to face, eyes locked in desire, their bodies, hearts and souls fused together in fast embrace--this in brief is the theme of the poem. The ultimate goal a soul seeks is the union with the Eternal, the Purusha, entire nature, Prakriti, being the eternal female.

Devulapalli Krishna Sastry's Anveshanam is a poem describing the magic of Krishna's flute and the intolerable love pangs roused in the Gopikas. Karuna Sri's Karunamay depicts the picture of love-lorn Radhika in her separation from Krishna. Basavaraju Apparao's Gopika gitamulu, Vattikonda Visalashi's Pranaya bhiksha, Vedula's Radha, sandhyanveshanam and others belong to this branch of poetry.

In the tradition of Madhura bhakti, 'Venu gana' (the music of the flute) is of the greatest importance. It is not a mere sound bewitching the Gopikas, it has a profounder purport. Now the jivatmas of Gopikas are separated from the Paramatma, Krishna. The mortal souls, once indivisible and inseparable from the eternal soul, long and yearn to attain that erstwhile unity. The longing is two-sided and Venu gana is nothing but that strong bond between the two entities drawing them into an unbreakable unity.

Works like Prabodha chandrodayam in Telugu literature contain 'tatwika karitwam' or philosophical poetry. This brings out the Jnana marga (the intellectual path), one of the roads to salvation. The essential spirit of this is the urge to know. It is characterised by mystery and sometimes obscurity. Duvvuri Rami Reddy is one of the very few modern Telugu poets who have walked this path. The special feature of these poets is the treatment of death as a dear thing. Death binds, according to them, two consecutive lives. Duvvuri's 'Mrityuvu' (death) contains this philosophy. He says death and life are twins. He describes death as the gateway to another birth and another life. The twin poets Venkata Parvateeswara Kavulu, too, treated the same philosophy in their 'Vichara lahari'.

'Madhu kalasham' of Rayaprolu, 'Panasala' of Duvvuri, 'Omar Khayyam' of Madhavapeddi Butchisundara Rama Sastry, 'Amaruka' of Ramachandra Apparao and others propound the philosophy of drink (madira tatwa). Though they propound the Epicurean philosophy of physical pleasures at the surface, profound depths are suggested. The words 'madhuvu', 'pana patra' and 'saki' stand as symbols for jivatma and paramatma. This contains the sufi philosophy in symbols. Omar Khayyam is the pioneer for this 'madira tattwa'.

Thus in Telugu literature mystic poetry has the three clear strands—the mysticism of poets like Blake, the emotion and imagination of poets like Keats and Shelley, and the suggestiveness and love of nature of poets like Wordsworth. It has also the deep, fresh and strong influence of Tagore's Gitanjali. It has the age-old traditional background of 'madhura bhakti' and the inborn Indian concept of the inseparable duo, the jivatma and paramatma. What the modern Telugu poet had to do was merely to raise a poetic superstructure which he has been able to do successfully and sometimes superbly.

N.G.O. OR GUMASTHA (Telugu). Acharya Atreya's N.G.O. (1949), along with Sunkara and Vasireddi's Mundadugu, has ushered in a new trend of play-writing in Telugu. Both of them represent two branches of the same problem play—one representing the urban and the other the rural—inspired by the growing tension between the 'haves' and 'the have-nots'. While the former dealt with the conflict between the lower middle class man's growing necessities and the social evils and allurements around him, the latter dramatized the sufferings and agonies of small farmers and labourers under the crushing sovereignty of the local landlords.

N.G.O. is a typical problem play. It deals with the sad plight of a clerk in a Government office caught between exploitation and survival, between the gloomy reality of existence and a conscience-keeping moral uprightness. The play and the production had the germinal ingredients of a new theatre movement. The difficult survival of a lower middle class man in an urban society was, for the first time, recognised as a potential subject matter for drama. Ranganatham, the clerk, is a real victim-hero. His meagre income incapacitates him to make both ends meet. His ailing father is dying without proper medical care, though his doctor-friend helps him from time to time. His sister's wedding has been a constant irritant, for he cannot provide for the dowry. His unemployed brother, turning against established corruption goes to a bus-stand to sell tooth-powder which, again, enrages the brother because that would mean demeaning family prestige. The growing needs of the family, the hiked rental charges and the responsibilities of a householder weigh upon the already burdensome life. These, in a weak moment, tempted him to accept a bribe from the Seth and he was soon caught by the police. The play ends with the father's collapse at hearing about his son's arrest and the brother's curtain lecture which questions the society whether temptation of this type is worse than the corruption in the higher echelons of society and as to why a single man is made a victim for social evils.

The theme and its treatment—a victim-hero and his confrontation with the society—has blazed the trail for a new kind of protest drama and angry theatre. The play's melodramatic end, its implicit moral stance with the main characters created as mouth-pieces of two opposed ideals and the sharp crescendo of successive incidents—all these characteristics mark N.G.O. as a well-made play. Ranganatham, the clerk, and his brother, Gopi, are the chief characters of the play. The doctor-friend, the clerk who collects rents, Gopi's friend, who makes fun of Gopi and his social environment, the Seth, who tempts the clerk with a bribe, are all external forces that corner Ranganatham into a state of helplessness and Gopi into a rebel against the establishment. The domestic recriminations intensify the suffering and, instead of acting as deterrents, quicken the process of tragedy.

The individual characters in the play, mainly chosen from the newly-emerging types, victim-hero, the angry young man who protests, the rich man who bribes, etc., are drawn very sharply. Atreya's flair for dramatic language, charged with emotional strength, has also set a pattern for future dramatic writings in Telugu because short crisp dialogues which helped to build up the tempo of the play now replaced the old, leisurely, monologues of the plays of previous years. Though there seems to be a certain lack of focus in characterization and an awkwardness in dramatic structure, the play's importance as a trend-setter, especially in the context of the development of Telugu dramatic literature, is undeniable. The genuineness and the extensive nature of the problem discussed, the emotional intensity of the plot and the dramatic feel for theatre language make N.G.O. a worthy play of protest that has helped extend the thematic boundaries of Telugu dramatic subjects by founding them on firm social realities.

NA DHUPE, NA CHHAVEN-NAAT

(Hyderabad, 1969); M. Saraswathi 'Acharya', Natya kala (Telugu Theatre Centenary Number, ed. M. Nagabhushana Sarma, 1981).

M.N.S.

NA DHUPE, NA CHHAVEN (Punjabi) is a collection of poems by Harbhajan Singh, a widely-known contemporary Punjabi poet.

Na dhype, na chhaven was first published in 1967. Being a poet of modern sensibility, he talks more of his inner-self than outer-self. In fact, most of the poems in the collection depict his inner crisis. Intricacies and knots of life baffle his mind and consciousness. At times he bewails that his life is useless and valueless, a tree without leaves. There is no direction, no destination and certainty in life. Ignorance is a bliss for most of the people. Those who have acquired inner-awakening and deep insight cannot enjoy this bliss.

Harbhajan Singh presents his views with a powerful and penetrating satire, and the reader has the feel of the poems, enjoys them and learns from them. He is pained and perturbed to see the hollowness and hypocrisy of life. He is again distressed and disturbed to see corruption everywhere. He feels that godly men do come in this world again and again, but even then evil does exist here.

In some of the poems, the poet talks about love and its impact on life. Sometimes love entices him and gives him solace and satisfaction and at others, it tortures and torments him. But love is not lust or physical craving for the poet. It is the union of minds and souls. Again in this world livelihood is more important than love.

Throughout the book a sense of anguish and uncertainty keeps peeping out, yet it is not defeatist in outlook. Symbolic presentation strains the reader a bit to reach the core and heart of the poems. But the poetic diction, poetic approach and poetic portrayal make the book interesting and thought-provoking. The poet fully knows what to say, when to say and how to say. No doubt he is quite serious and sober, yet he nowhere talks loudly or burdens the readers with his views and opinions.

NAAT (Kashmiri). Poetry devoted to love and praise of Prophet Muhammad is specifically called 'naat'. It owes its origin to a well-known poetic genre of 'qasida' (panegyric). It is restricted to the devotion and love for Muhammad, conveys the experiences of a devoted lover, which are full of pathos and hope for mercy, and makes beautiful description of his unique beauty. The poets usually aspire to see him in a dream, to have his one glimpse and to get his mercy on the day of resurrection. The poor poet cannot traverse lengthy journey to reach 'Madina' to kiss the threshold of his beloved, and so deposes the morning breeze, the nightingale, the crow and the full moon to convey his woeful story to the 'Emperor of Madina'.

The verses of the Quran contain praises of the beauty and virtue of the Prophet, and so naat composing was taught by the Quran itself. The companions of the Prophet composed beautiful verses in praise of their beloved leader and guide. In his life time a great Arab poet read a beautiful qasida in his praise and in return received the gift of a blanket for his personal use, more precious than treasures of the world to a lover and devotee.

Hence, the qasida in praise of the Prophet became a rule in Arab poetry, and with the development of Persian language, qasida even dominated it from its very beginning. With the evolution of ghazal in Persian, the diction of naat was also remodelled accordingly.

Islam became the religion of the masses in Kashmir within a short period in the 13th and 14th centuries under the influence of the Ulemas, Syeds and saints who came from Iran and Central Asia. They spoke only the Persian and established centres of their missions in every corner of Kashmir. As a result of this contact, Persian left a deep impact both upon the spoken Kashmiri as well as its literature.

Kashmir was already the cradle of devotional poetry and hence the first contribution of the Persian-influenced Kashmiri was also in the same field. The genres of 'manajat' (poems in praise of the Almighty) and naat were immediate additions to the poetry of Kashmir.

The fourteenth century saint-poet, Sheikh Noor-ud-Din Nurani (1377-1441), introduces both manajat and naat. The number of the former is much more than the latter and his manajats are in the form of longer poems (the recognised form), but on the other hand, naat is mainly in 'shruk' form (smaller poems: a few verses). In his naat, the Sheikh has performed the duties of a preacher rather than those of a poet or lover. He had to teach the newly converted common man the true concepts of Islam. The foreign missionaries had taught him in an alien language; the Sheikh had to teach his pupils in the language which could leave an impact on them. He, therefore, wrote his poems in a simple language and touched on the commonly intelligible ideas. The characteristic is also dominating his naat in which he was making his audience understand the contribution of Muhammad to the cause of humanity and persuaded his listener to follow in the footsteps of the 'great leader of all times'.

Both Khwaja Habibullah 'Naushahri' (1555-1618) and Mirza Akmal Din Beg Badakshi. Akmal' (1642-1717) were great saints and poets. They left volumes of Persian verses and the both made a contribution to their mother tongue, Kashmiri, also. They wrote naat in Kashmiri; but one fails to appreciate why they could not write as good a naat in their mother tongue as they did in Persian.

In the latter fifties of the 18th century, Kashmir produced a very great poet who made a great contribution to ghazal and laid the foundation of

'Masnavi' writing, introduced the intricacies of mysticism in poetry and wrote a good number of naat both in Persian and Kashmiri. Mahmud Gami was born in Doru Pargana of District Islamabad (Anantnag) in 1765. He was a genius and had sufficient control over Persian, Kashmiri and Arabic. However, in his naat he has not been able to maintain his greatness as a lyricist or masnavi writer, but we cannot ignore that it was after him that a caravan of naat writers dominated the field of literature. His contemporary was Waiz Qutb-ud-Din (d. 1857) of Chari Sharif who introduced the lyricism of Jami and the diction of Amir Khusrau in Kashmiri naat.

The main centres of the development of Persian literature were, besides Iran in Central Asia, Afghanistan and India in the 14th century when Islam became the religion of Kashmir. Abdul Rehman Jami and Amir Khusrau were representative naat composers of the Persian world. Their naats immediately dominated both the pulpit of the mosque and the parties of music. Kashmiri poets, therefore, desired to introduce the diction of these two poets in Kashmiri naat, and Qutb Waiz discharged this duty successfully. Another contemporary of these two great poets was Waliullah Matu (d. 1860) who, while hearing religious sermon in a mosque, heard the preacher reciting the opening of Jami's Persian naat and immediately left on foot for Madina. This great lover of the Prophet has written naat with devotion, sincerity and love.

Hyder Waiz (d. 1880) succeeded Qutb Waiz in his family. He wrote detailed naat describing the beautiful features of the Prophet and narrated his miracles. He has taken the similes and metaphors from his surroundings instead of imagining them.

Abdul Ahad 'Nazim' (d. 1865) of Bijbeda is one of the great naat poets of all times. He has, on the pattern of Qutb Waiz introduced the diction of "Wanawon" (folk songs being sung by women on marriage parties) in naat. In spite of the high ideas conveyed in his naat, it dominated all shades of social life and were memorised even by illiterate women.

Sanaullah Kreri (1813-1875) introduced a new diction in naat. He, like a separated lover, wished to break the chains of his bondage and reach the threshold of his rose-like beloved, and aspired to quench his thirst by drinking only from the spring of 'Zamzam'.

Maqbul Shah Kralwari (1820-1876) is the king of the domain of masnavi. He has made everlasting contribution of wit and humour, wrote very good elegy and has been a popular naat poet. In masnavis, his Gulrez is a masterpiece. The vicissitudes of life had made him a frustrated man and this frustration he narrates to his patron in his naat. His naat is full of pathos, tears and devotion.

Two brothers, Ghulam Ahmad Jaid (d. 1908) and Hassan Shah Khoihami were great scholars and poets of the Persian language. Besides, Hassan Shah (1839-1899) is a great historian. Both have contributed immensely to Kashmiri naat. Maulvi Sidiqullah (1833-1900) has written long descriptive poems in praise of the physical beauty of the Prophet and has given the lucid details of his virtues and miracles.

Abdul Ahad 'Nadim' (1840-1911) was born in Srinagar and brought up under the care and influence of his two great maternal uncles, Jaid and Hassan. He developed a taste for poetry at an early age and the love for the Prophet was the result of his surroundings from his very childhood. He lived in Bata Har village, district Budgam, and spent the last days of his life in Tulmulla Ganderbal. He died in the village Gamro Bandipora, where he is buried. Nadim is the towering personality among the naat writers of Kashmir. His naat has the diction of his own. It is rich with similes, metaphors and poetic symbols, and it leaves a deep impact upon the mind. In recognition to his eminence as naat writer, the State Academy has fixed a memorial plaque on his grave and the State Government has named the Junior College of Bandipora as Nadim Memorial Higher Secondary Institute.

Abdul Wahab Parrey (1846-1914) was an outstanding poet. He rendered Shahnama of Firdausi in the Kashmiri language. Besides, he has contributed to other forms of poetry as well. As a lyricist he is the first Kashmiri poet to have written a diwan. He has in masnavi form composed Shimailnama, a long poem describing the beauty and contribution of God's apostle, Muhammad. Abdul Gaffar Taib (1825-1914) has, besides hundreds of verses in praise of Muhammad in the Persian language, contributed beautiful naat to Kashmiri literature. Syed Amir Shah Kreri (1846-1905), Miskin Mohi-ud-Din (1865-1921), Ashiq Trali (d. 1882) and Saif-ud-Din 'Aariz' (d. 1895) made considerable contribution to this genre.

Pir Azizullah Haqani (1854-1928) wrote naat in a unique diction full of pathos and hope, devotion and reverence, content and skill. Santram Nadim Trali (d. 1933) introduced a Sufistic approach in naat. Muhammad Ismail Nami (d. 1938) wrote naat with devotion in the masnavi form. Like a Muslim Sufi, Anand Ram (d. 1939) wrote naat with sincerity and devotion. His naat is a manifestation of the fact that being a Hindu he was conscious about the status and stature of Muhammad. Haji Ilyas (1862-1942) versified the biography of the Prophet. He was probably influenced to write this biography by the Shibili Niamani's Urdu (prose) Siratun-Nabi. The book is yet to be published. His naat is good, but burdened with Arabic and Persian words. Darvish Abdul Qadir (1865-1948) has also written rich naats. Dilsoz Kashmiri (1919-1945) died at a very young age. In spite of his youth, he has written mature naat in a forceful diction. Ghulam Nabi 'Aariz' (1911-1965) was a poet of the masses. Like his lyric, his naat is also popular with the common man. Tanha Ansari (1914-1969) wrote very good naat and his ruba'is in praise of the Prophet are very sweet. He has written a parody on a famous Persian naat of Qudsi.

In recent years, a few eminent naat writers passed away. Among them were Qazi Nizam-ud-Din (1907-1967), Ghulam Jilani (1900-1978), Khamush Kareri (1912-1973) and Maulvi Jalal-ud-Din Shah Waiz (1921-1981).

Among the contemporaries, G.A. Fazil (b. 1914) has contributed greatly to Kashmiri naat. The compilation of his naat Anwar Muhammadi is one of the few books which was published nine times between 1958 and 1980. Mir Ghulam Rasul Nazki (b. 1909) has in his ruba'is skilfully blended the lofty ideas in naat. He seems to be influenced by the naat of Allama Iqbal and Maulvi Rumi's thought. Ghulam Muhammad Beg 'Arif' has also written naat in a mystic pattern. Dinanath 'Nadim' (1916-1988) is the pioneer of modern poetry. He is original and skilful in chiselling the phrases, coining new words and introducing metaphors. He has added a few naats to our literature which exemplify modern diction. Tak Zangire (b. 1924), Pitambarnath 'Fani' (b. 1919), Syed Mohi-ud-Din 'Nawaz' (b. 1926), Rashid Nazki (b. 1932), Nishat Ansari (b. 1930), Mashal (b. 1933), Mohi-ud-Din 'Gauhar' (b. 1933), Ghulam Muhammad Mushtaq (b. 1934), Ghulam Nabi 'Gauhar' (b. 1934), Margub Banihali (b. 1935), Rasul Pompur (b. 1940) and Rafiq Raaz (b. 1950) have also made considerable contribution to this genre, giving new dimensions in style and technique.

Till the early thirties the naat literature was scattered in manuscripts or preserved in the memory of priests and singers. A leading firm, of Ghulam Muhammad Nur Muhammad and Sons, Srinagar, took the initiative to collect this scattered treasure and published various volumes of Gulshan-i-naat. Thereafter some poets, who were living then, got their naat published along with their other poems. In 1958, Fazil Kashmiri published exclusive naat compilation entitled Anwari-Muhammadi, which has undergone various reprints. In 1972, A.R. Nazki edited, on behalf of the State Academy, Kulliyat-i-Nadim, containing all the naats of Abdul Ahad 'Nadim'. Many poets got their naats published at various occasions in Gulrez magazine from 1950 onwards, and magazine of the State Academy, from 1950 onwards, and the magazine of the State Academy, Shiraza, has also contributed by publishing naat of various writers. In 1981, the State Academy of Jammu and Kashmir celebrated 15th century Hijra and during the year several 'Natia mushairas' (poetic symposia confined to recitation of naat) were held, which immensely added to the contribution of naat. The naats recited during these celebrations are being published soon. The weekly newspaper, Kashur Akhbar, of the Kashmir Cultural Organisation also issued special numbers, publishing naats of various poets. In 1981, a combined collection of Kashmiri and Persian naats under the title of Nalai bedilan was published by Anjuman-i-Mizin of Kanqahi Maula, Srinagar.

NABABABUBILAS (Bengali) published in 1823 is a prose work which satirizes the manners of the 19th century 'babus' of Calcutta and their way of life. Its author was Bhābanicharan Banerjee (1787-1848) who was a renowned and powerful journalist associated with the periodical Samachar chandrika. He wrote under the pseudonym of Pramathanath Sharma.

The book describes the life of the nabababu or the neo beau in a pungent style. The author describes in detail the huge amount of wealth earned by the ancestors of naba babu, his education under different teachers and at last his initiation into the life of a babu. The babu ultimately lands himself in trouble. He loses everything including his health and wealth and is at last imprisoned.

Such affluent young men of Calcutta as were sarcastically described as 'babus' came in for stringent and satiric comment in this book. The book reflects the anguish and mortification of the conservatives at the social and moral depravity of the Young Bengal. The work has a coarseness about it but it is redeemed by the author's sense of humour which lends the work a refreshing hilarity.

Nabababubilas is important as a prose work written at a time when Bengali prose was not much developed. Its style is lively and racy and it advanced the development of Bengali prose.

NABHADAS (Hindi; b. 1570, d. 1662 approximately), a contemporary of Goswami Tulsidas, ranks as one of the leading poets of the 'Rambhakti' tradition. One of the front-ranking disciples of Agradas, he flourished in the fifth generation of the lineage of the celebrated Swami Ramanand. Nabha was ordained by his mentor to compose Bhaktamal which remains the most outstanding source of his fame and is rated as the best in the Bhaktamal tradition of Hindi medieval literature. Blind by birth, Nabhadas was abandoned by his helpless poverty-stricken mother, further ravaged by famine, in a forest from where the five-year old child was picked up and reared as his own by his mentor, Agradas. Tradition has it also that he was cured of his congenital blindness by the mystic power of his Guru.

It is believed that Bhaktamal was composed in or about the year 1592. There is, however, no clear indication about the time for, according to one source, the book was completed in the year 1658.

NABI SHEIKH-NACHARI

A close study of Bhaktamal proves undoubtedly that Nabhadās was well-versed in Sanskrit poetics, prosody, and other allied disciplines. Bhaktamal, which forms the corner-stone of his fame, is an account of the lives of the medieval poets of the devotional school in general and of the Ramanand sect in particular. It is reckoned as an authentic work of the medieval period. The author's popularity can be gauged from the fact that Bhaktamal commenced a series of such compositions. There were others who wrote commentaries on his work. The language of Bhaktamal is Braj bhasha. The metres used are popular metres, such as Chhappaya, Doha, etc. The style reflects maturity, refinement, and a deep understanding of the nuances of words.

A comprehensive study of Bhaktamal is essential for any student of the medieval devotional poetry of Hindi and the various philosophical schools to which their pioneers and poets belonged.

Apart from Bhaktamal, Nabhadās is also credited with the composition of Ramashtayam, comparatively a less known work.

NABI SHEIKH (Hindi; b. 1689, d. 1750), better known as 'Rasleen', had Sayyid Gulam Nabi as his full name. His father's name was Sayyid Mohammad Bakar, and the family had links with the Hussaini tradition. In his early childhood he lived in Bilgram, district Hardoi. His maternal uncle Mir Abdul Jameel 'Bilgrami' was a well-known Hindi poet. It was from him that Rasleen got the inspiration to write poetry. He was not only a poet, but also a soldier and an excellent horseman. Pleased by his marksmanship, Nawab Safdarjung appointed him in his army. Firm in his loyalty and unflinching in his bravery, Rasaleen died in a battle with the Pathans near Agra.

The main source of Rasaleen's poetry lies in the Arabic and Persian tales of love and the 'Nayak-Nayika Bhhed' tradition of love poetry in Sanskrit. Shivsingh Sengar maintains that he was an Alim Fazil in Arabic and Persian. His famous book Arg darpan was written in 1737. Consisting of a hundred and eighty dohas, it depicts the exquisite physical charm of a Nayika in a highly embellished style. In the tradition of the love-poetry of 'Ritikal', the book gained extreme popularity, as it is replete with attractive 'prem-suktis' (love couplets). One of his dohas is so popular that it is often quoted, though by mistake it is often attributed to Bihari:

Amiy halahal mad bhare, shwet, shyam ratnar, Jiyat, marat, jhuki jhuki parat jehin chitawat ik bar.

His next book is Ras prabandh (1741). It is a collection of one hundred and fifty-five dohas. This book follows the poetic conventions of 'Nayika-bhed' and 'Barahamasa', but the portrayal of 'rasa' is so perfect here that an ordinary reader need not study any other book to understand the theory of rasa. His use of Brajbhasha excels in music of words and marvel of expression. His originality marks him out as a gifted and sensitive poet of 'Ritiyug'.

NACCHINARKKINIYAR (Tamil). The period between 10th and 16th centuries may be called the age of commentators. The earliest available commentary was written by Ilampuranar for Tolkappiyam. Nacchinarkkiniyar's period must be sometime after the 14th century and he may probably be considered the last in the great tradition of the commentators of medieval period. From a verse eulogising his commentary, it is evident that he hailed from Madurai and belonged to Bharadvaja gotra and it is clear that he wrote commentaries on Tolkappiyam, Pattuppattu, Kalitogai, Kuruntogai (20 verses only) and Jivakachinthamani. The last four chapters of Tolkappiyam Porulatikaram and his commentary on twenty verses to Kuruntogai are not available now. Nacchinarkkiniyar is the first commentator who has written commentaries on both grammatical and literary genres of early Tamils. His commentaries are not only a proof of his scholarship in the field of both language and literature but also specimens of his prose style with clarity of diction and sophistication of syntax. He is vehement and bold in his interpretation of the texts and he tried to establish the authenticity of texts. Nacchinarkkiniyar was condemned for his way of interpreting ancient texts and even scholars like Marimalai Adigal started to reject the commentaries of Nacchinarkkiniyar as the distortion of literary texts and poetic sensibilities and wrote new commentaries on those works. In spite of all this, Nacchinarkkiniyar still remains undoubtedly one of the pioneers in the field of commentary-writing and his contribution through his commentaries is immensely valuable to the students of Tamil language and literature.

NACHARI (Maithili). It is a sort of devotional folk-song, propitiating Shiva with or without his consort, Gauri. It is usually sung by devotees while dancing before an idol or image of Shiva with a 'damaru' (string drum). This dance is said to have originated from the ecstatic dance of Shiva. Accordingly, it is derived from 'Nrityacharika Nachcharia Nachari'. Thus literally it means the worship (charika) by way of dance (nritya).

Perhaps, originally it denoted all kinds of devotional dancing songs addressed to any deity. This is why Jagajjotirmalla (1613-1637), king of Nepal, called some of his songs Ganeshtuti nachari, Suryastuti nachari, and the like. Surprisingly he extends the range of nachari even to those songs which have erotic and secular themes. Abdul Fajl finds the 'lachari of Bidapat' lightly erotic. Nachari has a set of its own traditional tunes having no parallel in Bhojpuri or Magahi. Any song whether devotional or erotic might have been termed as nachari on the ground of having this tune. But in present-day Mithila it always means songs relating to Shiva, and the above tunes are exclusively used in such songs.

NADALITE

The first occurrence of the term nachari has been traced to 1424, when Lakkhan Seni, a Hindi poet of Jaunpur, paid tribute to Vidyapati along with Jayadeva and Ghagha: 'Vidyapati kai gae lachari' (the poet Vidyapati sang nachari songs). The next reference is found in the famous chronicle, Ain-i-Akbari of Abdul Fajl (16th century) where he remarks: "Those in the dialect of Tirhut are called Lachari, and are the composition of Bidapat and in character lightly erotic." It is remarkable that in the both these references nachari is associated with Vidyapati. and we can easily conclude that he was widely known in the West as well as in his home-land for nacharis, whereas in the East (i.e., Bengal and Assam) he was acclaimed only for his erotic songs depicting the love of Radha and Krishna. It is, however, surprising that nachari is only a small part of Vidyapati's songs extant in written sources. Nevertheless, in the oral tradition of Mithila a large number of nacharis are attributed to him, although their language betrays their later origin. Perhaps most of his nacharis were lost or suffered metamorphosis in course of time. It can, therefore, be safely concluded that nachari reached its climax during the time of Vidyapati, and this presupposes an earlier stage of development of which little is extant today.

Unlike other types of Maithili folk-songs, nachari is more popular among men and is seldom heard in chorus. It is generally ranked with folk songs only because it has a long oral tradition. Nevertheless, it deserves the rank of a classical lyric inasmuch as it has a long written tradition mostly of known authorship and classical refinement. This type of double stratification is a remarkable feature not only of nachari, but also of many other types of Maithili folk-songs like joga, lagani, sohara, etc.

On the basis of its theme, nachari may broadly be divided into two distinct categories. Deep devotion and glorification, at times even accusation, of the Lord are the high tones of the first category. The second category presents the interesting episodes of the amorous, ludicrous and paradoxical life of Shiva and Gaura (vulgar or popular version of Gauri). There is an interesting controversy over the range of meaning of the term nachari. Some of the scholars hold that nachari covers the songs only in the first category, and the term maheshabani stands for those in the second category. According to others, nachari covers both the categories and the term maheshabani (Sanskrit Maheshavani, the songs of Mahesha) is only a synonym of nachari. If the distinction between nachari and maheshabani is taken for granted, the former is more devotional like a hymn and less poetic, but the latter is more poetic and less devotional.

Right from Vidyapati to Chanda Jha almost all Maithili poets have more or less enriched nachari. The most prominent among them are Paramahansa Vishnupuri (1425-1500), Govinda, Umapati (1570-1650), Lala, Lakshinath Gosani, Karna Shyama, Kanha Ramadas and Chanda Jha (1831-1907). The vogue of writing nachari is not yet extinct in Maithili and we have some good poets still writing nachari.

NADALITE (Kannada) is a collection of 50 Kannada lyrics by Dattatraya Ramachandra Bendre published in 1938. This is one of the major works of poetry of the Navodaya Age. Love, the beauty of nature, man's self-made destiny, the enduring power of Mother India, the mystery of the creative process, social problems—these are some of the subjects treated in this collection, and a wide spectrum of feelings and attitudes, introspection, assurance, hope, despair, wonder, spiritual ecstasy, nostalgia and self-contentment appears here. The experiments in metres and the power and vividness of the language made an immediate impact on the readers. The subjects are treated in a language which is a selection from the common man's language of the Dharwad area. With his extremely memorable utterances, intensity of feeling, a twang of folk-lore touch, and, more than all, with his magic of expression, Bendre carried poetry to the common man. This collection contains such immensely popular poems as 'Kurudu kanchana' (Blind money), 'Annava-tara' (The incarnation of the God of food), 'Sachchidananda' (The everlasting bliss), 'Nee heenga nodabeda nanna' (Do not look at me so), 'Nanu badevi' (I am a poor woman), 'Beludingala noda' (Look at the moonlight) and 'Elu kannikeyaru' (The seven maidens). Masti Venkatesha Iyengar has, in his illuminating introduction, enumerated the excellences of Bendre's poetry. There is excellence of feeling, of expression and of style. Bendre's poetry throbs with life. Poetic expression comes naturally to him. Masti says that some of the songs in the collection have a place in world literature, a compliment richly deserved.

NADIM, ABDUL AHAD–NADIM, DINANATH

NADIM, ABDUL AHAD (Kashmiri; b. 1840, d. 1911) was born in a family having a respectable literary background. Some renowned men of letters of Kashmir come from his mother's ancestry. His parents lived at Ran'vor, Srinagar, and he was brought up by his relatives, namely, Ghulam Rasul Sheva and Hassan Shah, in the lovely village of Gamur. The tranquillity of the country and the patronage and affection of his learned uncles nurtured in him a calm and speculative mind. He was a child when his father died.

Nadim was greatly moved and inspired by the emotional intensity and unconstrained rapture of Kashmiri marriage songs, and he used to remain awake for nights on the occasions of marriages and loved to be carried away by the melodies of marriage rhymes sung by women. This unusual taste found an outlet for his latent in fervent religious adoration, especially his love for the prophet Muhammad. He wrote highly devotional naats drawing on the ecstatic rhythms and imagery of Kashmiri marriage songs called 'vatsun'. The quantity of Nadim's work is small, but it bears the mark of a very high quality. Nadim's naats gained immediate popularity and these are still sung on all marriage occasions. His naats have a charm and dignity of their own. His naive sincerity of sentiment has produced sublimity without using Persian expressions. He wrote in the familiar and simple style. His lyrics express the uncouth and naive devotional sentiments and passionately imagined visions of true religion as exemplified in the life of Muhammad. He drew upon nature for his imagery. This strength lies in his ability to combine a sense of the infinite with an awareness of the concrete and the immediate.

Sh.S.

NADIM, DINANATH (Kashmiri; b. 1916 d.1988), considered to be the greatest Kashmiri poet of the century, was born at Srinagar. He was the only surviving child of a middle class family, and the death of his father propelled him into an early adulthood. He was deeply influenced by the mother, Sukhsundari, who was largely responsible for the refinement of his sensibilities during his formative years. He studied while working mostly as a private tutor. He was involved with revolutionary activities at his college. He also started to write poetry in Urdu around this time. Public readings of his poems during the struggle for local self government led to his arrest and confiscation of his writings. He had to leave his college but graduated subsequently as a private candidate from Punjab University. He was also closely connected with the 'Quit Kashmir' movement. His first attempt at Kashmiri poetry was published in 1938 in Pratap magazine, under a pseudonym. The first public reading of his self-acknowledged Kashmiri poem 'Mutsravi bar te dari vesi' in 1946, led to his instant recognition, and he was hailed as a major new voice. He took the pseudonym of 'Nadim'

(he was born Dinanath Kaul). He became a founder member of the 'Cultural Front' formed during the tribals' invasion of Kashmir in 1947. The entire corpus of modern Kashmiri literature stems directly from the formation of this Front. He was the founder editor Kongposh, the first ever Kashmiri periodical, now defunct. He began as an avowed Marxist, but towards the end of the fifth decade, he started steering clear of overt rhetoric. He was awarded the Soviet Land Nehru Award in 1970 for the totality of his works. He has also been honoured with the Kumaran Asan Award and the first Kalhana Award in 1984. He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for his first collection of poems, Shihil kul, in 1986. He was proficient in Urdu, Hindi and English, besides his mother tongue. His poems have been translated into many languages of the world. He was an eminent educationist and a member of the State Legislature.

His contribution to the making of modern Kashmiri literature is phenomenal. His period has been rightly dubbed as the 'Nadim Era'. His innovations in form have been numerous, which left a deep impression on the future trends. He used the direct address-form which had its effect. Although his early poems are marked by the distinctly progressive tenor, his later poems, which are more introspective, use techniques like the stream of consciousness quite successfully.

Nadim wrote the first short story and the first sonnet in Kashmiri literature. He wrote the first opera in Kashmiri much before other Indian languages became familiar with this form. His seven operas constitute a major body of the dramatic works available in Kashmiri. He introduced blank verse and free verse to suit the compulsions of his content. The richness and the variety of his themes have enriched the content of Kashmiri literature in a profound manner. This has been recognised as a seminal contribution to Kashmiri literature. In this verse, the human being, the condition and predicament of his existence, find a sharp focus. His absolute mastery over the language and the inventive metaphor have enabled him to venture into uncharted territories of poetic experience. He displays a great feeling for the incidental. His series of short poems, Haarysath (Vicissitudes), is a landmark in the development of a post-modernist idiom in Kashmiri literature. His trend-setting poems of this period include 'Naabad to tethven' (Candy and Artemisia), 'Divur' (Stone temple) and 'Chaary kath' (Absurd relevance). These are not, however, a negation of his earlier progressive concerns. They are a seamless evolution. His protagonist is in an eternal vis-a-vis with the esoteric and the exoteric at once. His latest work reveals a broad metaphysical strain which posits another major departure.

NADUVATH ACCHAN NAMBUTHIRI (Malayalam; b.1841; d.1912), was a poet who used to take part in the private meetings of poets in the court of the Kodungallur royal family which gave shape to the so-called "pure Malayalam" school of literature. He was born in a poor family named Naduvathu Illam in Chalakkuti (Central Kerala). In order to differentiate between him and his son, who was also a poet, they were referred to as Natuvathu Acchan (Acchan-father) and Natuvathu Mahan (Mahan-son). He lost his father while still an infant and lived in utter poverty until the Maharaja of Cochin bestowed on him titles over the properties of two other Nambuthiri families which were about to become extinct. Hence he could start his Sanskrit education only late in his life and it remained incomplete. But this was compensated for by his close acquaintance with Malayalam poetry, especially with the humorous poems of Kunchan Nambiar and he started writing poetry in simple Malayalam. This tendency was strengthened by the influence of the gathering of poets at Kodungallur.

Naduvathu Acchan's poetical works are marked by clarity, simplicity and sweetness. In Ambopadeshasm (1886) the poet rejected the general tendency of the writers of those days to project amorous life as the sole ideal of women whose function, it was believed, was to uphold virtuousness, Bhagavaddutu nataka (1892), a play which depicts the mediation of Lord Krishna in the dispute between Pandavas and Kauravas, Shringeri yatra and Ashtamiyatra, two pieces which describe pilgrimages, Bhagavadstuti, written in praise of God, and Balyudbhavam, a poem composed in the form of a folk song are the other completed works. Besides these, there are numerous minor poems and incomplete works written by him.

NAGACHANDRA (Kannada; b.11th century) flourished during the early part of the Kannada literature. It was Nagachandra alone who enjoyed high reputation as a poet following the trio Pampa, Ponna and Ranna, stalwarts in old Kannada literature. Nagachandra has to his credit Ramchandra charita purana, popularly known as Pampa Ramayana, and Mallinatha purana. Both these are rendered in 'champu' form and have marked distinction in literary world, the first one spread over 16 ashvasas with 2343 stanzas and the second in 14 ashvasas with over 1491 stanzas. However, his Ramayana has enjoyed more popularity at the hands of the readers. No other work is available that could be attributed to him.

We know little about the personal life of the poet. Balachandramuni is mentioned to have been his preceptor. In the beginning of his works, Nagachandra has expressed his reverence to a few Jain monks. They are Bhutabali, Pushpadanta, Jinasena, Virasena and others. He has also referred to the trio Pampa, Ponna and Ranna of the 10th century. Though he had several titles like 'Bharatikarnapura' and so on, he was well-known as 'Abhinava Pampa'.

Nagachandra's date of birth is highly controversial. The recent researches on the basis of epigraphs give us the idea that the poet lived between 1060 and 1140. There is no evidence to show that the poet enjoyed patronage of any ruler. However, some believe that he was a contemporary of a poetess by name Kanti and the court poet of the Hoysala king Ballala I, a ruler under the Chalukyas of Kalyana. Some say he lived during the regime of Hoysala Vishnuvardhana (1140-1141) or Chalukya prince Mallikarjuna (1105-1120). An inscription from the Bijapur district contains two stanzas from Pampa Ramayana. The poet has claimed in his Mallinatha purana to have built a temple for Mallinatha Jina at Vijayapura which clearly indicates that he belonged to the present Bijapur region in Karnataka.

Later poets like Karnaparya, Parshva, Janna Kamalbhava, Gunavarma II, Madhura, Mangarasa, Padmakavi, Devappa and many others have taken Nagachandra's name with reverence which simply adds to the reputation he enjoyed during his own life time and afterwards. Some of his poems also appear in Sravana Belgola inscriptions (Ec. II, 64, 1163, 127, 1115, 140, 1145, 158, c. 1100) to show again his outstanding place in Kannada literature.

As Ponna's Bhuavanaikaramabhyudaya is no more available today, Nagachandra's Ramayana emerges as the oldest Ramayana written independently in Kannada. This also stands out as the first Ramayana in the language written in accordance with the Jain tradition. The poet has befittingly made use of Ravisena's (678 A.D) Padma-purana in Sanskrit, and probably Vimalasuri's Prakrit Pauma chariu also. The theme is about Rama and Lakshmana who were none but the eighth Baladeva and Vasudeva and Ravana being the Prativasudeva of the period of the 20th tirthankara Munisuvrata. The original has been appropriately amplified, condensed and adopted, thus welding the theme, events, characters and action all into a new design. His imagination has endowed many characters and events to blossom with more sublimity than they possess in their originals. The abduction of Sita, episode of Uparambha, transformation of Ravana's mind and attitude are certain touching events of the poem deserving mention. Ravana stays in the reader's mind as a tragic character par excellence.

Mallinatha purana depicts the story of the 19th tirthanakara in accordance with the 'digambara' tradition. Nagachandra is probably indebted to Gunabhadracharya's (898) Uttarapurana for his work. The story in a nutshell of 125 verses has spread wide over several ashvāsas. King Vaishnavana sees a banyan tree burnt to ashes struck by a thunderbolt and resorts to renounce the world. He performs penance and takes birth as Ahamindra. Then he is born as a son by name Mallinatha to king Kumbha, refuses to marry, renounces the mundane world, performs penance and transforms himself into a 'Kevalajnani'. This being the epitome of the plot, the poem deals with the description of the five kalayanas of tirthankara and also contains the 18 conventional types of descriptions with all their delight and ornamentation. Some of the significant events of the poem comprise Vaishnavana's renunciation luxuries, enchanting descriptions of nature, etc. Nagachandra takes the credit for placing Mallinatha tirthankara who is seldom described in the whole of Indian Jain literature, on an exalted throne in Kannada literature.

As regards Nagachandra's style, his comely and mellowed manner of depiction and subtle expression of meaning are remarkable.

NAGADAMAN (Rajasthani), the story of Krishna's subduing Kaliya Nag at Vrindaban has been a popular subject with many poets. Sanya Jhula (b.1575) was the foremost among those writers. Endowed with the genuine fervour of a poet, Sanya Jhula composed this poem in the early years of the seventeenth century. He was a court poet of Raja Sirohi and was awarded 'Lakh pasava' (a lakh of rupees). The poem Nagadaman consists of 121 stanzas and a concluding shatapadi. The main metre is 'Bhujang prayat' which is named so by prosodists as it resembles the movement of a serpent. Though essentially intended to be a devotional poem, it successfully depicted 'vatsalya rasa' at appropriate places. It is also commendable that without describing a battle as such, the poet has drawn a graphic picture of the medieval warfare by giving a long list of armour, weapons and other war equipment. The book is available in an edition by Moolchand 'Pranesh', (Bharatiya Vidya mandir Shodh Pratishthan, Bikaner, 1966). Copies in manuscripts form are also found which prove the popularity of the story. Devotees recite its text also in their daily rituals. There are other works too known as Nagadaman, but this one simply excels them all.

NAGANANDA (Sanskrit) is one of three popular dramas of King Harsha of Kanauj who reigned from A.D. 606 to A.D. 647, the other two being Priyadarshika and Ratnavali. King Harsha was the patron of Bana, Mayura and others, and the hero of Bana's prose work, Harshacharita.

The Chinese pilgrim scholar Huen Tsung who came to India during Harsha's reign refers to Nagananda as a drama written by King Shiladitya (i.e. Shri Harsha) on the life of Bodhisattva Jimutavahana who sacrificed himself in place of a Naga, and says that this drama was set to music and was performed by a band of actors accompanied by dancing and acting. This drama has been one of those popular with the Kerala actors for detailed performance in the Kutiyattam style in the temple theatres for nearly a thousand years. Nagananda was translated into Tibetan (published by Vidhusekhara Bhattacharya, Calcutta) and became popular even outside India.

Nagananda by king Harsha is a drama in five acts dealing with the popular story of Jimutavahana's self sacrifice to save the Nagas. The first three acts give an account of the hero's love-affair and his consequent marriage with Malayavati and the last two acts deal with his self-sacrifice to save the Nagas from Garuda, who reforms himself, restoring to life all the Nagas he had killed, and promises not to injure anyone. Prince Jimutavahana who dies is brought back to life by Goddess Gauri who proclaims him as the Emperor of the Vidyadhras. Tolerance towards Buddhism and Hinduism is shown in the play. The story is found in the Buddhist Vidyadhara jataka and also in the Kathasaritsagara of Somadeva.

NAGAR, AMRITLAL-NAGARJUN

The main rasa in the play is considered to be 'shanta' according to some and 'dayavira' according to others. The playwright has drawn the character of Jimutavahana consistently under various circumstances.

The unique characteristic of this drama is the invocation to Lord Buddha in the Nandi verse. Nagananda is considered one of the best examples of the dramatic compositions wherein the norms of dramaturgy are followed up to a considerable extent.

NAGAR, AMRITLAL (Hindi; b. 1916) is an eminent Hindi novelist, short story writer, and playwright. He has been associated with various organisations, e.g. All India Radio, Lucknow (1953-56); U.P. Hindi Samiti (1973-76), U.P. Sangit Natak Akademi (1974). He was also in film production from 1940 to 1947. Besides Hindi and English, he knows Gujarati, Marathi and Bengali. Collections of his short stories and sketches started appearing as early as 1935, but his major titles are Nawabi masanad (Nawab's bolster, 1939), Tularam shastri (1941), Seth Bankemal (1944); Adami, nahin nahin (Man, no, no, 1947), Panchwan dasta (Fifth column, 1955) Ek dil, hazar dastan (One heart, thousand tales, 1955), Pipal ki pari (Fairytale of pipal tree, 1963), Kaladand ki chori (Theft of time measure, 1963), Meri priya kahaniyan (My favourite short stories, 1970), Bharat putra Naurangilal (Naurangilal, son of India, 1972).

He shot into fame with the publication of his novel, Bund aur samudra (The drop and the sea, 1956) which depicts vividly the changing social order, underlining the interdependence of the individual and society. His later novels, which have been well received, are Sataranj ke mohre, 1959, Suhag ke nupur (based on the Tamil classic Shilappadikaram, 1960), Amrit aur vish (Nectar and poison, 1966), depicting the gradual change in social values from 1857 to 1965, Sat ghunghatwala mukhada (A face with seven veils, 1968), based on the life of Begam Samaru; Ekada Naimisharnye (Once upon a time, in the Nemisha forest, 1978); Nachyo bahut Gopal (I have now danced too much, Gopal, 1978), narrating the ups and downs in the life of a Brahmin girl who married a sweeper; Khanjan nayan (1981), based on the life of Surdas.

Collections of his radio-plays are entitled Bat ki bat (1974), Chandan van (Sandal forest, 1976), Chakkardar sidhiyan aur andhera (Spiral staircases and darkness, 1977). He also wrote stage plays, entitled Yugavatar (1956), based on the life of Bharatendu Harischandra, and Nudkkad par (At the corner, 1963). He translated into Hindi many classics, e.g. Bisati (Collection of Maupassant's short stories, 1935); Prem ki pyas (Thirst for love, 1937), Hindi adaptation of Flaubert's novel Madam Bovary; Kala purohit (Black priest, 1939), Hindi version of Chekhov's short stories; Ankhon dekha gadar (Eye witnessed mutiny, 1955), translation of Vishnu Bhat Godse's Marathi book Majha pravasa. He also translated K.M. Munshi's three Gujarati plays, and one Marathi play by Mama Warekar. His own novels Bund aur samudra, Suhag ke nupur, Amrit aur vish and Manas ka hans have also been translated into many Indian languages. He also wrote dialogues and scenarios for many Hindi films.

His novel, Amrit aur vish, won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1967 and the Soviet-Land Nehru Award in 1970; his other novels Bund aur samudra, Suhag ke nupur, Manas ka hans also won various awards. On him was conferred the degree of Sahitya Varidhi by the Government of India.

NAGARJUN (Hindi; b. 1911). His real name is Vaidyanath Mishra. He belongs to Barauni, district Darbhanga (Bihar), and has written in Maithili, Hindi and Bengali, but the most sizeable body of his work is in Hindi.

Nagarjun is a prolific writer. His Patrahin gachh (The leafless tree), a book of poems in Maithili, received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1968, and his novel Baba Batesarnath was the recipient of an Uttar Pradesh Government Award. He has also translated Kalidasa's Meghduta, Vidyapati's Padavali, and Jaydev's Gita Govinda into Hindi. He has written books for children as well.

Nagarjun is basically a people's writer, and although the leftist writers in Hindi have long claimed him as their own, his best work goes beyond political ideology because of his genuine concern for the basic human values. Coming from a rural background, from a family of simple farming stock, his novels are an acute reflection of the rural life of India, both before and after Independence. The feudal set-up of the village power-politics and the claustrophobic, often decadent, joint-family system are powerfully portrayed in his novels, Baba Batesarnath and Ratinath ki chachi. His language is richly laced with local dialect and is racy and colloquial.

Again, as a poet, Nagarjun reveals in Akal (The drought) not only a deep sympathy with the poor, suffering people, but also an aggressive spirit against those responsible for chaos. He has never written long analytical prefaces to his poems, but simple and direct as they are, these poems demand of the reader, a greater understanding of the people.

His latest volume of poems Khichadi viplav dekha hamane (We have witnessed a hotchpotch revolution) is a moving collection of poems written both during and after the Emergency. His deep mistrust of the soft-spoken politicians and his affection for the young who stood up against them are as moving as his disenchantment with Emergency, since it led the people from one chaos to another. Nagarjun has been a favourite with the masses for his twin qualities of unsparing honesty and earthy humour. His other works, include: Poetry: Yugdhara, satrange pankhon wali; Pyasi pathrai ankhen; Talab ki machhaliyan; Tumne kaha tha; Bhasmankur; Novels: (Maithili) Paro, Navturi, Balchanama; (Hindi) Balachanama, Nai Paudh, Varun ke bete, Dukhnocha, Vgratara, Imratia, Janaia ka baba, Heerak Jayanti (now available as Abhinandan paro).

NAGARJUNA (Sanskrit; 2nd Cent. A.D.), a Buddhist philosopher, was the most important exponent and one of the earliest founders of the Madhyakama school of the Mahayana. He is supposed to have authored eight books, the most significant among them being the Madhyanakarikas (Versions of the doctrines of contentious argument). As a philosopher Nagarjuna aimed at systematizing the principles of the Mahayana Sutras and of the Prajnaparamita and arrived at the doctrine of emptiness (Shunyata) of existence. His argument centred round 'samvriti satya' (conventional truth) and 'paramartha satya' (Absolute truth) and he tried to establish the doctrine of nirvana through the juxtaposition of these two truths in terms of interesting paradoxes. An encyclopaedic work on this tradition of Mahayana school is Mahaprajnaparamita-upadesha, which is ascribed perhaps wrongly to Nagarjuna. This doctrine of emptiness or void (Shunyata), some scholars believe, might have at least partially influenced the Advaita philosophical thinking of the school of Shankaracharya.

Nagarjuna may also be credited with the composition of Buddhist poetic epistles (Iekhas) as well as philosophical stotras (lyrics) and parikathas (tracts). His followers like Matricheta and Aryasura carried this tradition of literary treatment of philosophical ideas to the later ages.

Scholars mention two other Nagarjunas, one of whom was a tantric and the other a teacher of medicine. The Tibetan tradition considers all the three of them as one person which perhaps cannot be true mainly because they lived in different ages.

NAGAVARMA I (Kannada; b.10th century) A lot of controversy has loomed over the number of Nagavarmas in the history of Kannada literature. Despite that, the number of Nagavarmas cannot be decisively indicated.

According to the author of Karnataka kavicharite and several others, there were two Nagavarmas: Nagavarma-I, author of Chandombudhi and Karnataka kadambari; Nagavarma-II, author of Kavyavalokana, Karnataka bhashabhushana, Vastukosha and Vardhamanapurana. Though many are of the opinion that Nagavarma-I is the author of Chandombudhi and Karnataka kadambari, yet some hold the opinion that the authors of these two works are different individuals. The following account is based on the presumption that these two works are by the same author.

Chandombudhi gives the following account of Nagavarma; There was in Vengipalu a brahmin by name Vennamayya of the Kaundinya gotra, whose wife was Kaundikabbe. They had a son named Damamayya. He was married to Kundakabbe. Their first son was Vennamayya. His wife's name was Polakabbe. Nagavarma happened to be their son. It is learnt that Naki and Sayyadiyata were his other names. He also seems to have had several titles like Kavirajahamsa, Budhabjavanakalahamsa, Kandakandarpa, Negaltegoja (Master of reputation) etc. The following verses occurring in Chandombudhi, namely,

The king was Rakkasaganga; the teacher Ajitasena of repute; the chieftain who looked after with affection was Anna—will these make others envy? Was Naki born in the night?

“When the benefactor chieftain was Raya, stalwart among the heroes and the messenger at missions during wars, who showered on me praise immense, will not (men on) earth raise Naki to the skies through their praise.

indicate that Nagavarma lived during the period of Rakkasaganga, and was under the patronage of Raya, i.e., Chavundaraya; and his preceptor was Ajitasenadeva. But some hold that the above verses are interpolations. However, on the basis of internal evidence, we could assign him to C.990 (A.D). Nagavarma seems to have been a warrior of repute. Bhojaraja had even honoured him with the presentation of horses of the finest breed. It is also stated that he was a Shaiva brahmin.

Chandombudhi has so far been the first extant work in Kannada on prosody. It consists of six books. In the book he states that Uma was first instructed in the pingala (prosody) by Shiva, and the poet takes pride in imparting it to his wife. The six books respectively deal with the following subjects: Samjna prakarana (noun), Samavrtta vivarana (description of the even quatrains), Ardhasamavrtta (un-even quatrains), Matra and matrangana chhandā (lengths of utterances and metres in Kannada) and the Satpratayayas (the six types of metrical calculations). Nagavarma seems to have relied upon several works on prosody in Sanskrit and also epics in Sanskrit and the vernaculars for his delineation of the subject matter. In the description of Karnataka vishaya jati vritta (prosodical forms exclusive to Kannada) along with enunciations and citations Chandombudhi provides very important and fundamental information. Rhetoricians appearing in Kannada and Telugu since then have made proper use of the details available in Nagavarma. In a word it could be stated that Chandombudhi occupies an important place in the history of Kannada prosody from several points of view.

Nagavarma owes his eternal reputation to the Karnataka kadambari, a rendering into Kannada of the famous prose epic Kadambari by Bana Bhatta in Sanskrit. It is in the champu style and is divided into two parts. In the history of Sanskrit literature, while Kalidasa occupies the foremost position in relation to epic poems in the form of poetry, Bana Bhatta claims the same honour in respect of prose-epics. The statement that "the whole universe is just what is tasted and left out by Bana" ("Banochchhistam jagat sarvam") has almost become a proverb. The credit of bringing into Kannada a celebrated epic in Sanskrit for the first time goes to Nagavarma.

The original epic in Sanskrit is divided into two parts; the former half, composed by Bana; and the latter half composed by Bhushana, his son. Like-wise the Kannada version is also divided into two parts, although the entire version is by the same author.

Though Nagavarma states that his work is a rendering of the Sanskrit epic into Kannada, the very first impression that one gains is that it is not a literal translation of the original. It would therefore be proper to state that it is a recreation in Kannada. This work has been rendered into Kannada in the champu style without losing the charm of the original in Sanskrit. Nagavarma was able to perceive poetry in the prose of Bana, and render it into Kannada in the form of poetry. The genius he has displayed in this behalf seems to be unparalleled.

He has not effected any change in the plot of the original. But he has in several places, particularly in the descriptive portions, amplified the original; uninteresting and unnecessary descriptions have been abridged and paraphrased; and some have been totally left out. It is true that his inadvertence or complacency has given room to a few minor flaws. However, it is to his credit that he has, using his sense of discretion, suitably abridged the original with a few necessary changes of a very little importance, but taking care all the while to see that the plot is neither changed nor deformed in any manner. In spite of its being a translation, it creates an impression that it is a work originally composed in Kannada. Nagavarma has through this version, indicated the equipment and talent one must possess for the successful rendering of a work from Sanskrit.

NAGAVARMA II (Kannada; b. 11th century) was a poet who most probably was a contemporary of Kalyana Chalukya King Jayasimha II (1015-42) who was a renowned Jain poet and scholar of Kannada literature. From what Janna (1209) said, it would appear that this meritorious poet of many-faceted scholarship had been appointed as the 'Katakopadhyaya', the poet-laureate at the court of Jayasimha.

Nagavarma's Vardhamana-purana has recently been discovered. The story of Vardhamana, the 24th tirthankara, which was briefly narrated as a part of Trishashtilakshana-mahapurana by Chavundaraya (978) is, now found for the first time as an independent and full-fledged poem in 'champu' style, spread over sixteen chapters. It follows the usual tradition and style of ancient Kannada poets like Pampa (941) and his successors of repute. Their impact is also visible. As the work employs a variety of rare and uncommon metres, and as its introductory portion records some unnoticed and significant material pertaining to old Kannada literature, it has an important place in the language.

Nagavarma's works on various scientific subjects are of greater significance. His Kavyavalokana is a standard Kannada work on poetics. It is the only comprehensive work in Kannada, that deals more or less fully with almost every subject relating to poetical composition. The 'sutras' are in 'kanda' verse; and they are copiously illustrated by stanzas which are mostly quotations from former or contemporary Kannada poets. The work is divided into five 'adhikaranas', each being again subdivided into 'prakaranas'. The first adhikarana, namely 'shabdas-mriti', is devoted to the brief exposition of the Kannada grammar. It is the earliest work on the subject. The technique and the system of the Sanskrit grammars are closely followed here. The other adhikaranas are 'kavyamala-vyavrtti', 'gunaviveka', 'ritikrama' 'rasa nirupana', 'kavisamaya' respectively and they deal with faults in composition, merit of composition, styles and lastly poetical conventions. The poet has followed some of the ancient writers like Bhamaha, Dandi, Vamana, Rudrata as the occasion require. In spite of several such borrowings, Nagavarma has recorded a few of his own reflections. According to R. Narasimhachar, "A large portion of the work bears the impress of the authors originality, while the arrangement and mode of treatment of the subjects are all his own". Both in treatment of subject and illustrative verses cited, the refined taste and the critical judgement of this scholar poet are very well exhibited. His work Kavyavalokana is verily the golden-treasury of the old Kannada literature. It is one of the source books for the study of the history of Chalukyas as also of other dynasties who preceded them.

Abhidhara vastukosha (1933) is a Sanskrit lexicon written in Kannada by Nagavarma in 3 kandas, namely, 'avibhinnaartha kanda', 'samanya kanda' and 'nanartha kanda', In its compilation the author says that he has made use of Vararuchi, Shashvata, Amarasimha and other authorities. Among them, Halayudha, (96) the author of Abhidhana ratnamala (1940), has received greater attention.

Chhandovichiti of the same author, evidently a work on prosody, has not come down to us.

Karnataka bhashabhushana, also by the same author, is a work on Kannada grammar. This work is in Sanskrit sutras, each sutra being accompanied by a vritti, also in Sanskrit and with illustrative examples. The subject treated in its ten parichchhdas respectively are terminology, euphonic combination, declension, uses of the cases, forms of pronouns and other words, compounds, derivatives, verbs, indeclinables and particles. In all probability the work is modelled on 'Sarvavarma's Katantra grammar. It may be remembered here that the author is described actually as 'Abhinava Sarvavarma'.

NAGENDRA (Hindi; b. 1915) is one of the most eminent critics, born at Atrauli, district Aligarh (Uttar Pradesh). He was educated at St John's College, Agra, from where he took his M.A. in English. He moved to Delhi and taught English for ten years at Sri Ram College of Commerce. Meanwhile, he did his M.A. in Hindi. His Riti kavya ki bhumika, earned him the degree of D. Litt. in 1946 from Agra University. After a brief stint at the All India Radio, he joined Delhi University in 1952 and shaped its Hindi department as a dynamic centre of higher studies and research.

Nagendra's first critical essay was on 'Chhayavad', published in Hansa in 1937, which was followed by a number of critical articles both theoretical and applied. The influence of Freud is apparent in many of these pieces, but there is a shift towards theoretical criticism also where he shows the influence of both Indian poetics (particularly the 'Rasa theory') and Western theorists like I.A. Richards, but he soon assimilated these influences and made them part of his own deep reading and creative thinking.

Nagendra writes with a deep sense of responsibility and commitment to his role as a critic, and discreetly by-passes all polemics. His approach is predominantly subjective which cautiously avoids a socio-historic interpretation. His evaluation of a writer is, therefore, based on an analysis of aesthetic experience. His choice of subjects is vast and varied both in expanse of time and in terms of genres. He has written on writers of all the periods and covered almost all genres in prose and poetry, but he has relatively written more on modern literature. His expertise in theoretical analysis has lent depth and seriousness to his criticism. The academic discipline which is so obvious in his writings makes for strict relevance and clarity in his critical analysis and interpretation.

Nagendra's literary sensibility is very much in tune with his age. The emphasis on the writer's self which is typical of the 'Chayavad' school of poetry is also apparent in him. For him literature is self-expression. This elevation of the self not only explains his subjective interpretation of the 'Rasa' theory, but also accounts for his consistent emphasis on the importance of emotion in literary activity as a whole.

His main concern as a critic, however, has been to establish a universal theory of literature through his prefaces to translations of almost all important theoretical treatises of Sanskrit as well as Western Poetics. His contribution in this field is remarkable because he offers not only a comparative study of theories but also underlines the common meeting-ground of the two systems. Besides this large body of theoretical criticism, he has edited a number of volumes in English also on important Hindi authors and trends in Hindi literature, such as Tulsidas, Surdas, Premchand, Novel. Among his important works are Sumitranandan Pant (1938), Saket: ek adhyayan (1940), Riti kavya ki bhumika aur Dev aur unki kavita (1950), Bharatiya kavya shastra ki bhumika (2nd ed. 1963), Ras siddhanta (1964), Nai samiksha naye sandarbha (1970), Bharatiya saundarya shastra ki bhumika (1974), Kavya bimb (1976), Shaili-vigyan (1976) and Mithak aur sahitya (1979).

NAGESH (Marathi, 17th century) is also known as Nagakavi, Nagajoshi, Nagendra and Nagesha Joshi Bhingarakar. Nagesh belonged to the first half of 17th century. He lived at Bhingar in Maharashtra. His traditional occupation was 'Gramajoshi'. He was a learned scholar in Sanskrit. He had studied prosody and rhetorics, and especially books on erotica. He had a good collection of rare books. He was a good artist himself. He handled the medium of words in his poetry with as much case as he handled the medium of colours and lines for his pictures. The characterisation in his poetry is particularly remarkable. He got interested in 'chitrakavya'. As against the then prevailing Marathi literary trend, he used humour in his writing.

Nagesh's available works are: Chandravalivarnana, Sitaswayamwar, Rukminiswayamvara, Rasamanjari, Sharadavinoda, Aryatika. The first two are available in printed form. Chandravalivarnana consists of 322 shlokas and are very popular amongst Kirtanakaras and their audience.

Nagesh has used various metres in his poetry. He is much fascinated by the experiments with words and rhyme patterns. Despite his provoking descriptions, lack of the unity of time and disregard for historical truths his poetry is attractive due to imaginative flavour and emotion, and depiction of 'rasas' with magnificent descriptions.

NAGESWARA RAO K.-NAGRANI B.H.

NAGESWARA RAO KASINATHUNI, (Telugu; b. 1862, d. 1938) was a great leader of Andhra and a freedom fighter. After leaving Christian College, Madras, he went to Bombay to try his luck there and discovered the wonder-drug 'Amritanjan' which made him a millionaire. Swept away by the winds of nationalism and patriotism, he founded the Andhra Patrika (weekly, 1908) to serve the needs of Telugu people. He shifted to Madras in 1914 and plunged into national politics; was arrested during the days of salt satyagraha. He had been a member of A.I.C.C. for twelve years. He promoted theatre arts and founded the prestigious literary monthly Bharati (1924). An architect of Andhra Rastra, he is known for his unparalleled charities, unquenchable thirst for knowledge and a truly religious mind. The people of Andhra loved him dearly and conferred the titles 'Deshoddharaka' and 'Visvadata' on him.

NAGIGOWDA H.L. (Kannada, b. 1917) was born in Heraganahalli in Karnataka. After studying in Heraganahalli, Channarege Pattana and Bangalore, he took his B.Sc. from Mysore University and Bachelor of Law from Poona University. He started his career at the Munsiff Court at Narasimhareja Pur. In 1941 he became a Revenue probationer. Then he served the government as Tahsildar, Asst. Commissioner, District Development Officer, Under Secretary, Deputy Commissioner and Sub-Division Officer, Managing Director of Bhadravat Iron works, Labour Commissioner and Member of the Public Service Commission. At present he is the President of Karnataka Folklore Akademy.

He began his literary career with the abridged translation of Scott's Kenilworth (1924). He has also translated Travels of Marco Polo (1956), Tribal World of Varrier Elwin (1967) and F.B. Thorber's Coffee from plantation to cup. His monumental translation work is Pravasi kanda India (India as seen by the travellers) in six volumes 1964, 1966, 1969, 1972, 1974 and 1977. He has also written a biography of Sarojini Devi (1959).

His contribution to folklore needs special mention Sobane Chickamma Padagalu (1972) and Padavave namma yedeyalli (1976) are collections of folk-songs. Karnatakada janapada kathagalu (Folk-tales of Karnataka, 1977) is a collection of folk tales.

He has published 2 collections of poems: Kathavyathe (Collection of long poems, 1971) and Nanaguve Gijagana hakki. He wrote Nannooru (My village, 1968) which depicts in detail the various professions, customs, manners, dresses and rituals of a village community. It is a faithful record of a life style which has now disappeared.

His most famous work is Doddamane (The big home, 1972). It is a regional novel depicting the story of three generations in a rural family. His third novel Sonneyinda Sonnege (From nothing to nothing, 1975) and his latest novel Bhumi gilida gandharva (1980) are based on the life of a musician, called Kempegowda.

NAGRANI, BHOJRAJ HOTCHAND (Sindhi; b.1903, d.1984) was born at Hyderabad (Sindh), a city of learning, in a family having a high educational background. His ancestors had lived in the historic city of Shikarpur, in the upper Sindh region, but his father had moved to Hyderabad and taken to the noble profession of education.

Nothing much is known about his early life, except that he completed his matriculation at Hyderabad, and for his higher studies he shifted to Karachi and did his graduation in Sindhi literature with honours from the University of Bombay. Following the foot-steps of his father, he also entered the same profession by accepting the post of a lecturer in Sindhi in the Chellasingh Sitaldas College at Shikarpur, his ancestral home-town.

Having been disillusioned by the transitoriness of life, he wanted to retire to the Himalayas and practice 'Brahamcharya' and realise spirituality. He did wander in the company of another idealist friend, Dharamdas Kshatriya, for sometime in the mountains. But after seeing there the 'Sanyasins' immersed in the narcotics, they were shocked and they returned with a vow to live a celibate life and serve their people. They remained true to their solemn vow, remained celibates all their life and served the community dedicatedly in different roles.

In those early days in pursuit of the ideal of 'Brahamcharya', Nagrani had written a book in collaboration with his friend Dharamdas on the same subject and entitled it the same way. In his later life, Nagrani had shown keen interest in the academic field and plunged into the literary controversies that were raging in the thirties and early forties in Sindh. He also contributed to the magazines and college periodicals the articles on subjects of moral import meant for shaping the life of the young people to high traditional ideals.

After migrating to India, he continued his activities and helped thousands of refugees in Bombay and Ulhasnagar in their rehabilitation.

For his livelihood he joined Rishi Dayaram Gidumal National College, Bombay, as Head of the Sindhi Department and remained in that office till his retirement in April 1968. He was a crusader for every good cause and associated himself with many burning problems in the early stages of post-partition period. He made a big contribution in mobilising public opinion and building up movement for the recognition of the Sindhi language and its inclusion in VIII schedule of the Indian Constitution as one of the Indian languages.

NAGWANI, NARAYAN 'SHYAM'-NAHAL, CHAMAN

Similarly, Nagrani campaigned for the introduction of the Sindhi language for post-graduate studies in the Bombay University and succeeded in his mission. Homeopathy was his great hobby, and he practised it for over 50 years, serving the needy either free of charge or with just token charges for the medicine.

The greatest contribution of Nagrani is his monumental three-volume work, the compilation of the poetry of great saint poet, Sami, one among the trio of the great classical poets of Sindhi. His original creative contribution to the compilation, entitled Samia ja saloka, is his evaluation of and commentary on the poetry of the great poet. It is a land-mark which wins for Bhojraj a permanent place in the history of Sindhi literature.

NAGWANI, NARAYAN 'SHYAM' (Sindhi; b.1922, d.1988) has to his credit eight collections of poems which include, besides characteristic Sindhi classical forms like 'doho', 'soratho' 'vai' and 'byat', the Persian forms of 'ghazal', 'nazm' and 'rubai' and Hindi 'geet'. He also experimented with the classical forms like French Villanelle, English Sonnet and Japanese Haiku.

Narayan Shyam was born in village Khahi Qasim in central Sindh, and had his schooling at different towns where his father, a Revenue Officer, was periodically posted. He did his B.A. (Hons.) in Persian from the University of Bombay in 1945, and joined service as a teacher at Naushahro, a taluka town in central Sindh. After the partition of the country, he moved to Delhi where he joined the central government service.

Shyam started his literary career way back in 1939 when his first ghazal was published in a local magazine at Karachi. In the beginning he composed poems on erotic themes like 'Gul-o-bulbul', 'Saghar-o-mina', etc., after the fashion of the day. But soon he changed over to writing in a romantic mode with pure and simple love for nature. This trend is reflected in his poems compiled in Roshan chhanvaro (Bright umbrage, 1962) and Maak bhina raabela (Jasmines moistened by dew, 1964). The latter collection entirely deals with the love and play of nature. His earlier collection Pankhiryun (Petals, 1955) containing one hundred rubais (Quatrains) and a 'khand-kavya' (semi-epic) entitled 'Rupmaya' (Play of beauty), in sonnet form. The poem is suffused with 'shrinagar' sentiment. It lyrically presents the message of a love-lorn 'nayak' to his 'nayika' through the description of her body, picking up images from the surrounding nature and deals with the pleasures of love-making in that season.

Shyam revelled in this trend for quite a number of years, and a bulk of his poetry represents that trend. With the publication of the collection of his poems Varia bharyo palandu (Skirt full of sand, 1968) he seems to have changed over to the depiction of the hard realities of life in his poems. The collection won the Sahitya Akademi award for 1970. This collection was followed by another, Aachhinde l'aj'a maran (Shy of offering, 1972), which clearly indicates his change over to a new trend.

Narayan Shyam is a master-poet, and he occupies an unequalled place among the Sindhi poets in India and Pakistan.

His other works include Maak phura (Dew drops, 1953) in co-authorship with Hari Dilgir; Ranga rati lahira (1953); Band, lahirun an samund (The dam, the waves and the sea, 1987) and D'ati ain hayati (A divine gift and life, 1988).

NAHAL, CHAMAN (English; b.1927). is a novelist, academic, editor and commentator. Nahal was educated at Murray College, Sialkot, and Hindu College, Delhi. He did his M.A. (English) from Delhi University and received a British Council Scholarship in Humanities (1959-61) for higher studies at the University of Nottingham from where he obtained his ph.D. He was a senior Fullbright scholar at Princeton University, U.S.A. from 1967 to 1970. He has been long teaching English at Delhi University where he is a professor now. He has also taught at Lake Island College, U.S.A., and in the Universities of Japan and Malaysia. His novels include My True Faces (1972), Azadi (1975), Into Other Dawn (1977), The English Queens (1979) and The Crown and the Loin Cloth (1981). He has also been editing a journal, The Humanities Review. He has brought out a collection of short stories too, The Weird Dance (1965). His two critical works are D.H. Lawrence: Eastern View (1970) and The Narrative Pattern in the works of Hemingway. His other works are A Conversation with J. Krishnamurthy and Drugs and the other self.

Nahal is chiefly a historical novelist. Most of his works written against the backdrop of the pre-Independence, Independence and post-Independence eras present intense human studies in characters and situations. He is an affirmationist who affirms the values of life, hope, faith and universal love. He views the changing epoch from the point of view of a humanist. Azadi won him the Sahitya Akademi award for 1977. The British Queens won the Federation of Publishers prize. His critiques of Lawrence and Hemingway are also penetrating studies.

NAHATA AGARCHAND-NAIDU, SAROJINI

NAHATA AGARCHAND (Rajasthani; b.1911, d.1983), was born at Bikaner and died there. He was known widely for his intimate knowledge of ancient Indian texts, especially those of the Jain faith. His vast collection of books known as 'Abhaya Jain Granthalaya', comprising some sixty thousand manuscripts, is almost a centre of pilgrimage for research scholars. He had an astonishing memory and could recall at once hundreds of references. He had travelled far and wide throughout the country, visiting libraries and prying into catalogues and manuscripts. He was an eloquent speaker and a voluminous writer. Besides contributing hundreds of articles to magazines, journals and books, he edited a number of old texts. He was also an archaeologist and had a good collection of antiques including paintings, inscriptions, coins and other objects. Amongst his published works the following deserve special mention:

Rajasthan mein hastalikhit granthon ki khoj, part 2-4 (1948); Jaswant udyot (1949); Dharmavardhan granthavali (1960); Samaya sunder krti kusumanjali (1960); Pirdan-lalas granthavali (1960); Jinharsa granthavali (1960); Prachin kavyon ki rup parampara (1964); Sabha shringar; Maru Gurjar kavi aur unki rachanayen; Aitihasik Jain kavya sangraha; Important works in collaboration: Gyan-sagar granthavali, Bikaner Jain lekha-sangraha, Sitaram chaupai, Bisaldev raso, Prachin gurjar rasa sanchaya, etc.

The list of publications is, indeed, too exhaustive to be reproduced here. He was honoured time and again, receiving several gold medals, copper plates, titles, etc. The Prime Minister of India, Shrimati Indira Gandhi, presented the felicitation volume, namely Agarchand Nahata abhinandan granth, to him, while the Vice President of India, Shri B.D. Jatti, honoured him at another special function.

NAHUSH (Hindi) has been regarded as the first play in Hindi by Gopal Chandra, better known as poet Giridhar-das, father of Bhartendu Harishchandra. The play is based on the mythological character of Nahush, the grandson of Pururava. It was written in 1814, and published in the first volume of Kavi vachansudha, later included in Poddar Abhinandan Granth (1953). Bhartendu regarded it as the first play of Hindi on the basis of dramaturgy and stagecraft. Mishrabandhus also supported this view, though other critics regard Anand Raghunandan as the first Hindi drama. Prior to Nahush, plays were written in verse, but they did not follow the rules of dramaturgy. As for style and form, there is not much difference between Nahush and Anand Raghunandan, but in the former we find a blending of Indian and Western dramatics. It is the first play that gives stage directions and does not end with 'Bharat Vakya'.

NAIDU, SAROJINI (English, b. 1879, d.1949). Daughter of a Bengali educationist settled in the former princely state of Hyderabad, Sarojini Naidu was a precocious child and started writing poetry at a very early age. Sailing to England when sixteen, she studied at London and Cambridge for three years. Here her poetic talent developed under the influence of the Rhymers' Club and the encouragement given by Arthur Symonds and Edmund Gosse, who advised her "to be a genuine Indian poet of the Deccan, not a clever, machine-made imitator of English classics." On her return to India in 1898, she married Govindarajulu Naidu, an intercaste and inter-provincial love-marriage which met with initial opposition from her parents. Her first volume of poetry, The Golden Threshold (1905) was followed by The Bird of Time (1912) and The Broken Wing (1917). Meanwhile, social reform and freedom movement began claiming her energies. Now she wrote poetry only sporadically, mainly because of her involvement in the struggle for freedom as an acknowledged leader. Her collected poems appeared under the title, The Sceptred Flute, in 1946. The Feather of the Dawn, a collection of lyrics written in 1927, was published posthumously in 1961.

Sarojini Naidu is essentially a lyric poet. Her art has been strongly influenced both by British romanticism especially of the fin-de-siecle school, and by Persian and Urdu poetic modes. Her major concerns are the elemental subjects of all lyrical verse—love, nature, life and death, while the folk-themes and religious mythology are other recurrent motifs. Her love-lyrics, of which the sequence entitled The Temple is the crown, reveal several faces of Eros, including the agony and the ecstasy of love, the pathos of separation, the tragedy of frustration, and the joy of complete self-surrender. Her nature-poetry shows her zestful and uninhibited joy in beauty, especially of Spring, her favourite season. Like the romantics, she regards nature as a refuge from the cares of human life, though, unlike Wordsworth, she is hardly a Nature-mystic. Nor is she capable of the Keatsian sensuous apprehension of Nature, though she does skilfully evoke the tropical magnificence of the Indian scene. In her full-throated celebration of Love and Nature, she is also conscious of the omnipresence of sorrow and death in life, but her mystic faith in the immortality of the soul consoles her. Her songs about the traditional occupations, festivals and experiences of the Indian folk possess an unmistakable authenticity, and the religious myths and historical legends she sings of are characteristically drawn from both Hindu and Muslim sources. Among the least successful of her lyrics are the political and occasional verses in which poetry mostly yields to rhetoric.

Sarojini Naidu's finest lyrics have a neat structure and an exquisite finish, and she handles various metres and stanza-forms with equal ease. Of all the Indo-English poets she has perhaps the finest ear, and her mastery of word-music is beyond question. While her diction and imagery often run along conventional romantic grooves, her evocative use of images drawn from the Indian scene makes for unmistakable freshness. Her poetic output is rather too meagre for a major poet, and the reasons which virtually brought her poetic career to an untimely end are shrouded in a mystery. Perhaps giving to politics what could have gone to poetry, she failed to grow and develop as an artist. Her work, at its worst, suffers from sentimentality and vagueness, a cloying sweetness and a lack of intellectual fibre. This is probably because a committed romantic, she denied herself all-sided self-expression. This explains the curious fact that though she possessed a sharp wit, she did not allow it to function in her poetry. By the standards of modern poetic taste, her work appears outdated; nevertheless, it remains both historically significant and intrinsically important. By winning recognition in England, she brought prestige to Indo-English writing much before Tagore received the Nobel Prize; and her best poetry is not just a faded Indian echo of the feeble voice of decadent romanticism, but an authentic Indo-English lyric cry exquisitely tuned to the composite Indian cultural ethos, bringing home to the unbiased reader all the opulence, pageantry and charm of traditional Indian life.

M.K.N.

NAIK, PUNDALIK NARAYAN (Konkani; b.1952) has been a poet, story writer, novelist and playwright. He passed the S.S.C. examination of the Poona Education Board and studied up to B.A. Part I. He taught Hindi, Marathi and Konkani at Santacruz High School, Goa (1974-1980). He was Assistant Editor (scripts) at All India Radio, Panaji (1980-1984). Presently he runs a printing press and devotes most of his time to writing. He won first prize for short stories in Konkani in competitions organized by Rashtramrat, Margao, for three consecutive years (1972, 1973 and 1974). He won prizes for short stories in Marathi in competitions organized by Gomantak, Panaji and Navayug, Bombay (1972 and 1973 respectively). He was given first prizes for short story and one-act play also by All India Radio, Panjim in 1973 and 1975 respectively. Bansundari (Forest fairy 1974), an opera for children, was his first book to be published. Ganvdhani Ganvkar

(Villager, the village boss, 1975), a collection of one-act plays, bears ample testimony to the author's potentialities as a playwright. Ga ami rakhne (After all shepherds we are, 1976), a collection of poems had special appeal for its readers for its spirit of revolt, compassion for the oppressed masses and socialistic overtones and boldness of idiom. Bambar (The muck 1976), a novelette, is certainly something par excellence in Konkani literature; the spate of criticism the book invited for its bold contents and style still remains unprecedented. Pishantar (The crazy 1977) and Muthay (Bunch of corn 1977) reveal Pundalik Naik at his best as a short story writer of outstanding merit. Achhev (Havoc 1977), the Kala Academy Award winner, is a full-fledged powerful novel depicting life in a Goan village set against the background of impending mining industry which brings about moral and social degeneration of traditional values. His full-length plays are Khon khan mati (Go on digging the earth 1977) which won the best play Award of the Konkani Bhasha Mandal and the Kala Academy, Raktakhev (Bloodbath 1978, KBM award), Rakhan (Protection 1979, Konkani Bhasha Mandal Award), Muktatay (Freedom, 1980, K.B.M. award), Shabai shabai bhoujansamaj (Three cheers to the masses, 1981), Suring (Blast, 1982), Chaurang (One act plays, 1982, Sahitya Akademi Award for 1984). The last volume includes 'Marnnakotto' (Bank of death) which won the All India Akashwani Award for the best play produced by the Panaji station of AIR in 1980.

NAIK, RAMCHANDRA NARAYAN (Konkani; b.1901, d.1982), was a prominent Konkani writer. He went to Bombay at the age of 12 and had his education there. He did his B.A. (philosophy) from Bombay University in 1926. He was a teacher at the Ram Mohan High School, Bombay for 18 years. He worked in Gandhiji's Sabarmati Ashram for two years and taught the Harijans there. Later, he joined a school as teacher at Khar, Bombay, where he remained until his retirement as its Headmaster. He ran an orphanage at Vile Parle (Bombay) for some time and also worked for the Adivasi Sangha. He had a philosophical bent of mind and studied authors like Tolstoy, Gandhi, Gibran, Tagore, etc., some of whose writings he translated into Konkani. He compiled idioms from other languages in Konkani and was also working on childrens' literature. Most of his writing lies scattered in periodicals and magazines. His published works: Dev ani Manis (God and the Man, 1980) is a monograph on the Father of Konkani literature published by Sahitya Akademi in the series 'Makers of Indian Literature'. This book won the Konkani Bhasha Mandal Goa Award; Gitanjali (1983, published posthumously) is an excellent translation of Tagore's classic into Konkani.

NAIR, C. SANKUNNY-NAIR, M.T. VASUDEVAN

NAIR, C.SANKUNNY (Malayalam; b.1894, d.1942), is one of the first critics in Malayalam literature. After passing the Vidwan examination he became a teacher at the Sanskrit College in his native place, Pattambi. He also worked for a time at Loyola College, Madras, and in the Malayalam department of the Government of Madras. He was the editor of the magazines, Swarat and Arunodayam.

His important works are Upanyasangal (Essays), Rani Mallika (novel) and four collections of stories, viz, Urmila (a translation), Swarnapanjaram, Kathakalika and Mahatvavaibhavam. Upanyasangal (1964) contains the critical essays and articles contributed by him to the journals, Bhashaposhini and Atmaposhini. It is divided into two parts, the first part containing essays on literature and the second those on science and humanities.

T.R.R.N.

NAIR, M.R. (Malayalam; b.1903, d.1943). Manikkoth Ramunni Nair (born at Tellicherry and son of Matavil Kunhiraman Vydier and Manikkoth Paru Amma) is a great name in modern Malayalam satire. He was popularly known by his pen-name 'Sanjayan'. Educated at Tellicherry, Palghat and Madras he took his B.A. (Hons.) degree in English literature in 1927. He knew French and German also. For some time he was a clerk in the Huzur office, Calicut. Later he joined the Malabar Christian College as lecturer. He died of tuberculosis at the age of 46.

Sanjayan was a scholar, but it was as the editor of the humorous journal of the same name that he made literary history. He was a poet and essayist as well. His writings in prose and verse published in journals like Sanjayan, Keralapatrika, Kavanakaumudi, Sahitya chandrika, Vishwaroopam, etc. were interesting to all kinds of readers.

Within the short period of his life Sanjayan had to suffer a great deal, including the untimely deaths of his father, brother, wife, and only son. Further, he had to hide his own disease from his mother. Thereupon he found in humour a weapon to face all these maladies. What tickled him most were contemporary problems, and parody and satire were his forte. Thus the rationalist, the Calicut municipality and mystic poetry-all were grist to the mill of his satirical genius. In the following lines he explains his idea of satire:

Scolding only is not satire
None shall forget it and ever.
To the new rose plant of satire,
Laughter is the flower and scolding is the thorn.

There was no malice in Sanjayan's writings. Though they were extremely trenchant and at times even devastating, they were aimed at only men's weaknesses and evils, never at the men themselves.

Sanjayan's humorous writings in prose have been published in six parts under the title Sanjayan in 1945, 1947, 1949, 1965 and 1966 respectively. There are about five hundred light essays in them. 'Sanjayopakhyanam' (The Sanjayan episode), 'Mahakavi' (The poet laureate), 'Conference', 'Changalamparanta Tagore' (Tagore of Changalamparanta), 'Lokavasanam' (The end of the world), 'Shunakagitam' (The dog's song) and 'Ko. mu. vilapam' (Lament of Kozhikode municipality) are examples of his painless pricks.

Anti jopaharam (1950) is a collection of his satirical poems. Irritated by hearing the singing of the National Anthem on unnecessary occasions Sanjayan wrote the following parody:

Jana ganatala adhinayaka jayahe
Vanchitha vanchi Vidhata
Punjab, Cochi, Malabar, Maratha
Dravida, Kannada, Vanga
Sahyamahachala Arabisamudra
Parayati takriti taranga.

Sanjayan's humour was quite biting. he was something of a crusader who criticised the foibles that came to his notice from the pedestal of a social reformer. He based his writings on events of topical interest, and hence they are not calculated to appeal to the succeeding generations as much as they did to his. But that would not dim his fame, his genius is too powerful to succumb to the passage of time. The like of him who waged a relentless war against humbugs of all kinds is indeed rare in literature.

Hasyanjali (1950) is a collection of his parodies, Karnabhushanam (Parody of Karnabhooshanam of Ulloor), Kunhimatha (parody of Kochusita of Vallattol) and Mohitan (Parody of Mohini of Changampuzha).

Sanjayan's scholarly studies on men of letters and literary topics have been published under the title Sahitya-anikasham in two volumes in 1949. Critical essays are included in the first volume and the second volume contains studies on humour in literature. Sanjayan has also translated Shakespeare's Othello into Malayalam.

NAIR, M.T. VASUDEVAN (Malayalam; b.1933) or 'M.T' as he is popularly known, is a popular short story writer, novelist and screen-play-wright. He was born in Kudallur in Ponnai taluk of Central Kerala. After completing his education, M.T. worked for sometime as a teacher. Later he joined the Matrubhumi weekly and subsequently became its editor. He resigned from Mathrubhumi in 1981.

NAISHADHACHARITA-NAKAR

M.T is a prolific writer with several novels and short stories to his credit. His novels include Nalukettu (1958), Patiravum pakalvelichchavum (1959), Arabipponnu (written in collaboration with N.P. Muhammed, 1960), Asura vittu (1962), Manju (1964), Kalam (1969). His short stories have been collected in several books. Some of them are Veyilum nilavum (1954), Vedanayute pukkall (1955), Olavum tiravum (1957), Kuttyedathy (1959), Nashtappetta divasangal (1960), Bandhanam (1963), Patanam (1966), Varikkuzhi (1967), Ajnatante uyaratta smarakam (1973), etc. Kathikante panippura is a collection of essays on the process of writing. Hemingway-oru mukhavura (Hemingway, an introduction, 1964) is a critical evaluation of Hemingway, the writer. Rantamuzham presents a survey of the Mahabharata, with Bhimasena as protagonist.

M.T. took to writing when the tempo of progressive writing was on the decline and naturalism with a soft touch of idealism (as embodied in the works of S.K. Pottekkatt and Uroob) got established. M.T is therefore poetic, realistic and progressive with a romantic modulation. Born in an ancient family, his experience of childhood was centred within that courtyard and he, as a novelist, is at his best while dealing with the social forces that upset feudalism and with the middle class people who were hit hard economically and culturally. The strife and conflict experienced in the household has repeatedly been his theme. The decline of such a household is interwoven with conjugal love as in Nalu-kettu (with the four walls) and with abnormal psychology as in Asura-vittu.

M.T. is a noted screen playwright also. Some of the films based on his screen plays have bagged awards at the state and national levels. His Nalukettu received the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award and Kalam received the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1970. Rantamuzham received the Vayalar Award.

P.N.K.

NAISHADHACHARITA (Sanskrit) or Naishadha in brief, is a Mahakavya of great repute in the realm of Sanskrit literature, composed by Harsha. It describes the story of Nala, the king of Nishadha and his love for Damayanti, the princess of Vidarbha. The extant work contains twenty two cantos, the story depicting Nala's message through the swan, the intrusion of the Dikpalas, the marriage after swayamvara and the sojourn of the lovers at the royal abode. The poem contains beautiful descriptions of nature and places and kings, but it does not include the whole life of Nala as the title suggests.

The story of Nala and Damayanti is very popular in India. Tradition has accorded to it a religious sanctity. The 'Nalopakhyana' or the episode of Nala occurs in the Mahabharata (Vana-Parva, Chapters 49-70), where the story has been related to Yudhisthira by Brihadashva.

In Naishadha, Harsha inaugurated a new model of poetic composition. His vocabulary is extensive, but the language sometimes lacks lucidity. Even a learned reader can rarely approach the poem with confidence.

The ideas, though at time far-fetched, are yet fine and true. In fancy and imagery his descriptions are unparalleled. Naishadham vidvadoushadam (Naishadha is a learned man's alchemy) is a proverbial expression.

There are many commentaries on the poem. M. Krishnammachariar gives a list of 33 commentaries of Naishadha including those of Chandupandita (15th c.), Pedubhatta (Grandson of Mallinatha) and Gandhara.

Shrinatha translated Naisadha into Telugu in the 15th century. It was translated into English by Krishnakant Sandikai. The Hindi translation was done by Guman Mishra (18th c.) and Rishinatha Bhatta (1949).

S.V.

NAJABAT (Punjabi). No biographical details of Najabat are available except that the Var of Nadir Shah he wrote refers to Nadir Shah's invasion of India in 1738. In Najabat's Var, the account ends with the battle of Karnal, and there is no mention of the occupation of Delhi by Nadir Shah and the slaughter of the people in the city.

Najabat's Var does not conform to the contents which this type of poetry normally has, for there is no hero in it. The poet has not made complimentary references even to Nadir Shah, the conqueror. In fact, he has ridiculed the Iranian soldiers whom he describes as:

Snub-nosed with heads large as pitchers and bellies like drums.

They murder real brothers for the sake of women.

Forts tremble before them, and water of the streams dries up.

They have swallowed like a nostrum

Iran, Turan and Ispahan.

The description is confined mainly to the fighting in the battle-field, though there is a reference to the empty boasts of Mohammad Shah, the derelict Mughal emperor of Delhi and condemnation of his minister, Nizam-ul-Mulk, who had treacherously invited the Iranian invader. The complete text of the Var is not available; only one thousand five hundred and one lines are available as collected by Edward Maclagan, who later became Governor of Punjab, and Hari Kishan Kaul of the Indian Civil Service.

NAKAR (Gujarati, 16th century). Though the dates of his birth and death are not known, from the dates of the composition of his first and last works, Harishchandrakhyana and Ramayan it can be inferred that his poetic career spans the period between 1516 and 1568. Successor of Bhalan and predecessor of Premanand, Nakar enjoys a central place among the 16th century narrative poets of Gujarat. Himself a vaishya, he composed narrative poems and offered them to Madansu, a brahmin to recite them in public and earn his bread. He possessed noble qualities of a true vaishnav and looked upon poetry almost as a religious activity.

He is the first poet to bring the Mahabharata into Gujarati through his adaptation of its nine parvas (cantos) in the form of Kadava-bandh, the most prominent being 'Aranyak Parva' and 'Virat Parva'. His poetic calibre is revealed in the sequence of situations adapted in his descriptive power, lively characterization and depiction of pathos. His unpublished adaptation of Valmiki's Ramayana is one of the most ambitious attempts at writing epic poetry in medieval Gujarati. Premanand has borrowed in his Ramayana some of his fancies and rhythmic patterns.

He is also the first poet to write narrative poems on the themes of Lavakusha, Mordhvja, Chandrahas, Sudhanva, Virvarma drawn from Jaimini's Ashvamedh. Some of these poems are still unpublished. Besides, he has composed six other narrative poems, 'Nalakhyan', 'Okha-haran', 'Sagalpuri' being the most outstanding.

His unpublished lyrical poems like 'Krishna-Vishti', 'Bhramar-gita', 'Bhavani-no-chhanda' and 'Soogatha-no-garbo' reveal his capacity for feeling, his command of an alien metrical pattern like 'ovi', and his wit and wisdom.

Some poems 'Shiv-Vivah', 'Dhruv-akhyan' and others are attributed to him, but their authorship is doubtful and their manuscripts are also not extant.

The well-knit structure of the 'Akhyan' which he accomplished through the links between two Kadavas known as 'valan' or 'uthalo' and his adaptations of the Mahabharat, the Ramayan and the Ashvamedh are his major contributions as a poet. He has carried on the tradition of Bhalan and handed it over to Premanand. He has delighted and inspired many generations of readers through his poems which uphold human values and he has indeed enriched Gujarati poetry by his lofty idealism and fine artistic sense.

C.T.

NAKHA-SHIKHA (Sanskrit—Ancient and Medieval). Beauty of the human body and particularly of a woman is a constant motif in ancient Sanskrit literature as evidenced in our epics and Puranas or mythological lore. The world of demigods like Yakshas, Apsarasas, Vidyadharas, Gandharvas, Kinnaras, Nagas, Siddhas and Kimpurushas is peopled by fairies, ever fresh in their youthful charm and grace, and accompanied by their mates. Love is the only aim of their lives. Then there is the kingdom of svarga or heaven whose lord is Indra and whose court is adorned by beves of celestial nymphs like Rambha and Menaka. The mythopoeic imagination of the Indians created a presiding deity of Kamadeva or Love-god with his spouse Rati, his General Vasanta or spring, and unfailing arrows of flowers like lotus and jasmine. Valmiki, the father of Indian poetic tradition, already uses these motifs in the depiction of the beauty of Sita in the Ramayana. The messenger describes Sita to Ravana in these words:

She is bathed in youthful charm and her limbs are well-proportioned. She is a gem of a woman and decked by gems. She is not a devi or gandharvi, not an apsara nor a Naga belle. How can anyone think of an equal to her among humans? (III. 31.29.30).

Next when we see Shurpanakha introducing Sita to Ravana, the stress is laid on the impeccable perfection of every limb or part of her beautiful person:

Her tresses are lovely and her nose so charming! Her thighs are beautiful and like the Beauty Queen of this woodland she reigns in splendour! (III. 34.15)
Her radiance is that of molten gold and her toenails are deep-red in hue and prominent. She is auspicious, with lovely curves and with a slender waist. Her lower region is wide as her bosoms are buxom. (Ibid. 19.20).

When he first sights Sita, Ravana himself compliments her for her incomparable charm in these words:

Are you the goddess of Bashfulness or Plenty or Fame or Beauty, or a celestial nymph or Love incarnate?
Your teeth are all even, well-tipped smooth and radiant!
Your wide and bright eyes have such lovely black pupils and a reddish sheen at the corners! Your body below the naval is wide, as well as plump; your thighs are like the elephant's trunk! Your breasts are well-formed, rotund, close and rising up; their tips are buxom and upturned, charming and sweet like two smooth palm-fruits, and enchanting as they are bedecked by glowing gems! You enthrall me by your smile and gait, your looks and charm, O damsel! (III.46.16-20).

Mythological imagery, comparison of each limb with a beautiful object in the world of Nature and graphic description reminding one of the pictorial art—all these three elements are fully present in Valmiki's epic itself. We also catch a glimpse of the two aspects of feminine beauty which were analysed later by the theoreticians, viz. over-all grace (samudaya-sobha) and the beauty of individual limbs (avayava-sobha); or as beauty innate and beauty superadded by ornaments. Vyasa's description of woman is illustrative of the former kind:

She is ever fresh, although she has discarded all ornaments! She seems as if smiling by her radiance, though she has no necklace! Her gait is stumbling as it were, although she is not drunk! She seems to be talking to the onlookers by her very looks, although she does not speak a word! (cited in Sarngadharapaddhati, No.3372)

NAKHA-SHIKHA

Kalidasa's Sakunatala too is of this type. But the gaudily ornamented type is seen in the fashionable city-women like Vasantasena, the heroine of Sudraka's celebrated drama, Mrichchakatika.

Both Sanskrit prosody and critical theory gave pride of place to the delineation of feminine beauty in literature from the earliest times. This is evident in Pingala's naming the various metrical measures after beautiful women—Sikharini, Sragdhara, Malini, etc.—and Bharata illustrating most of his figures of speech with verses devoted to feminine charm in the earlier text on poetics, viz. Natyashastra. The very first example given of 'simile of praise' is

Seeing that wide-eyed beauty the king was extremely delighted. His delight could be compared to that of the sages when they attained at long last the desired goal after great effort, since the woman was like the very embodiment of such siddhi of sages. (Ibid., XVI.48)

Bharata notes the following as an example of simile with but a partial likeness:

Here comes my beloved with a face like the full-orbed moon, with eyes like the petals of a dark lily and with a gait like that of an excited elephant! (Ibid. XVI.51)

Similarly, the example noted by Bharata of a metaphor relates to a description of feminine beauty:

The women at the lake were lotus-faced and lily-smiled; the full-blown dark lilies formed their eyes veritably; the sweet cackle of the swans constituted their conversation with each other!

Even the first illustration of end-rhyme (padantayamaka) offered by Bharata relates to a typical description of the sungod's orb likened to a dazzling damsel's comely breast:-

Dinaksayat samhrtarasmimandalam diviva lagnam tapaniyamandalam vibhati tamram divi suryamandalam yatha tarunyah stanabharamandalam/(Ibid., XVI.64)

(Tr. Oh, look! The red orb of the setting sun at the day's close with all rays withdrawn is shining like a ball of gold hung on heaven's canopy, as though it were the rotund shapely breast of a youthful maiden!)

In these examples we have a full glimpse of the Indian classical tradition of poets describing the beauty of women's handsome limbs comparing them with beautiful products of nature like flowers, creepers, birds and animals; and also describing the latter in comparison with the former. Nature is humanised and human nature is endowed with the divine quality found in different aspects of nature as revealed to an artist's eye.

All these trends reach their perfection in Kalidasa who sums up in himself all the best in his predecessors and becomes a model for all his successors in poetry as well as drama. In his Meghaduta, the wife of the yaksha in the city of Alaka is described in the words of Valmiki as a paragon of beauty:

Bubbling with youth, slim, with teeth so fine-tipped, with lips like red bimba fruits, slender-waisted with looks like that of a gazelle in fright, with a deep navel, and slow in gait because of her heavy hips, and slightly bent forward by the weight of her breasts—in a word, the very summit of beauty feminine ever fashioned by the Lord 'Creator' Meghaduta, II.22)

But there is the almost unnoticeable touch of refinement which is of the very essence of Kalidasa's art. This becomes even more clear in his portrait of Parvati in the Kumarasambhava. In fact, Mallinatha, the doyen of our commentators, recognises the passage (vv.3-48) as the first classical illustration of 'nakha-sikha' or 'Padadikeshnatas-varnana' formulated by the theorists. He observes that while the beauty of celestials is described beginning from the foot's toe and ending with the hair adorning the head, the reverse procedure is adopted in the case of humans according to the convention of the orthodox theorists (dharmikas). The reason implied is that the suppliant devotee is supposed to start his salutations from the feet and proceed to other limbs of the deity in an upward order; but there is no such question of devotion involved in regard to human beauty. The poet starts admiring her beauty from head downwards. Here are some extracts from the unsurpassed description of Parvati's beauty by Kalidasa:

Her body, symmetrically developed by fresh youth, became handsome in all parts like a painting touched up by a fresh brush.

By the lustre of the raised toe and nail she seemed to spurt out redness as she stepped along; and the feet themselves acquired the beauty of land-lilies

She learnt from the swans as it were the art of bending archly and taking graceful steps. In exchange, she has taught them too the music of her tinkling anklets!

Having exhausted all his stores of beauty in fashioning her shanks, the Creator had to strain himself further for moulding her other limbs!

Although partly comparable to her thighs, both the elephant-trunk and the plantain-stem failed to attain the status of proper similes, the former because of its hard skin and the latter because of its extreme coldness.

The lovely streaks of hair ending at her navel appear as if they are the pencils of light issuing upwards from the gem-pendant adorning the middle of her golden girdle!

The three folds on her mid-body were verily the three steps used by Cupid to mount the slope of her fresh youth!

The pair of her breasts, dark in the middle, were so pressing upon each other and so white that no space was left for even a lotus fibre to be put between them!

Her arms are far softer, I fancy, than the tender Shirisa flower; Otherwise how could Kama, even though defeated, turn them into nooses for ensnaring Shiva?

Her neck and pearl necklace adorning her comely breasts set off the beauty of each other so well that each in turn was the thing adorned and the means of adornment simultaneously! The goddess of wealth and beauty is indeed moving constantly, now to the moon and now to the lotus; when in the moon, she misses the loveliness of the lotus; and when in the lotus, she misses the glory of the moon. But when at last she shifted to the face of Parvatim she received the satisfaction of possessing the excellences of both!

If a flower could be encased in a tendril or a coral could contain a precious pearl, then it might have approximated somewhat to her smile shining with the radiance of her lips! When she speaks in a nectar-dripping voice, even the song of the cuckoo appears to the listener to strike a discordant note on the flute!

The large-eyed damsel's looks indeed are as tremulous as the dark lilies shaking in a strong breeze. Did she borrow them from fawns or did the fawns borrow them from her?

On seeing the beauty of her arch eye-brows as if painted with a pencil in dark paint, and replete with grace, the god of love gave up the boast that his own bow was most beautiful!

If one could imagine feelings like shame in insentient animals, one might fancy that the chamari deer would discard their pride on having such luscious and massive hair in their tails if they ever saw Parvati's hair

Thus it appears as though the Creator who desired to see in one place the summation of all part-beauties, each put in its proper place—all those things in Nature that could serve as ideal similes for the different limbs of the human body—created at last Parvati with great effort!

Herein indeed we have the delineation of 'nakh-sikh' in full form, comprising quite a number of limbs, out of the many left for medieval theoreticians to formulate so laboriously!

It was in the Kavyadarsha of Dandin, a protege of the Pallavas of Kanchi in the South (c.A.D. 7.00), that literary theory saw its most scientific and methodical formulation. So much so that it was soon translated into Kannada, Tamil and Simhalese. We have the authentic evidence of the Ceylonese Sanskrit poet Kumaradasa, his contemporary, to the glory of Kanchi as a literary centre. Dandin has provided for a large number of sub-varieties under his broad head of simile or upamalankara in his second chapter (v.v. 14-50). What deserves special notice here is the fact that all the thirtyfive illustrations given under the head of simile are devoted exclusively to description of feminine form, indicating thereby that this was as important a constituent in the repertory of a would-be poet even as eulogy of kings. Though the most ancient works on kavi-siksa are lost, what we actually have in Dandin is enough to highlight the importance of the subject of nakh-sikh description in all mahakavyas of court-epics. It was left to the medieval theoretician Keshava Mishra of Mithila (16th century A.D.) to give an elaborate list of each and every limb of a beautiful maiden that could be poetically described with an apt simile. In fact, it was Keshava Mishra's categorization as nakh-sikhanta-varnana under upamalankara that became the model for theorists in old Hindi and other Indian languages for their treatment of the subject. But this fact should not blind us to the great example set by Dandin first of all in this direction. As a specimen of Dandin's examples we may cite some:

1. The palm of your hands, O pretty maiden, is red like a water-lily. (Ibid.II.15)
2. Not in the splendour alone, but in the action of delighting also, thy face imitates the moon. (II.16)
3. If there were to be a kind of a lotus with upraised eyebrows and with eyes rolling in it, that might be admitted to bear the beauty of thy face. (II.24)
4. This row of gardens looking beautiful by reason of forests of sala trees is like a girl beaming with her face and flowing hair (II.29)
5. Thy face with its tremulous eyes and with the brilliance of the teeth shines as does a lotus with hovering bees and with filaments appearing into view. (II.44)

Even these few specimens are enough to show that the range of Dandin's simile was wide enough to include flights of fancy too; and the examples are rather stereotyped because it is a normative work on poetics and not a creative work. Most of them are descriptions of the face and not all limbs in any particular order.

Among the art-epic writers who were most influenced by Kalidasa, Kumaradasa comes foremost; and his Janaki-harana exemplifies the topic of strivarnana more than once. In the opening canto we have a description of Kausalaya and in the seventh of Sita at the time of her marriage with Rama. Anthologists have quoted often from the first:

. Kaushalya's gait resembles so much the movement of the swan or the intoxicated elephant that she may be easily charged for stealing it from either of them. To disprove this charge, she looks as if balancing the beauty of these two with her own gait by moving her knees and demonstrating that it is inherently her own, since she surpasses the other two (Janakiharana, I.28)

We might cite a few specimens from the description of Sita too:

When Sita comes to bow before Vishvamitra after the wedding, the stars seem to fall at her feet in the guise of the shining nails as if to pray to her thus: "Be kind, Oh Princess! Let not the splendour of your face bring so much disgrace to our Lord, the Moon! (Ibid., VII 7)

Having made her waist slender, the Creator thought that he was endangering the position of the heavy loins and therefore, gave the latter, the support of two pillars in the form of her thighs!

Her hands are so powerful in kindling passion in others that by contacting them even the angada (bracelet) turns into anangada (producer of lover). (VII.9)

Her long curved eyebrows resembled the two pieces of Cupid's bow that was broken in the middle by Shiva in his anger (VII 2)

These examples are enough to establish how there was an unbroken tradition among writers of art-epics in describing the feminine form minutely and making use of conceits and imaginative flights. But in this early period it had not become quite artificial as in the final phase of literary decadence, since the place assigned to it in a whole epic was but minor.

The peak of 'nakh-shikh' delineation, however, is reached in Sri Harsha's Naishadhiyacharita (12th century A.D.) which is as erudite as it is poetic. Here almost a whole canto of about a hundred verses comes to be devoted to a description of Damayanti's beauty. What is more, we have the poet's own statement to the effect that he was following the literary convention of describing his heroine from the head down to toe-nails:

"iti sa cikuradarabhyainam nakhavadhi varnayan" (Ibid.VII. 109). The movement towards 'difficult' poetry in Sanskrit had its beginnings in single cantos of Bharavi, Kumaradasa and Magha, but soon spread into whole works as in Bhatti. This phase of pedantry led to decadence and originality was replaced by ingenuity and scholarship. Sri Harsha who came on the crest of this new wave gave a kind of finality to forms of set description on the one hand and the heavily ornamented ways of expression on the other. With his unfailing flair for paranomasia and poetic assonance and twinning, he raised poetry at once to the level of a hard discipline and a happy playground for the delight and revelry of the learned. Though modern taste does not accord a high place to his poetic exercise, traditional Sanskrit scholars throughout the centuries have held Sri Harsha in the highest esteem and attempted hard to imitate his example. If the poetic convention of 'nakh-sikh' came to win universal recognition of generations of poets and theorists in India, it is primarily because the seal of authority was set upon it by no less a personage than Sri Harsha. Since it abounds in verbal beauties as much as high-flown fancies, Harsha's poetry is virtually untranslatable. However, a few select samples might be offered: Damayanti is seen through the eyes of Nala who has come to meet her with the message of gods on the eve of her svayamvara or selection of bridegroom:

The flood of nectar exuded by her moon-face brought about a tide exceeding the limits of the shore in the ocean of Nala's love. His eyes could then find support only in her high breasts! (Ibid., VII.4)

Did Nala's eyes get drowned in the nectar caused by her moon-face? Or did they get stuck between her two breasts? Or did they become afraid of a fall? Anyway, it took long for them to leave her slender waist! (VII.5)

All beautiful women fashioned by the Creator so far might be deemed his first drafts while learning the art, since he has attained perfection in the creation of Damayanti. The other creations of women to follow should be deemed as so many foils or failures by contrast to his singular success in Damayanti. (VII.15)

Her glances are so fast and fickle that they should have met each other behind the head before much movement. What has prevented it is the fear of the eyes that they might, on the way, slip and fall into the pit of the two ears! (VII.34)

The Creator has drawn three lines on her neck and apportioned space for the stay of the arts of poetry, music, sweet speech and truthfulness. Indeed, three lines can make for four spaces! (VII.67)

Finding that the species of lotuses is being made extinct by winter, the Creator is driven to Damyanti as it were to beg from her five limbs (one face, two hands, two feet) the seeds of that beauty before recreating lotuses! (VII.104)

In this connection one may mention the fact that even limits of decency were overstepped by the poet in his flair for parading his knowledge of treatises sexology and lines on the body etc..

That brings us to the last phase of erotic love poetry not only in Sanskrit but also in Indian languages like Hindi which were influenced by it from about 1500 to 1800 A.D. Besides the major influence surveyed already, two other tendencies which shaped the Indian literature of the time were the rise of Madhura-bhakti as a dominant motif of poetry centring round the love of Radha and the Gopis for Krishna. The most sensuous element even of forbidden or stolen love gained in prestige. Another trend of the literary theoreticians was towards endless classifications of heroines in love. While these types were limited in Bharata, they swelled to a lakh and more subdivisions by the time of the Mithila author Bhanudatta who wrote the Rasamanjari and the Rastarangini by the time 1600 A.D. Specialists on poetry-writing were deriving new material by referring to handbooks on erotics on the one hand and mystical Shringara of the Chaitanya school on the other. The Hindi poet Keshavdas may be taken as representing the new fascination for nakh-shikh revealed in almost all the theorists and poets of the late medieval period in Hindi, not excluding Surdas and even Tulsidas. A whole chapter (XV) of Keshav Das's work Kavipriya in Hindi is devoted to defining and illustrating as many as thirtynine parts of the feminine body deserving poetic treatment, and has been commented upon by Sardar Kavi. Others like Bihari, Padmakar, Matiram, all reveal a common interest in this poetic motif. Possibly, the atmosphere of the Mughal court in Delhi acted as an impetus to the popularity of what appears today as a very trite and insipid poetic motif.

NAKKIRAR (Tamil). There have been different works written in different periods in the name of Nakkirar. It shows that there had been many poets bearing the same name Nakkirar as in the case of Avvai, Kapilar and Paranan.

Nakkirar of the Sangam Age was a native of Madurai and the son of a teacher known as Maturaikkanakkayanar. Nakkirar once wrote a song in venpa metre cursing Kontan, a pot-maker who sang that Sanskrit was superior to Tamil. Kontan died as a result of the curse but Nakkirar sang again, at the request of the people, and the pot-maker was restored to life. This reference is found in the commentary of Perachiriyar for the sutra 179 of Cheyyuliyai in Tolkappiyam.

Of the ten idylls of the Sangam Anthology, Nakkirar wrote Netunalvatai and Tirumurukarruppatai. The former deals with the passions of a queen, bewailing the absence of her lord who is away in the battle-field, whereas the latter deals with the greatness of Lord Murugan and his six shrines on the hills of South India. Nakkirar has also written 7 verses in Narrinai, 8 in Kuruntokai, 16 in Akananuru and 3 in Purananuru, all belonging to the Sangam Anthology.

The author of the commentary on Iraiyanar akapporul is also Nakkirar, who is different from the one associated with the Sangam period. This Nakkirar is supposed to be the author of Atinul, a grammatical treatise on prosody, and Nalati narpatu, a didactic work. Then we have several other works which bear the name of Nakkirar, viz., Kayilaipati kalattipatit tiruvantati, Tiruvinkoy malai elupatu, Tiruvanchuli mummanik kevai, Tirivelukurrukkai, Pernhte vapani, Komappirachatam, Kavettu, Porrittirukkali venpa, and Kannappatevar tirumaran. Their author probably belonged to a later period. Further, we have references to Nakkirar in Tiruvilaivatar puranam of Paranchoti, in Tiruvilaivatar puranam of Perumparrap Puliyur Nampi, and in Kallatam, Tiruppukal and Tamil navalar charitai also.

NAKSHATRANCHE DENE (Marathi). C.T. Khanolkar, popularly known as 'Artiprabhu', was an eminent Marathi poet of the post-Mardhekar era. With his poems, plays and novels he dominated the Marathi literary scene during the sixties and seventies. Marathi poetry during the post-Mardhekar era suffered a severe set-back when poets like Vasant Bapat, Vinda Karandikar and Mangesh Padgaonkar, in their attempts to popularize it, diluted its serious concerns. Khanolkar was one of these poets who, in such a critical situation, maintained his individuality and succeeded in furthering Mardhekar's tradition. An unconventional flutter of individualism one experiences in his poetry seems to be one of the consequences of this strong individualistic bearing of his poetry. His was a self-centred poetic world.

Nakshatranche dene, a collection of 96 poems, first published in 1975 and reprinted in 1979, was a third book of his poems. Published just a year before his untimely death, it aroused interest in poetry-lovers. It represents the last phase of his poetic career. Even his earlier books of poems Jogava (1959) and Dirvlagan (1962) had made their mark in the literary circles. Khanolkar's poems have been translated into Gujarati by Jaya Mehta (1977). Some of the poems are also translated into English. In recognition of his contribution to Marathi poetry he has been honoured with awards from Maharashtra State and Sahitya Akademi (1978).

Khanolkar's poetry attracted the attention of readers and critics mainly because of the strains of an existential crisis in it. A sense of meaninglessness of life seems to hover over his poetic world. The questions posed in his poetry remains unanswered. In one of the poems he gives us the 'account' of a common man's life. Meaninglessness is the only possible meaning one finds in miserable life. It is this note of despair which points at the modernistic tensions in his poetry.

One of the strange repercussions of this unsuccessful pursuit is the meaning Khanolkar seems to find in death though not in life. His poetic world seems to be all the time shaken by this sense of the inevitability of death. In many of his poems he is found holding a dialogue with death. A unique dimension of this dialogue is found in Nakshatranche dene. In addition to the painful feeling of bidding 'good-bye' we find the poet receiving the premonitions of death. Death awaits welcome as if the poet hopes to embrace the meaning he had been searching all his life.

Like death Khanolkar has a special fascination for the ugliness of life. The ominous and the pervert attract his attention the most. This aspect of his poetry has a special appeal for readers who had enough of the romantic worship of beauty. It also indicated an eccentric way of looking life. As a corollary to this point of view one finds a feeling of bitterness in his poetry. It seems to discourage the usual expectation of a smooth-going pleasantness. One reason for this is Khanolkar's belief in the upperhand of fate. The image of man as a toy in the hands of destiny is rather frequent in his writings.

Meaninglessness and ugliness of this mundane world necessarily seem to lead the poet to look for a distant 'other world'. This mysterious other world occurs in his poetry in various forms. This is the reason why his poetry at times seems the poetry of an erotic world. The tension between his involvement in the mundane world and his attraction for the other world constitutes the moral crisis in his poetry. Khanolkar's poetry gets a rare feel because of this misty touch. Even in his novels and plays one encounters his poetic musings associated with this wonder world. The perplexity of this misty touch is very much felt in his delineation of the world of nature. Multi-faceted nature with its different manifestations in his poetry is a significant aspect of his poetic vision. In spite of his existentialistic and modernistic concerns Khanolkar could never get rid of the nostalgic feeling associated with his childhood spent in beautiful landscapes of Konkan. In his poetry we find the image of nature both innocent and horrible, beautiful and ugly. It is rarely free from the typical Khanolkar touch.

Nakshatranche dene, with a sense of an ending, is a product of a mature poetic vision. With a hearty welcome offered to death there is the sense of fulfilment arising out of mellow acceptance of life. Even here the usual reflective and the pensive mood is retained. But the prophetic anticipation of death gives a different feel to these poems. The book contains a considerable number of love poems. And the meaninglessness experienced in life is again experienced in love. But the poems are free from sentimentalism as the poet seems to accept the inevitable failure in love. They signify tolerance and wisdom one attains in close proximity to death. We find the poet set out on his journey once again. There is a sigh of relief as the life-long struggle for existence is over. The petty achievements seem to be meaningless and there is no fear of failure. Reflecting the very essence of Khanolkar's poetic vision the book remains a remarkable contribution to modern Marathi poetry.

NAKU TANTI (Kannada) is a collection of 44 poems by Dattatreya Ramachandra Bendre, published in 1964, which received the Jnanpith Award in 1973. The poet was 68 when this collection was published. It exhibits his preoccupations throughout his career, with his love of playing with Kannada words, which is his strength as well as his weakness. Here are the first four lines of the first poems of the collection:

Shra(a) vanaa 'Shra(a) vanaa'
Mai dandagi maadii 'haadidii kavanaa'
Kailaasada budaka(a) sikkavanaa 'hathu taleyavanaa'
Bidisoa 'hidisoa' Aatmaraamana bhavanaa 'Shivanaa'

This excerpt illustrates Bendre's fondness for alliteration, assonance, rhymes and internal rhymes, which becomes functional and adds to evocativeness in his best poems. Just as Bendre plays with the sounds of words, he plays a semantic game exploring the meaning of parts of words and the double meanings or puns. Sometimes he resorts to multilanguage puns, as in the poems entitled 'Do' and 'No'. For example, in the poem 'o' in the first line 'no' is part of the Kannada word 'eno' (something); but it is repeated three times in the second line, clearly as the English negative 'no'. This kind of play is sometimes carried to excess and becomes meaningless. In the poem 'Overhaul', in the first line 'haaluu' means 'milk' (in Kannada); in the second line Bendre uses the form 'overhaaluu' and insists on the Kannada meaning (milk) for the second syllable of the English word. It has been said that in these poems Bendre is breaking language into several components or trying various experiments to examine the nature of communication.

The linguistic experiments drew immediate attention. But the poems themselves deal with themes with which Bendre's readers are familiar. The poet's excitement at the arrival of Shravana, his wonder at the birth of a poem, the relationship between the man who suffers and the mind which creates, the poet's relations with other great men of his time, his contemplation of the spiritual insights which he has gleaned from his readings of Aurobindo, Vivekananda and Marathi saints, his concern for man's ignorance and the need to overcome it, the turmoil caused by the sight of the tower of Babel, and his dream of a bright future for all mankind—such preoccupations are present here, too.

The poet's knowledge of Vedic and mythological lore and his experience and understanding of the world around him are harnessed here to the purpose of awakening the reader to a new understanding of himself and the world. The metres used here are striking. Vedic metres and Dravidian metres are employed here. With mythological references woven into the texture of the poems, and a wide range of imagery, multilingual puns, and liberties taken with the language and the swiftness of imagination, the poet at times baffles the reader.

NALACHARITAM ATTACKKATHA (Malayalam) The story of Nala is very popular throughout India. Tradition has accorded to it a religious sanctity and it is widely believed that a recapitulation of the tale destroys sin and ill-luck. The great episode has permeated Indian literature from very early times and Indian languages have been enormously enriched by it. In Malayalam itself the number of works based on this story comes to more than fifty, embracing almost every branch of literature. The story is adopted as theme for folk form like 'tiruvattirappattu', 'unjalppattu', 'ammanappattu', 'kilippattu', 'kurattippattu', 'vitilurappattu', 'vanchippattu', 'kolkalippattu', etc, by the poets of Kerala. The credit of adopting the theme for an 'attakkatha' for the first time goes to Unnayi Variyar, the author of Nalacharitham attakkatha. It is printed in numerous editions from different parts of Kerala and a number of scholars have commented on it. Recently it has been translated into English.

The work of Unnayi Variyar is the only one of its kind in the whole range of kathakali literature and it remains unsurpassed. The observation of Sriharsha, the author of Naishadhiyacharita that 'Nala's story by the variety of its sweetness puts nectar to shame and drinking in it even the gods do not esteem ambrosia; if narrated it purifies the world in this age as if by washing with water holds good in the case of the attakkatha also.

The story of Nala is adopted for four days' performance on the kathakali stage by the author, based on the 'Vanaparva' of the Mahabharata (chapters 52-79). For the first day's play Naisadhiyacharita of Shri Harsaha is closely followed. After that the epic forms the main basis for the story though the author has effected suitable modifications here and there. For instance, sage Narada appears in the beginning, middle and end of the story. The long conversation between the swan and Nala also is a notable change. His actions in the presence of Damayanti too show the innovation of the poet. Such deviations have given a new appeal and dramatic effect to the piece. Though it is an attakkatha, the basic elements of a full-fledged drama in Sanskrit are adopted by the poet and hence it is more dramatic than ordinary kathakali works.

The arrangement of the story to suit four days' performance is also thoughtfully conceived. Each section or portion represents an important phase in the life of the hero. The first day's story covers up to his marriage with Damayanti. The various stages in between are effectively and convincingly portrayed. The second day's theme is mainly centred on the play of dice in which the hero is defeated by Pushkara with the connivance of Kali and culminates with the separation of the hero and the heroine brought about by the unfortunate circumstances. The third day's story portrays a dark phase in the life of the hero wherein he had to pass some time incognito serving as the charioteer of king Rituparna. The fourth and final day's theme is up to the reunion of the couple. This phase is apt to remind one of Abhijnanashakuntala, since the scene of reunion is as poignant as the one portrayed by the master poet in Sanskrit. This arrangement is not mechanical, but insightful from the point of view of the concepts of dramaturgy. Each day's play can be put on as an independent story and that is how it is staged even now. Usually the story is never staged in full on a single occasion. Still there is an inherent unity that will not be missed by any reader. The episodes of the plot are the vicissitudes through which love is first sparked, sprouted and nourished, then blocked and finally fulfilled after a tragic separation which really serves to give greater depth and poignancy. It is one of the best, if not the best, of original literary productions in Malayalam, and one meets with deep philosophy, brilliant metaphors, complex ideologies and intricate phrasology.

The dominant flavour or sentiment is the romantic love of Nala and Damayanti. The main sentiment shrinagara is supported by other emotions like vira, karuna, raudra etc; which are appropriately nourished with extreme propriety. The crude erotic scenes that mar the beauty of the usual attakkathas are eschewed by the author and he never trespasses the limit of decency.

In the matter of characterisation the work has few parallels in the whole range of kathakali literature. Each and every character drawn by the poet shows an individuality. It is an exception since in works of the same class one generally meets with stereo-typed heroes and heroines. The hunter and the swan, generally treated as insignificant by other poets, are prominent characters in Nalacharitam where they have undergone a metamorphosis by magic touch at the hands of this gifted poet. Characterisation is achieved in depth and even the minor characters are significant. The characters appearing on the stage in the whole play are Nala and Damayanti, the hero and heroine, the swan who acts as messenger, sage Narada who manipulates the course of events, Pushkara, Kali, the hunter, gods like Agni, Yama, Indra and Varuna, merchants who help the heroine, the queen of Chdi, Sudeva the brahmin, king Rituparna, king Bhima, the father of Damayanti and the two charioteers Jivala and Varshneya. Nala's role incognito as Bahuka also deserves attention. Every one of them plays a significant role.

The work is characterised by natural grace, elegant diction, new fancies, unending series of suggested meanings, erudite usages and inimitable charm of musical overtones. None else has composed such beautiful padas (songs) as Unnayi Variyar. They are exquisitely wrought lyrics. Words of extremely soft texture have been carefully selected with delicate assonances creating musical echoes. Naturally these could not be properly translated into any language.

The language of Unnayi Variyar still poses a challenge to literary critics and singers. One meets with fine Sanskrit idioms and Malayalam words of extreme poetic quality. In between crop up occasionally a few words of Tamil origin. Without the least inhibition he presses into service all of them together. Many of the usages elude meaning and critics are not sure of their ground whether they have properly understood him. A born poet, he has simply outshone every one and linguistic and literary canons undergo new shape in his hands.

With regard to the kathakali stage also Variyar's work has been a difficult proposition for generations of artistes. Even the best among them could not succeed up to the level of expectation. Usually kathakali works could not adequately bring out the vision of the author regarding the values of life since it is a difficult medium for selfexpression. Nalacharitam of Unnayi Variyar is a lone exception to this general rule. It is often said that the songs are of better merit than the several introductory stanzas in this work. The author himself has given expression to his conception of beautiful poetry in the course of the text: 'True poetry must contain worthy meaning, fluent nectarlike sounds, natural rhyming and assonances and charming figures like simile. All this must be fused agreeably to please the reader'. It must be admitted that Unnayi Variyar has lived up to the standard that he himself had laid down.

NALAKHYANA-NALAYIRA DIVYAPRABHANDAM

NALAKHYANA (Gujarati) is a mediaeval Gujarati long narrative poem (Akhyana), composed by Premananda (1636-1734), a great Gujarati poet of the mediaeval period. Premananda, was by profession, a reciter of mythical stories in a dramatic manner. He selected some themes from old texts, and restructured them, adding many incidents. By his unusual style of narration and discription he invested in his akhyanas a rare charm.

Nalakhyana considered as the best and finest of his akhyanas has its source in the Mahabharata, where it is a illustrative episode told by sage Brihadasva to Yudhisthira the eldest Pandavas to enlighten him. In the Mahabharata it is 'upakhyanam'—a side story. Premananda elaborated on the episode, making it a full fledged story. Many pre-Premananda poets like Bhatanal Vishnudas, Viswanath Jani and other developed the Mahabharata plot in their own way, Premanand concentrated only on some of the incidents, and presented them with an artistic touch.

In the poem Premananda is at his best in bringing the delineation of humour and pathos in it. In the first 'Swayamvara' of Damayanti, Gods like Indra, Agni, Varuna and Yama, aspiring Damayanti's hand in marriage asume the form of Nala and yet emerge as losers. In her second Swayamvara Rituparna an aspirant of Damayanti, provides humour by his boasting and bragging resulting into a hilarious fiasco. Damayanti's lamentation on being forsaken by Nala, and her cry in anguish "Hari", You are companion of truth! where do I fit in", on being accused of theft of a necklace are memorable situation in Premanand's tragic poetry. Premanand through his forceful narration successfully touches his audience's heart. He blends the mythical story with contemporary elements to bring it closer to his audience.

NALAVENPA (Tamil) is one of the minor epics written during the period of the Chola Kings. The exact year of composition is not known; nor is the author's name real. A poet from a small hamlet called Pon Vilainta Kalathur, a contemporary of Kampan, composed this work. He is known, to the Tamil world by his pseudo-name 'Pukalenti'. The myth, spun around the author, pictures him as patronised by a king named Chandramukhi at whose request the work as composed.

The story is the Tamil adaptation of the Sanskrit work Nalopakhyana, an interlude in the Mahabharata. The same story was retold by the North Indian king Harsha under the title Naishadha, translated into Tamil as Naitatam in 1600 by the famous blind poet Ativirarama Pandiyan.

The story of Nala and Damayanti haw been told and retold in Indian literature. The Tamil version Nalvenpa has itself been very popular, and we have some fifteen editions of this work, the first authentic one being that of Putparata Chéttiyar in 1870. The available editions differ from one another in size from 166 stanzas to 525 stanzas! Obviously, there are interpolations as usual with classics.

The story of Nala is recited in the venpa metre, as told by Vyasa to Dharma, the eldest of the Pandavas, as he (Dharma) mourns the loss of his wealth and kingdom. Vyasa consoles him by reciting the story of Nala who had undergone similar sufferings but was blessed with happiness in the end.

The Tamil author has made good use of the venpa metre and is therefore praised as "Venpavil Pukatenti". The work is well-known for its literary beauty, particularly for its similes, metaphors, images and poetic imagination. While praising the beauty of Damayanti, the author sings,

The lady with long tresses and nectar speech,
And crescent-moon forehead, behold!
Oh, it is there, resting his bow
The amorous cupid sharpens his arrow".

And the swan is said to have learnt its grace of movement from Damayanti. Again Damayanti, tortured by pangs of separation, thinks of the stars as eruptions in the sky due to the heat of the moon.

Thus, though an adaptation and a minor epic, Nalavenpa is ranked among the most widely read and praised Tamil works.

NALAYIRA DIVYAPRABHANDAM (Tamil) is a collection of 4,000 sacred hymns by 12 Vaishnava Poet-mystics spread over roughly 300 years (second half of 6th century AD to the end of 9th century AD). The poets are: 1. Poygai Alwar, born in Kanchi (7th century AD), 2. Bhoothathalwar, born in Thiru Kadal Mallai (Mahabali-puram), Contemporary of Poygai Alwar, 3. Peyalwar, born in mylapore, contemporary of the above mentioned two Alwars. 4. Thirumalisai Alwar, born in Thirumalisai of Thondai Nadu (7th Century AD), 5. Thondaradipodi Alwar (Name Vipra Narayana; 7th Century AD; born in Mandangudi of Thanjavur District) 6. Kulasekhara Alwar, belonged to Kongu Nadu, a Chera King (800 AD), 7. Thirupanalwar (low caste bard, born Uraiyur; date not known); 8. Thirumangai Alwar (born in Thirukuráiyaloor of Cholanadu; was a chieftain and was also, according to traditional accounts, a robber at some stage in his life; 8th century); 9. Perialwar (Name; Vishnu Chithan; born in Srivilliputhur; early 8th Century AD; a brahmin priest); 10. Andal (Name; Kothai, adopted daughter of Parialwar; fell in love with Lord Vishnu and according to traditional accounts, Perialwar gave her in marriage at the shrine, Srirangam where soon after marriage, Andal is believed to have disappeared into the sanctum sanctorum), 11.

NALAYIRA DIVYAPRABHANDAM

Nammalwar (Name: Sadagopan. born in Alar Thirunagari; 9th century AD) 12. Madura Kavi Alwar (9th century AD, a disciple of Nammalwar; a brahmin, who has only one padigam sung in praise of his mentor, Nammalwar, included in the Prabhandam, Lastly, Thiruarangathu Amudan, who lived in 11th 12th century, as a contemporary and disciple of Ramanujacharya (1017-1137 AD). He authored Ramanuja Nutrandadi in praise of his Guru, 'Ramanuja' and this was also added to the Prabhandam collections, whereas the works of all the 12 Alwars were collected by Nathamunigal in 10th century AD.

Alwars were mystic wandering minstrel heading a group of their devotees moving from shrine to shrine across the country, singing songs in praise of Vishnu, just as Nayanmars did in praise of Shiva and sang of their love. Thirimalisai, Thirumangai and Thondaradipodi Alwars engaged themselves in heated disputations with Jains and Buddhist monk and converted the kings and masses to Vaishnavism. The Shavite and Vaishnavite Bhakti movements were contemporaneous.

Jains and Buddhists who came to Tamil country in the pre-Christian era, settled and learnt the language and immersed themselves in proselytization work. Right from Sangam times (200 AD-350 AD roughly), their contribution to Tamil literature and scholarship was pioneering and even dominant; hence they wielded significant power and great influence even among royalty. This led to wide spread resentment. This interregnum, the period between 350 AD to 550 AD (the end of Sangam and the first flowering of Bhakti era) is a dark period in Tamil history of which nothing is known except that it was dominated by a horde called Kalabharas, who were supposed to be Jains as their influence was all—pervasive.

This led to the phenomenal emergence of Alwars and Nayanmars, to create resurgence of Hinduism, as a popular movement since Hinduism as then practiced by brahmins was elitist and had become a preserve of brahmins, ridden with rituals in Sanskrit, the language they didn't understand.

Alwars (just as Nayanmars) advocated the concepts of a personal God almost in human terms appealing to people's emotions. God was made accessible just by singing in chorus the glory of God in an easy, spoken language of the people.

The personal equation with God was sought to be achieved by sublimating the romantic tradition established in Sangam times, by which God took the place of hero, in the bardic lore of Sangam poetry and the devotee Alwar became the heroine, pining for her union with her hero/lord. Physical longing was sublimated into a spiritual quest. The popular music tradition of the Sangam age ('deshi' indigenous to Tamil Nadu) which lay dormant during the dark times of Kalabharas was revived. Here, Paripadal which belonged to the 2nd phase of the Sangam period coming between the Sangam works and Alwars Prabhandam, seems to have provided the link. (Paripadal is a collection of 70 songs, of which 22 have survived, in Ahaval meter, set to music. The melody for each song is specifically given in colophon under each song). This linkage is not only in music, but in many other aspects, both in the wandering bardic tradition, praising the Gods like Muruga and Vishnu and rituals like 'Pavai Nanbu', 'Thai Neeradal' which Andal exploited to the full in her Thiruppavai. Bhakti movement at the hands of both Nayanmars and Alwars was a popular movement in all its aspects.

The Alwars were raised to sainthood and their inspired utterances came to be looked upon as Vedas, an object of worship. Among them were kings, low castes, brahmins, and even a young lass all revered alike. God, Hinduism, music, poetry were all made accessible to common people, transcending all barriers of caste and status, and thus the movement ushered in the Golden age in Tamil history, which saw the finest flowering of Tamil endeavours in literature, arts, music, sculpture and temple building, which lasted over several centuries thereafter, reaching a peak, never attained thereafter.

The era of Alwars and Nayanmars which began almost simultaneously also neared its end almost simultaneously. The last of the Nayanmars was Manikkavachagar of 9th Century A.D. and the last of the Alwars was Nammalwar who lived around the same time. Both were high water marks in poetry wedded to mysticism. There were many such parallels on the further developments in these two strands of religious renaissance.

Nathamunigal (910-990 AD) heard the 'padigam' (decad) of Madurakavi Alwar with excitement and that led him to the discovery of Nammalwar's work and thereon to the unearthing of the whole corpus of all the Alwars, works; he collected them all, arranged them in a sequence and set them to music. Of all the Alwar Nammalwars is the largest contribution and also the most famous because of its philosophic depth for which reason he had also been raised to the status of an Acharya, the first Acharya, in a chain that extends over several centuries. These innumerable Acharyas who came in close succession, established the Vaishnava tradition. The Acharya tradition is exclusively recorded not only in several versions of Guru Parambara and also by later commentaries. It starts with Divya suri charitam (in Sanskrit) by Garudavahana Panditar, who was Ramanuja's, contemporary. This record makes it that all the Alwars were not only contemporaries but also worked in close togetherness, with Nammalwar leading them. But it is 'Ramanuja Noorrandadi' (in Tamil) by Thiruarangathu Amudhanar, which sets the order of Alwars straight. He was also a contemporary and disciple of Ramanuja and his 'Noorrandadi' was included in the Prabhandam collection at the express direction of Ramanuja.

NALHA, NARAPATI

The most curious and interesting fact about the Alvars and the Prabhandam was that though it was the Alvars who revived Vaishnavism and Ramanuja (1017-1137) came several centuries after the last of the Alvars and Ramanuja is the exponent of Vishistadvaitam, there is no trace of or reference to Alvars in his exposition. It should not, surprise, as the Alvars' utterances were inspired outpourings owing nothing to any school of philosophy, whereas Ramanuja's whole work is a studied intellectual journey into the world of Upanishads. The intellectual that he was, he considered Bhakti of the Alvars inadequate.

But the Acharyas who came later (some 200 years after Ramanuja) in the period from 13th to 16th century, chose to work their learned expositions, not in Sanskrit like Ramanuja, but in 'manipravala' style (a mixture of Tamil and Sanskrit).—except some of Vedanta Desikar's work in Sanskrit. But all of them hailed the Alvars as rishis, their inspired outpourings as Dravida Vedas and vaishnavism as casteless religion. On the last point, however, there were differences among the Acharyas, some of whom pointed that castelessness that was permitted in the case of Alvars was an exception that could not be extended to all for all times. However the fact remains, the whole lot of the Acharyas, who came later, wrote extensive commentaries on the Alvars, to establish their version of Vaishnavism which differed in two separate strands. They could never agree with each other though the source for their interpretative disputation was the same. The course that Vaishnavism took, from Nathamunigal to Ramanuja was one, though the Alvars and Acharyas operated at the antagonistic levels, the emotional and mystic as opposed to the cold intellectual and logical of the liturgical variety. The Acharyas who succeeded Ramanuja split into two or more factions interpreting the concept of surrender (Saragati) and the adequacy or inadequacy of Bhakti for the realisation of union of 'jeevatma' with 'paramatma', and at no stage was there ever a reconciliation of the contending points of view. Once again, in the hands of the Acharyas, Vaishnavism became an elitist institution, an exclusive preserve of theologians with never-ending liturgical controversies. Vaishnavism as a resurgent people's movement that inspired visionary poetry of the Alvars was nowhere in the picture in this close preserve.

But the common people at large, never let go the Alvars that easily, not till this day. The Alvars 'pasuram' (hymns) are a living inspiration which lend colour and blissful joy in every Vaishnava home, transcending barriers of caste or status, as Alvars meant them to be. Nathamunigal (910-990 A.D.) who collected all the 4000 hymns of Alvars in tact and set them to music with the help of his nephews, revived the Bhagavata Tradition and Tamil Nadu began to hear the sweet strains of music flowing from the Alvars hymns in streets and homes. It was taken to the temples and singing the pasurams became a part of the temple ritual right from the early dawn. This continues till this day in every Vaishnava temple though it is reduced to a monotonous recitation than singing.

Thiruvarangathu Perumal Arayar (954-1054 AD) was so captivated by Thiruvaimozhi of Nammalwar that he established the practice of dancing to the hymns in temples, by the priests themselves. This continues in three select Vaishnavaite temples till this day. It is called Arayar Sevai. As strict ritualistic adherence is the rule that governs here, one may take this as the freeze of the dance practised in the 11th century.

It is Andal's Thiruppavai which is the most fascinating, wherein the ritual of sangam love, and young virgins during penance going to the river side for a ritualistic bath are exploited in 30 songs of enduring charm and seductively tilting music. This has grown into the present day practice of groups and groups of devotees going round the streets singing Thiruppavai, all the 30 days of the month of Marghazi calling the people to awake to join them in singing the glories of the Lord. (Incidentally, Andal in one of her songs in Thiruppavai refers to a rare configuration of Planetary appearance from which M. Raghava Ayyangar has computed the date of such occurrence as 18th December 731 and from that deduce the date of Andal's birth as 716 AD).

And again, singing of the padigam of Andal, wherein she narrates to her sakhi, the dream she had of her marriage with her Lord, Vishnu, is now a necessary part of marriage rituals in Vaishnava families. The padigam starts with 'varanam anyiram...'

In Sangam times, bardic poets used to be employed in royal households, to awaken the king with their songs. This 'Rajopachara' convention was also employed by the Alvars to sing 'Thirupalli Ezhuchi' (the sacred songs of waking) to rouse their Lord from sleep. Vaishnava temple worship look this over and included it as its first morning ritual. One can hear the strains of these songs in the early hours of dawn from every Vaishnava temple in the South, and its reverberations spreading over the whole town.

The Acharyas failed to snatch the Alvars and Pasuram from the people and the Alvars have returned to the streets and homes, and temples. They live on.

NALHA, NARAPATI (Rajasthani), is a poet of repute, whose folk-song Bisaldev Ras is known to the literary world. Very little is known about Nalha's life either from his writings or from other sources. It is said that the poet was a Bhat (a bard). In his poems he refers to himself as 'Vyas': Vyas says like this' or 'Vyas says with folded hands that thirty-three crores of gods are pleased with you'. Vyas is a sub-caste of Brahmans in Rajasthan. So some say he was a Brahman, but this interpretation is, however, disputed.

Bisaldev is a love poem. Rajmati, daughter of Bhoj Parmar, is married to Bisaldev. She praises Orissa, the land of diamond-mines, and ridicules Sambhar, the land of salt, which results in Bisaldev's departure for Orissa. Rajmati had to spend twelve long years in pangs of separation depicted according to seasonal variations. This forms the main theme of the ballad. It ends in the reunion of the couple.

NALIN JAINATH (Hindi, b. 1911) is an eminent poet, playwright and short writer. He started his career as a journalist in Lahore, then shifted to Agra, and later to Delhi. Meanwhile he did his M.A. and Ph.D. in Hindi from Punjab University. After a brief stint in the film industry as a script writer, he entered the academic world as a teacher in 1951, and retired from Kurukshetra University in 1970.

During this span of three decades, he enriched Hindi literature through his writings in various forms. Even earlier, he was known as a critic through his works, Hindi natak-kar and Hindi nibandhkar. His first anthology of poems Dharti ke bol was acclaimed as a harbinger of the Progressive Movement. His Chintan aur kala, an anthology of essays, placed him among the first rank of essayists, writing on abstract topics. One of his radio plays, Samvedna sadan was also very well received.

Amongst his works, other than those already referred to, the following may be mentioned: Poetry-Yamini, Is paar ke bandhan, and Devayani (Epic); One-Act Plays: Nishant, Hathi ke dant, Naye parde naye drishya; Short Stories: Jawani ka nasha, Tilon ki chamak, Jhurmut, Sikke asli nakli; Essays: Prasad prabha, Majhdhar ke par; Sketches: Shatranj ke mohre, Bikharte saye; Criticism: Acharya Ramchandra Shukla, Vidyapati, Kavya-purush Nirala, Sahitya ka adhar darshan.

B.N.S.

NALLAPERUMAL, R.S. (Tamil; b. 1931) made his literary debut with Sankarabharanam, a collection of short stories in 1962. In 1965, he published Chintanai vagutta vali, related to the history of civilization. He participated in the Kalki Silver Jubilee Novel Competition and won prize of Rs. 7500 for his Kallukkul iram (The core is tender, the exterior crusty) published by Vanati in 1969.

Kallukkul iram may be compared with Kalki's Alai osai. Both have the Indian Freedom movement for their backdrop. Kalki weaves his novel around the happenings of 1930-47; Nallaperumal around the violent sproutings of the freedom struggle in the Southern parts of Tamil Nadu. The action of the novel comprises District Collector Ashe's repression, Vanchinathan's killing of Ashe, Calcutta Session of the Indian National Congress, Dandi March, Cripp's Mission, the imprisonment of Chidambaram Pillai and Subrahmanya Shiva, and the activities of Rashbehari Bose and Subhashchandra Bose. Both have achieved great success in their novels; while Kalki's novel is known for its imaginative exuberance, Nallaperumal's is famous for its naturalism.

His other novel, Kettatellam podum 1971 (Have we not heard enough?) is remarkable for its evocation of the life and teachings of Gautama Buddha. Porattangal 1972 (Struggles) chronicles the slow pervasive poisoning of social and cultural life by political indoctrination, regimentation, and violence, culminating in the periodic eruptions of mass frenzy. Ennangal maralam 1976 (We may change our minds) deals with the flow of life, flanked by faith and rational outlook, on either side.

Tunkum erimalaigal (The dormant volcanoes) currently serialized in the weekly Dinamani kadir, deals with the changing values and social relationships of Brahmans in Tamil Nadu. His other works are: Idayam ayiram vidam 1970 (Emotions are multi-hued, short stories); Bharatam valarmtakathai 1972 (History of India); Tirudargal 1976 (Thives, novel); Brahma rahasyam 1977 (on the theory of knowledge); Nambikkaigal 1981 (Aspirations, novel).

NALUNKU (Tamil), also called 'Nalanku', it forms a part of the wedding songs. After the wedding, the bride and the groom are made to smear sandal paste on each other, and this playful act is accompanied with nalunku songs. In some Vaishnava Brahmin families, such songs are sung in Telugu and Sanskrit also. These songs contain good advice and details about the ceremony.

Married women, who have led a full life, first decorate the bride singing the song, and then call her to smear the paste on the groom. The bride is addressed as Rukmini, valli or Meenakshi, or some such mythical woman, and the groom is addressed as Rama or Krishna. In accordance with the apostrophe, mythical incidents are also sung of in the poem.

Generally, the songs are sung by women only. Sometimes, though rarely, there are a few songs where the groom requests the bride to take part in the function.

NAMAGHOSHA (Assamese) It is collection of one thousand devotional stanzas or verses in different early Assamese meters composed by Madhavadeva. It is also known as Hazari ghosha, 'hazari' meaning one thousand. The ghosha means a refrain, the first of a song or verse composition which is repeated every time in a chorus. The word is derived from the Vghus, 'to chant aloud' and therefore, ghosha means a verse sung aloud. As the name suggests, Namaghosha means the names and praises of the Lord to be sung aloud either singly or in a chorus. It is considered to be the greatest work of Madhavadeva. Held in highest esteem by the Assamese people, it is widely read, memorised and quoted as an authoritative scripture. Out of one thousand verses, approximately half of them are translations from various puranas and devotional scriptures, but translated verses are couched in such a perfect rhythm and form that it would be more appropriate to call them recreation rather than translation. Through the melodious flow of a thousand verses the sublime image of a genuinely devoted soul passionately striving for spiritual realisation is reflected in all transparency. It is the expression of religious experiences, philosophical beliefs and the devotional urge of a god-intoxicated saint. On the eve of Madhava's death when his followers approached him with the request to name somebody whom they could approach for guidance after his departure from the mundane world, the saint is said to have advised them to read and reread his Namaghosha where they would find necessary guidance in case of doubt and mental conflict.

Though Namaghosha is primarily devoted to the exposition of the Holy Names of the Supreme Being it has not failed to focus attention on other relevant matters related to 'bhakti'. Vaishnavism preached by Shankaradeva lays special stress on four fundamental elements of devotion, viz., nama (holy name), deva (deity) guru (spiritual guide) and bhakta (devotee or holy association). While extolling the Holy Name, Namaghosha equally stresses the other three mutually related principles. The work, sub-divided into many minor sub-sections, basically contains three divisions or sections. The first section deals with the doctrinal or fundamental aspects of the Namadharm. The second section is a collection of lyrical stanzas of self-effacing devotion and passionate self-surrender at the feet of the adorable deity. The last section is a series of well-arranged rhythmical lines containing glorification of the name and attributes of Vishnu-Krishna. Banikanta Kakati, an eminent critic of Assam, observes three currents of thought running through the entire gamut of the verses. The first is Madhavadeva's self-effacing humility born of deep devotion to his spiritual guide Shankaradeva and the deity-Krishna. The sense of ego is completely submerged in the surging waves of devotional ecstasy. The second current of emotional expression is the undiluted eulogy and homage repeatedly paid to Shankaradeva. This sentiment of gratitude is echoed and re-echoed off and on throughout the verses and these two currents have ultimately merged in the overflowing current of the ecstatic devotion and the sense of complete self-surrender to the Lord.

Religious teachings of Namaghosha have been admirably blended with its philosophical views. Its philosophical base is supplied by the Vedanta tempered by the devotional interpretation of the Bhagavata-purana. On the whole, Namaghosha presents a unique blend of a religious urge, philosophical views and the passionate devotion of Madhavadeva.

NAMASIVAYA MUDALIYAR, K (Tamil; b. 1896, d. 1937), a great Tamil scholar, was born at Kaverippakkam and died at Madras. His father Ramasami Mudaliyar was teacher who established a small school of his own and taught children. At the age of fifteen, he went to Madras and became a teacher at a primary school. He was eager to learn Tamil classics and therefore went to Shanmugham Pillai, a famous scholar, who taught him for twelve years. In 1896 Namasivaya Mudaliyar became Tamil Pandit at St. Xavier's High School, Madras, and rose to senior positions in due course, teaching Tamil in such celebrated colleges as Queen Mary's College and Presidency College, Madras. In 1920 the Madras Government made him Chairman of the Tamil Education Committee.

Namasivaya Mudaliyar was a good teacher and scholar. He edited a Nallasiriyam, a journal for teachers, for fifteen years. His works include: Kichakan, Pirutivirajan, Desingurajan, Janakan, Attikuti, Tolporul Ilampuranam, Tanikaippuranam, Tanjaivanan Kovai, Iraiyanar Kalaviyal and Tanikaittavappayan Malai.

NAMBI ANDAR NAMBI (Tamil; b. 10th century) was born at Tirunaraiyur, Tanjore. He lived during the reign of Raja Raja, the Great (985-1012 A.D.). His father was a priest in the village temple dedicated to Lord Ganesha, and once he asked his son to perform the temple rites during his absence. The boy did the rites with such devotion that he received the blessings of the deity in person. The story went far and wide in the Chola empire.

Emperor Raja Raja once happened to listen to some of the devaram hymns recited. He fell in love with them and so wanted to obtain them all, but did not know where to get them. He sought the help of Nambi Andar Nambi. The young priest, with divine help, could locate the devaram hymns sealed in the temple at Chidambaram. Nambi and the king went there and retrieved what was left of the hymns, since the white ants had made a heavy feast of them. A heavenly voice declared that only the hymns needed for the age had been allowed to survive. At the king's request, Nambi codified devaram.

The devotional poems of saint Tirunanasambandar, saint Tirunavukkarasar, and saint Sundaramurti are collectively known as devaram. Nambi divided them into seven Tirumurais (Holy books). The writings of saint Manikkavachakar were added as the eighth book. The hymns of nine other devotees were collected by Nambi as the ninth Tirumurai. Saint Tirumular's work was added to this list as the tenth book.

Nambi was himself a poet of great merit. So, the later devotees included his poems along with those of others as the eleventh Tirumurai.

Nambi is the author of ten small literary works. His Tiruttondar tiruvandadi is a development on the Tirutton-dattokai of Sundaramurti. These two books served as the basis of Sekkilar's Periyapuranam.

As the codifier of the Shaivaite canonical literature. Nambi Andar Nambi may be compared with saint Vyasa, the codifier of the Vedas. His other works are: Tirunar-aiyur Vinayaka Tiru irattai manimalai; Aludaiya Pillaiyar tiruvandadi; Aludaiya Pillaiyar tirucchanbai viruttam; Aludaiya Pillaiyar mummanikkovai; Aludaiya Pillaiyar tiruvulamalai; Aludaiya Pillaiyar tirukkalambakam; Aludaiya Pillaiyar tiruttogai; Tirunavukkarasar tiru ekadasa malai.

NAMBIAR, V.V.K (Malayalam; b. 1901, d. 1962) was born in Cannanore district. After passing the Vidwan examination, he began his career as a teacher. He worked in several schools under the Malabar District Board, and also in Devagiri College, Calicut. He was a humanist poet with high ideals and an amateur actor and a good public speaker.

In literature Nambiar is not in the front line of the progressives. At the same time he stood foremost in respect of the creation of a better world. He was very proud of the cultural heritage of India. His poems have been published in eight collections: Suvarnamekhala (1947), Hridayagayakan (1947), Amritaganga (1948), Bhavashringhala (1951), Manninte kavita (1953), Mishra-vichi (1954), Vallaki (1954) and Ente kavita (1961) In the poem 'Kaladasyam' (Servitude of art) he asks:

Am I a poet, do I know to sing,
The unspoken story of the woeful mind?
Does my heart in its real form see
The pure image of nature's love?

Nambiar has only one message to give to the world and he has given it in his 'Sandesham' (Message).

Neither paradise nor any other gift is required
The world needs only to remain without enmity.

The three one-act plays 'Amaravatiyile Abhimanaran-gam', 'Dharmadhira' and 'Premabashpam' written by Nambiar have been published under the title Premabash-pam (Tears of love). They are intended for children.

NAMBUTHIRI, ORAVANKARA (Malayalam; b. 1857, d. 1917) was born as the first son of Oravankara Sankaran Nambuthiri by his first wife. His name was Neelakanthan Nambuthiri though he was popularly known in the literary society as Oravankara. He got his first lessons in Sanskrit from his father. Then he went to the Kodungallur palace, which was then a centre of knowledge and poetry, and continued his education intensively for about seven years. There he was a close friend of the renowned poet Kunjikuttan Thampuran. By the time he completed his education, he had become a poet with great mastery over his medium. In poetry he was a master-humourist. Kochunni Thampuran and Venmani Mahan Nambuthiripad who were great poets by themselves and who were his Gurus in poetry, passed glowing comments on his subtle humour.

In the field of literature, he was known as Oravankara Rajan also. He has explained in one of his poems how he happened to possess the title 'Rajan'. He had an elder brother who happened to develop mental aberration and started doing atrocities claiming that he was a king (Raja). This brother died shortly. With a tinge of humour people started calling him Raja, contending that he owned the title hereditarily. Quite humorously the poet says that he accepted the honoured title offered by the people with a sense of humility.

Though he was a member of the 'Kodungallur School' of poets, there were certain marked peculiarities which kept him apart. Composing verse on anything and everything taking the least possible time with a competitive spirit was almost a pastime among the poets then. Often there used to be such verification competitions and Oravankara also used to take part in them. but he believed that such 'instant poems' would be comparatively of inferior quality. He used to try his best to make his poems superb ones. He had a keen ear for the sound and music of words and he was extremely careful to use only selected words. Equally careful was he about the meanings of words also. Consequently his poems became profound and grand. He did not compose any long poem. Many of his works were left incomplete. Still Oravankara is considered to be one among the great poets of the day, not because of the number or the size but because of the grandeur of the poems he wrote. Certain hymns written by him are incomparable. No other poet in Malayalam has ever composed a hymn of that gravity. Some of his hymns are as grand as the quatrains of the Saundaryalahari of Shankaracharya.

Histories of literature give a long list of 32 books attributed to Oravankara. But the exact date of composition of none of them is available. Ulloor says that all his works, except Balopadesham (Advice to children), are incomplete. Apart from these, there are innumerable songs and single quatrains on different subjects. Entries in different histories of literature are the only records available to prove that the poet had written so many poems.

Some of his poems were collected, edited and published under the title Oravankara Neelakanthan Thir-unanassile kavitalak (Part I by T.K. Krishna Menon with an Introduction. Two other works of his, Kuchela vrittam and Rukmani swayamvaram were published in 1925 and 1958 respectively. K.P. Krishna Poduval has collected edited and published from Mangalodayam, Trichur, a volume of poems in 1932 claiming it to contain the complete works of Oravankara.

NAMBUTHIRI PUNAM (Malayalam; b. 1500, d. 1625) There is no clear record to show either the real name or the actual dates of birth and death of Punam, the ancient Malayalam poet. One thing is sure that he was one among the learned court poets of Manavikrama, the Zamorin Raja of Calicut, who lived in the 15th century. The famous historian, K.V. Krishna Iyer, says that this Zamorin reigned from 1467 to 1475, though Ulloor does not approve it fully. The Zamorin was a patron of learning and literature and he had in his court 'Patinettara kavikal' (eighteen and a half poets). The legend goes that these eighteen poets wrote in Sanskrit and they were considered 'full poets'. But Punam, who wrote in vernacular, was only a 'half poet', for writing in a language other than Sanskrit which in those days was deemed to be of lesser dignity. This has been interpreted in a different way also. Though the 'ara' means 'half', it is the root of 'arachan' (king) also and hence the term 'arakkavi' means 'arachakavi' or Rajakavi, which means 'the poet of the King' and then Pathinettara kavikal will mean 'the eighteen poets of the King' or 'the eighteen court-poets'. The term 'Arachakavi' may even mean the 'arachan' (king) among the poets and in that sense Punam will be the King among poets. Whatever may be to interpretation, one thing is beyond doubt: Punam was a revered poet in the court of the Zamorin. There is a legend that Punam belonged earlier to Kolathunadu and that Cherusseri Nambuthiri, the author of the renowned ancient poetic work Krishna gatha (The song on lord Krishna) also was a member of the same Punam Illam. Records show that the Zamorin and the Kolathiri Raja signed a treaty in 1452, following which the Raja sent the young Nambidi (or Nambuthiri) of Punam Illam to the Zamorin. The Zamorin accepted him and thus Punam became the court-poet of the Zamorin. The famous shloka (quatrain) that Punam presented to the Zamorin clearly says that it was written in praise of Mana Vikrama Raja. There is another famous shloka written by Punam in praise of Mana Veda Raja, the predecessor of Mana Vikrama. Punam and the author of Sri Krishna vijaya, the famous poet, Shankara, who was the court-poet of Kerala Varma Raja, were contemporaries and friends. This Kerala Varma Raja reigned from 1423 to 1446. From these and other similar internal evidences, Ulloor has concluded that the period of Punam was between 1425 and 1505. But after a protracted discussion, Sahitya Panchananan P.K. Narayana Pillai concludes that Punam might have lived between 1500 and 1625.

The fame of Punam is mainly based upon the 'champus', a particular genre in ancient poetry, containing both poetry and rhythmic prose and used by Chakyars for presentation on stage in temples. Punam is taken to be the author of many 'Manipravalam champus'. Many champus of doubtful authorship are also attributed to Punam.

The masterpiece of Punam is supposed to be the Ramayanam champu, which marked certain obvious changes in the realm of the champus. The famous works in this branch of Literature till Punam did not accept their themes from epics and they were not used for presentation on stages in temples. It was Punam who changed this. He also proved in Ramayanam champu that champus in vernacular also can deal with serious themes. Champus in vernacular, from Punam's days onwards, in comparison to Sanskrit champus till that day, have some marked deviation, both in structure and in style. Among the vernacular champus, the Ramayanam champu occupies a predominant position. The book is divided into 20 sections and the poet has followed the Valmiki Ramayana. But according to the demand of his context he has either abridged or expanded the events. Their sequence also has been conveniently changed. Inimitable is the style of Punam, particularly in Ramayanam champu. Punam maintained a healthy idea about the exquisite Manipravala style of language to be used in poetry. Sanskrit words and Malayalam words were so harmoniously mixed together that the resultant melody, charm and grandeur of poetry became but marvellous. His mastery over language is unique. His rhythmic prose is to be envied by any gifted poet. Subtle humour is an important trait in the character of the Nambuthiris in Kerala in general and this was sharper and keener in ancient days. Quite naturally, the ancient Nambuthiri poets lost no chance to laugh and make others laugh. The mastery that Punam attained in this field was beyond the reach of other poets. It might have been from this and such other champus that the ancient master humorist Kunchan Nambiar learned that humour could be used as a powerful and effective weapon for social criticism. The internal merit and the poetic grandeur of the Ramayanam champu is such that the learned minds will find immeasurable pleasure in it. His Bharatam champu is not as lengthy as Ramayanam champu. But it also is a grand work. Though there is no clear evidence as to the authorship of this champu, on the basis of textual studies, it can be concluded that Ramayanam and Bharatam champus are of the same author, though the poet uses more Sanskrit words in the latter. Certain sections are fully in Sanskrit. In poetic beauty Bharatam champu is not so perfect as Ramayanam champu, maybe because this was the earlier work of the poet.

Vadakkumkur Raja Raja Varma was of the opinion that the four champus, Narayaniyam, Parijata haranam, Kotiya viraham and Banayuddham also were by Punam. But according to Ulloor, Kotiya viraham and Banayuddham are by Mazhamangalam. Mentioning the names of some champus like Ravana vijayam, Kamadahanam, Parvathy swayamvaram, Ulloor says that it is difficult to decide whether their author was Punam or not.

NĀMBUTHIRI PUNTANAM (Malayalam. b. 16th century). A contemporary of Melpattur Nārāyanabhatta (1560-1666), Puntānam Nampūtiri was a Malayālam poet of extraordinary ability and a devotee par excellence. He is known after the name of his family Pūntānam, though some believe that his proper name was Brahmadatta. The house was located in the region called Nenmēni in the Perintalmanna taluk of Malappuram district, where at present there is a school and public library to commemorate him and the Government of Kerala has taken steps to erect a fitting memorial. No definite information is available on his personal life. The name of his teacher Nīlakantha is referred to in at least two of his works. He had only general education and as such his scholarship was limited. Most of his life was spent in the precincts of the famous temple at Guruvāyūr where he had the opportunity to come into contact with several scholars including Narayanabhatta. From a reference contained in his Bhasahakarnamrita one can ascertain that he lived up to the age of ninety or more. Towards the end of his life he seems to have left for his native place for a life of quiet and penance. When he was bidding farewell to his Lord at Guruvayur he heard a voice announcing that God can be found at a place nearby to the left of his house. On his return Puntanam erected a temple there, consecrated it to the Lord and performed worship everyday. The shrine is often referred to by him as Vamapura and the Lord Vamapuresha is mentioned by him in almost all his literary compositions.

There are several legends about the devotee-poet. While living at Guruvayur he composed his Santanagopalam pana in Malayālam, which he showed to Narayanabhatta everyday for correction. The grammarian-poet invariably found fault with the choice of words to the heart-burn of the devotional poet. One day his remark was rather harsh and at night he felt that his rheumatism aggravated all of a sudden. Soon in a dream he was told by the Lord that He liked the devotion of Puntanam better than the scholarship of the grammarian. Puntanam too had a vision of the Lord in his dream and felt retribution for his torments. According to another legend, once he was waylaid by a thief and he wailed calling for his Lord to save him. Suddenly Mangattachchan, the minister of the Zamorin of Calicut, appeared there on horse back and saved him. Puntanam presented him with his ring out of gratitude, but the next day it was seen decked on the idol of the Lord at Guruvayur who instructed his priest in a dream to return the same to the owner. A third legend speaks of his mysterious escape from a severe attack of small pox which he effected by composing the poem Ghanasangham when his friends had given up their hopes of saving his life. Yet another legend has it that he composed his Jnanappana (Song of wisdom) as soon as he recovered from the shock of losing his only son on the auspicious day fixed for his first ceremonial meal. The child apparently died of suffocation. Anyhow the devotee found solace saying that while the Lord plays in his mind the absence of a son is not at all felt. Thus there are numerous legends about him—all extolling his supreme devotion to the Lord.

He is credited with the authorship of about 22 works in Malayalam, 7 in Sanskrit and a few in Tamil, the last mentioned category being works on philosophy. The repeated mention of Vamapuresha forms his stamp. His works are noted for their lucidity, sweetness and overall charm of expression and they rank second to none. Their popularity among the devotees of Vishnu, especially ladies, is vast and unique. He is often compared to Saint Vilvamangala, especially since both of them have sung the glories of Lord Krishna in a similar vein.

His Bhashakarnamritam consists of 169 mellifluous stanza's in a wide variety of classical metres. It is replete with the charm of sound and sense and brimming with devotional fervour. The Jnanappana is truly a song of wisdom where the philosopher devotee exposes the nescience of human beings that prompts them to clamour for wordly things. In 356 lines the poem exposes the mortal qualities of the world and exhorts the humans to yearn for true wisdom. His Santanagopaam pana too shows these qualities. Some of his other important works in Malayalam are Parthasarathistavam Ghanasangham Anandanrittam, etc. Numerous stotras are also attributed to him in addition to these. His Sanskrit compositions too deserve special attention. Most of his works are published. Among the devotional saints of Kerala he occupies an unrivalled position.

N.P.U.

NAMBUTHIRI, VISHNU NARAYANAN (Malayalam; b. 1938), born at Tiruvalla, 'Vishnu' belongs to a Kashyap gotra family which migrated three generations back from Karnataka. He learnt Sanskrit from his grandfather and developed a love for English poetry as a student of Shepherd in post-graduate classes. He has a sound sense of word and word music and with his sweet dream, subtle fancy and inwardness he would have stuck to romantic cult but for the influence of N.V. Krishna Warriar. He developed a socially conscious sensibility, unpolluted by disillusionment. His important works are: Swatantrya-tekkurichchoru gitam, Bhumigitangal, Indiayenna vikarma, Aparajita. He is a Professor of English.

NAMBUTHIRIPAD, E.M.S. (Malayalam; b. 1909) E.M. Sankaran Namboothirippad is a top Marxist leader with an international reputation and is at present (1981) General Secretary of Communist Party of India (Marxist). Born in a land-holding aristocratic family in Elamkulam, he had a varied political life. He started with the Indian movement of non-co-operation with the British Government in 1932 and moved progressively towards leftist politics culminating in the Marxist Party. Namboothirippad sacrificed his land-holdings and courted imprisonment several times. He left his college course to take part in politics. He was Secretary of the All India Congress Socialist Party (1934), Member of the All India Congress Committee (1934-36), Member, Legislative Assembly, Madras (1934), Secretary, Kerala Pradesh Congress Committee (1938-1940). He was a founder-member of the Communist Party of India since 1941 and member of its Politbureau ever since. He continued in the Marxist Party since the Communist Party split in 1966. He was Chief Minister of Kerala in 1956 and again in 1967. He was Leader of the Opposition in the Kerala Assembly in 1970. He was Leader of the Opposition in the Kerala Assembly in 1970. He has travelled in Russia and China.

In addition to his busy political life Namboothirippad has written extensively on Marxist theory, history of Kerala and the Marxist interpretation of literature with particular reference to Malayalam. Among his works are Keralam Malayalikalute Matrubhumi (Kerala, Home of the Malayalis, Vol 1. 1947, Vol 2. 1948, Vol 3. 1949); Kammyunistukaranum purogamanasahityavum (The Communists and Progressive Literature, 1948); The National Question in Kerala (1955); Kammyunism kettipatukkunnnavante kute (With Builders of Communism, Travelogue, 1960); Atmakatha (An Autobiography (1969); Marxisavum Malayalasahityavum (Marxism and Malayalam Literature, 1947);

Namboothirippad holds the view that the life of the people is the source of good literature. The man of genius derives his inspiration and subject from the life of the people and this sense of social commitment gives shape to his works. Literature should, thus, be linked to people's life and popular movements. In his literary studies Namboothirippad has attempted to assess Kerala's major literary figures from this standpoint.

NAMDEV-GATHA (Marathi). The complete poetical works of the eminent saint-poet, Namdev (1270-1350), is called Namdev-gatha. Namdeo was one of the greatest disciples of Varkari cult extant and popular in Maharashtra even today. His poetic talent and the religious depth seem to have acquired rare dimensions because of his extensive pilgrimage through Gujarat, Madhya Pradesh, Rajasthan, Uttar Pradesh and Punjab. He chose Ghuman, a village in Punjab, as a place of his residence as the village had a mixed Hindu and Muslim population. There he composed his verses which are known as 'Sant Namdevjiki mukhabani'. Some of the verses are included even in Grantha Sahib, the holy book of the Sikhs. His temple in Bansi and Mardi (District Amritsar). Duniyapur and Bhawalpur (District Multan), Lahore, Amritsar, Jalandar, Ambala and Shivani are visited by pilgrims even today.

Namdev composed nearly two thousand abhangas (a versified couplet) and they are remarkable for their thematic variety and linguistic brilliance. Many of his autobiographical verses display his domestic tensions as well as the process of his spiritual quest. They have a special historical value as he was fortunate enough to be a contemporary of the great saints like Jnanadev, Gora Kumbhar, Visoba Khechar and Chokhoba. It is an authentic record of the golden phase of Varkari cult. His verses narrating the stories of Lord Krishna's childhood have in addition to their emotional intensity, a streak of humour. But their real strength lies in their devotional fervour. For Namdev his Lord God Vithal is everything whose human form he celebrates in his verses. Some of his verses have a strong moral tone. Lucid idiom, picturesque descriptions, flowing narrative and emotional intensity have made his verses memorable.

Namdev's greatness lies in handling various poetic forms. He successfully handled forms like narrative poems, verse biographies and travelogues. His verse biography of the great Marathi Saint-poet Jnanadev is remarkable for the personal warmth as well as for the significant details it contains. He also experimented with metrical forms like 'Bhoopali', 'Rupak' and Arti that have become a stock of religious rituals. Verse forms like 'Gaulan', 'Jate', 'Bagual' and 'Humbari' practised by him were familiar to the masses. He is also credited with the pioneering efforts made by him to popularize the art of Kirtan, a semi versified prose narrative recited with the help of music and acting.

NAMDEV (Hindi, Marathi b. 1270, d. 1350) was a well-known saint of Maharashtra and was born in the tiny village of Narasi-Vamani in district Satara. His father was a tailor by profession and did cloth-printing as side-business. So Namdev called himself a 'Chhipi'.

Namdev, until his youth, was just like any other young boy, engaged in common household chores. He had four sons and a daughter. He did not devote himself fully to his business and consequently suffered from inevitable losses. He, however, devoted himself to Vithoba and was gradually drawn to the Lord's worship. Later, he was initiated by the famous saint Gyaneshwar, and left home with him on a pilgrimage. Visiting many North Indian places, he reached the Punjab and established a Gurudwara at Ghaman in Gurudaspur district. He perhaps died here and his ashes were taken to Pandarpur and buried in the Vithoba temple.

Namdev is known in Marathi for his 'Abhang' padas. He propagated devotion to the Formless. Later poets like Kabir, Nanak, and Raidas followed to some extent this tradition of worship. Guru Granth Sahib contains 61 of his padas. He composed 236 padas in Marathi and 102 in Hindi.

Namdev does not believe that there is any essential difference in the two devotional streams, viz. the devotion to the Form-incarnate and that to the Formless. While writing on the childhood sports of Krishna, he accepted him as an incarnation of the Lord. Having been initiated into the Varkari sect, his system of devotion attached great importance to the practice of 'Nam Smaran' (Repeating the Lord's name).

His Hindi compositions have been termed as 'Hindustani' by Marathi scholars. The reason is simple. He uses the language of the common people, but there is an unmistakable imprint of the Marathi verbal forms on it. 'Devotion' is the main and the only theme of his compositions. He freely uses words of Arabic and Persian sources also. His Namdev padavali contains all his Hindi compositions. His historical importance as a trend-setter in Hindi devotional poetry will always remain undiminished.

He was also a great Marathi saint poet who composed poems in both Marathi and Hindi. The date and place of his birth are controversial. His father Damasheti was a tailor. His mother's name was Gonai. The family shifted to Pandharpur, the centre of the Varkari sect in Maharashtra, and settled there. Namdev was deeply influenced by the religious atmosphere of the place and became an ardent devotee of Vitthal. He took great delight in singing and dancing in praise of Vitthal day and night. At the age of eleven he was married to Rajai, daughter of Govendasheti Sadavarte but this did not change his life style. He remained busy in performing Bhajan and Kirtan ignoring his worldly responsibilities.

In the year 1291 he went to Alandi to meet Jnanadeva who later exerted great influence on his life and literature. Many compositions of both the saint poets resemble each other remarkably. On his advice Namdev became a disciple of Visoba Khechar who enlarged his spiritual vision. Along with Jnaneshwar and other saint poets he undertook a pilgrimage of North India and went up to Punjab via Gujarat and Rajasthan. He wrote a poetic account of this pilgrimage which is known as Tirthavaliche abhanga. This is perhaps the first travelogue of its kind in Marathi literature.

In 1296 Jnaneshwar attained 'Samadhi' at Alandi. Namdev again left for North India. He remained in Punjab for about two decades and returned to Maharashtra. He died at Pandharpur at the ripe old age of 80 years. However some scholars think that Namdev died at Ghaman in Punjab. There is a Namdev shrine at Ghaman in support of the claim. Some 61 of his Hindi verses found place in the Guru Grantha Sahib. This speaks of the influence of Namdev on the Northern Indian literary scene. It is said that Namdev even met Kabir during his long sojourn in North India.

In different gathas or collections there are about 2500 compositions which are credited to Namdev. However, some critics think that in reality there are only five to six hundred abhangas which really can be said to have been composed by Namdev himself.

Namdev has written many autobiographical abhangas. Together they shed light on the major events of his life. He speaks about his birth, opposition of family members to his taking the path of Bhakti and also about the spiritual guidance he received from his guru. This has led critics to term Namdev as the first autobiographer in Marathi literature.

Another major contribution of Namdev is his composition in poetic narration on the life of saint poet, Jnanadeva, whom he knew intimately. In about 350 abhangas Namdev has beautifully traced the life of Jnanadev from his birth to Samadhi. His compositions depicting the last phase of Jnaneshwara's life is full of pathos, and poetic beauty.

His abhangas addressed to his dear Vitthala are lyrical and charged with devotion. In one of his compositions he says, 'Vitthal is here, Vitthal is there, there is no place without him'. In many compositions Namdev has depicted his deep spiritual experiences. In one of his Hindi songs he says, "There is no sawan (rainy season) but clouds are roaring, there are no clouds but rain is pouring, there is no skin-covering but the drum is making sound. What is this mystery?"

Namdev moved from one stage to another on the path of Bhakti. He started with 'sagunopasana' and reached 'nirgunopasana'. He travelled from 'jada' to 'Chaitanya' and explored the spiritual essence of the material world. He recorded all his spiritual experiences in his compositions which are rich in literary quality also.

Yet another major contribution of Namdev is the revival of the 'Kirtan' tradition. Through kirtanas or recitation and performance of devotional compositions he spread the message of universal brotherhood, love and devotion in India. His field of action spreads from Maharashtra to distant Punjab.

Namdev had four sons and a daughter. It is said that not only the members of Namdev's family but his maid-servant, Janabai, was also a poet. Together they contributed significantly to the Marathi devotional literature.

NAMISADHU (Sanskrit; b. 11th century) or Namipandita is a Sanskrit commentator. A pupil of Sri-Salibhadra-suri, and fellow-student of Jinabhadra-suri, he was an ascetic of Jaina Shvetambara sect. He is well-known for his commentary on Rudrata's Kavyalamkara which he completed in 1069. His commentary is concise and to the point, and is often helpful in explaining and amplifying Rudrata's position. He quotes from many authors, among them Hari who seems to be a Prakrit writer on poetics. His definition of 'parikath' as condensation of a narrative in verses shows it to be a summary or synopsis from which the story could be extemporised. He also wrote a commentary on Sadavasyaka-sutra.

R.N.

NAMMALWAR (Tamil; b. 9th century A.D.) was the most famous and most prolific of the 12 Alvars. Out of a total of 4000 poems, in Nalayira divya prabhandam, Nammalwar alone accounts for 1296 ('Thiruvrittam'-100, 'Thiruvasiriam'-7, 'Peria Thiruvandadi'-87 and 'Thiruvoimozhi'-1102 stanzas). Nothing much is known of his life except that he was born in the village Thirukkuru-hur (now known as Alwar Thirunagari, named after him) on the banks of river, Tamiraparani. He is reported to be the son of a local chieftain belonging to the non-brahmin Vellala community. He is also known as Maran, Sadagopan, Parankusan; he earned the attribute, 'Nammalwar' (meaning 'Our Alwar') which shows the exclusive reverence and possessive attachment with which he is held by the orthodox brahminical Acharyas.

Even as a child he lost interest in worldly life, and engaged in other-worldly quests. According to all the 'guru parampara prabhavam' (the stories of Acharyas and Alvars in a mythical-puranic fashion) he did penance for sixteen years under a tamarind tree. It was then that the disciple wrote a 'padigam' singing his guru's praise which is included in the prabhanda collection. This is all we could know of his life and only his poetry can unfold the rest.

But everything one learns from his poetry is mystifying. He is not known to have moved about anywhere, whereas most of his poems are on the deities enshrined in temples of Kerala. All his poetry is couched in the simple dictum of normal day-to-day language with an easy flowing fluidity, and a significant part of them has the quality of incantation. Their simplicity seems to be transparent at one level and wholly satisfying in themselves, but they are deceptive, because of the profundity of their content on successive readings as they have given rise to contending theological and philosophical interpretation by learned Acharyas in successive generations and centuries. Like those of all other Alvars, his utterances are not a product of learning, but of divine inspiration, spontaneous outpourings, and hence he was above the sectarian liturgical disputation to which he has been later subjected. In places he talks of the oneness of Godhead, while he sees both Shiva and Vishnu and the Vaishnavite Acharyas have engaged themselves in bitter quarrels ever since, over what exactly he meant by that. After all he is supreme among the Alvars, who are themselves rishis, and Nammalwar is revered as the avatar of Senai Mudaliar (God's chief of Hosts).

And again, notwithstanding all this profundity of philosophical depth, he could be as versatile in treating the romantic dimensions of feminine attributes or in dwelling on the cravings of love with the same intensity as any poet of the Sangam Akam (love lyrics) tradition, or of the Prakrit poets in Hala's Gatha Sattasai, and of course never failing to sublimate them with suggestions and symbolism, to express the inner agony of his spiritual quest. Here he employs all the conventions, all the techniques, all the varying shades of his forbears of the Sangam times with the same nonchalance, deftness and mastery as if it is they were born again as Nammalwar, except that they did not go beyond the heroine's 'viraha' for Nammalwar's ultimate inclination is always an unquestioning surrender of all his self at his feet. At one place he goes further and says the surrender includes the surrender of even that consciousness of surrender. All the symbols, the clouds, the bees, the saki, the flowers, the birds are made messengers to carry the message of his love. His own heart is made a messenger;

Believing in my heart
Thinking it guileless
I sent it after Him...
And till to-day
It has not returned Self willed and now uncontrolled, it has forsaken me and wanders I know not where."

(Srinivasa Ragavan's translation).

Very much in the tradition of Sangam poets he takes on himself all the situations of the girl in love. The pangs of separation, the joys of fulfillment, the thrill of first love, the excitement and frustrations of waiting and all the varying moods of the nayaka are exploited to express his own agonies and joys as he craves for His grace.

Immersed so well and deep in the tradition of Sangam ethos, he has a dig at one strand of that tradition which made it its occupation to sing in all manner of superlatives in praise of the patron king for its survival. "It will only create bitterness if I speak out, but let me say a few words", he begins a whole padigam ("Thiruvoimozhi" 3-9) and continues "of what use is it to sing of a man who fondly imagines he is eternal" and so on. As for himself he says, "I for my part, will never sing, how can I, of man, the illusion?

Nathanaumigal (910-990 AD), according to tradition, is reported to have heard the padigam by 'Madurakavi' in praise of Namalwar, which led him on to search out all of Nammalwar's pasurams which in turn led to the gathering up the works of all the Alawrs. Ramanuja, the exponent of vishishtadvaita is reported to have learnt, specifically Nammalwar's poems from Peria Nambi. The Divya Suri charitam by Garuda Vahana Panditar in Sanskrit records the histories of the Acharyas which starts with Nammalwar. Gaudavahana Panditar was a contemporary of Ramanuja and his work had been blessed by Ramanuja himself. The 'Guru Param Prabhavams', in all their several later versions in mani pravala style (a mixture of Tamil and Sanskrit), endorse this. Several commentaries by the successive Acharyas like Manavala Mamunigal, Vedanta Desikar, Sri Brahmatantra Swatantra Jeeyar, Kandadai Appar, Pillai Lokacharyam Alavandar, Azhakiya Perumal Nayanar, Nam Pillai, Peria Vachan Pillai, Vadakku Veedi Pillai and so on and an unending succession of commentators, have commented on Nammalwar's philosophical insight (not poetry) and have sought to reinforce their interpretations on the authority of Nammalwar. While only a few of them have chosen to comment on all the Alwars, all of them without exception, had Nammalwar as the prime subject for their philosophical exposition. Nammalwar has been variously hailed by them as 'Senai Mudaliar' (the Chief Host of the Lord) and 'Kulapati' and no other Alwar has been given the status of an Acharya, the first Acharya at that.

Thiru Arangathu Perumal Arayar (954-1059), captivated by the charm and expository possibilities of Nammalwar's Thiruvoimozhi and its potentialities for emotional appeal, arranged for its dance exposition in the temples by the priests themselves. This 'Arayar Sevai', by which name it has come to be called, is being followed in three temple of the South. Among the pasurams of Alwars being recited as a ritual worship in Vaishnavite temples, Nammalwar's Thiruvoimozhi occupies pride of place.

Kamban the great of all ages, the epic poet in Tamil, composed Sadagopar Andadi (of 100 verses) as a tribute to Nammalwar's greatness, something unique in Tamil literary history.

What does Nammalwar have to say of himself?

"What can I say,
As the life of my life, one with it,
He makes poetry with my words,
No, they are His words,
And it is He who sings,
His own praise."
('Thiruvoimozhi', 7.9..2)

NAMMAYASUNDARIKAHA (Prakrit), containing 1117 verses, was composed by Mahendra Suri in Maharashtrai Prakrit. Occasionally the author uses prose also for illustrating the themes presented in the book. Nammayasundari Kaha deals in the main with purity of conduct which forms the very basis of Jaina thought and religion.

The authorship of Nammayasundarikaha is accredited to Mahendra Suri, who claims that his book was written at the instance of his spiritual preceptor, Shantisuri, on whose teachings the work is entirely based. The solitary manuscript of the book dates back to about 525 years ago. The composition Nammayasundarikaha is stated to have been finished in 1130.

Nammayasundarikaha is the life-history of Nammayasundari. The narrative is enriched with popular sayings, suktis and subhasitas. It is conspicuous by the absence of any gorgeous descriptions in ornamental and artificial language. The natural descriptions, based on the Jain Karma and re-birth theory, are presented here in a lucid and unadorned style. The subject of the entire narrative is Nammayasundari who has been presented as a 'Shilavati' woman who, in her previous births, passed through numerous ordeals but each time came out with greater purity and chastity and single-minded loyalty to her husband. It is these virtues which ultimately lead a person to the acquisition of supreme beatitude.

Nammayasundarikaha seems to have been influenced by a similar composition by Devachandra, the preceptor of Acharya Hemachandra, whose Nammayasundarikaha is based on Vasudevahindi.

NAMRUDNAMA (Kashmiri) is a collection of the 'rubais' (quatrains) by Mir Ghulam Rasul Nazki (b. 1909). The first edition of Namrudnama was published in 1964. This book is divided into three sections according to the themes of the rubais. The first section contains the rubais of personal experiences, devotion and love; the second section contains the rubais of pure and fervent religious sentiment and the third section is a collection of rubais of satirical nature. In spite of this thematic segregation of the book, there are certain stylistic features which are homogeneously present in all the rubais which form the under-current of humour and satire under the veneer of seriousness and pathos. The other features are the use of the common words without being vulgar and the use of concrete images picked up from the immediate surroundings. All the rubais of Namrudnama are in tune with the conventional rigours of a rubai established by the classical Persian poets like Omar Khayyam. The poet has a predilection for the rhyme scheme aaba and abab, like the classical Persian rubai. The poet unfolds step by step the theme in the first three lines and consummates it in the fourth one. With a sustained succinctness, every rubai is based on extravagant wit and paradox as we find in a popular epigram:

Rahim puj thove vanas path Nabir chhan/Karim navid chhu tam sanz toor vayan/Zamanay gav phirith soruy phirith gav/depan gatal halen banan vukar than.

(Rahim, the butcher, entrusted his shop to Nabir, the carpenter Karim, the barber, is working with his axe. The times are topsy-turvy, everything gone astray. This is what the wise have said that the mis-shapen utensils need untidy lids).

The author of the rubais, Mir Ghulam Rasul Nazki, is shocked to see the promiscuity of the modern age and has a palpable design to seek moral amelioration. The influence of the famous Urdu poet Allama Iqbal is visible in most of his rubais and the poet has fully expressed his indebtedness to Iqbal in the preface of the book: "I have either translated or adopted (Iqbal's ideas)." However, an original poet, Nazki has succeeded in imbibing and assimilating the spirit of Iqbal and the reader does not feel any arbitrary relation between thought and expression, as we usually find in a bad translation.

NAMWAR SINGH (Hindi; b. 1927) was born and brought up at Varanasi, and took his M.A. and Ph.D. degrees in Hindi from Banaras Hindu University. He taught at Banaras Hindu University and Sagar University for some years and later joined Jodhpur University (1969-1974). In 1974, he moved to Jawaharlal Nehru University, New Delhi, where he is Professor and Dean, Centre for Indian Languages.

Namwar is a renowned teacher and a forceful speaker. Besides Hindi, he knows Sanskrit, English and Bengali. His publications include Bakalam Khud (From my pen), 1951; Hindi ke vikas me Apabhramsh ka yog (Contribution of Apabhramsh to the development of Hindi), 1952; Adhunik sahitya ki pravittiyen (Trends in Modern Literature), 1954; Chhayavad (The romantic movement in Hindi, 1955); Prithviraj Raso ki bhasa (The language of Prithviraj Raso), 1956; Itihas aur alochana (History and Criticism), 1957; Kahani, Nayi kahani (The new short story), 1964; Kavita ke naye pratiman (New standards of poetry), 1968; Dusri Parampara ki khoj (Search for a new tradition, a study on Acharya Hazari-prasad Dwivedi) 1981.

Namwar has been the editor of Alochana since 1967. He has edited for the National Book Trust a collection of representative short stories in Hindi. In his Kahani, Nayi Kahani, he has presented a fresh analysis of the contemporary short story in Hindi in terms of its content and form. Earlier, critics used to analyze short stories in terms of plot, character, characterization, etc. This kind of cold division, according to him, has done a great damage to the understanding of fiction. He believes that the 'storyness' of a story is its greatest characteristic.

He was honoured with the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Kavita ke naye pratiman. Its second edition came out in 1974 and includes an analysis of Muktibodh's famous poem 'Andhere me'. On the question 'What is poetry', he presents in his book new norms and standards for evaluating poetry, and examines in depth issues pertaining to the language of poetry, its technique, symbolism, etc.

In his early career Namwar wrote some poems also, but his main forte has been criticism. His writings have provided an idiom and style for critical writings on fiction and poetry. To a very large extent he is responsible for bringing fiction-criticism in Hindi to its present status of an independent genre. He wields a powerful pen and his writings have a rare blending of sociology and aesthetics.

Namwar is an advocate of progressive literature and firmly believes in the Marxist philosophy and its advocacy of the cause of the downtrodden. On an invitation from the Soviet Writers' Association, he visited the USSR in

NANA NANA RAS—NANAK DEV, GURU

1969. He attended the International Congress of Orientalists held at Paris in early seventies. In 1978, he toured Russia to participate in the Tolstoy bi-centenary celebrations. He attended the Second World Hindi Conference held at Mauritius. During May-June 1981, he toured Vietnam, Kampuchea, etc.

NANA NANA RAS (Gujarati; Part-I (1910), Part-II (1928), Part-III (1937) is a collection of lyrical poems of Nanalal Kavi (1877-1946), a great lyricist of Gujarat. Originally 'Ras' was a form of poetry, prevalent in the mediaeval Gujarati literature. The Ras was a musical composition sung while dancing. Earlier till the 15th century Ras was a form of Jain literature, and the musical songs were composed in praise of some deity, or narration of some important event in the mythology or of some renowned place of worship. While in non-Jain literature the Ras form was mainly connected with the love pranks of Krishna and Gopis (Cow-maid) or Krishna's dance with Gopis, the dance form is also known as Raś. In the modern period with the impact of western literature, the range of poetical themes widened, and religious poetry took a rear seat in the arena. Ras form had been almost redundant in the later half of the nineteenth century. Nanalal revived Ras, making it more sophisticated and more refined. Though he has in his Ras depicted love pranks of Krishna and Gopis, he has depicted wide ranging human emotions, sentiments, ecstasy beholding the beauty of nature, devotion to God, first indistinct stirrings of love in a young girl's heart, as well as the supreme abandon of a man who has transcended all human frailties, attachments and ambitions. Not only the objects of poetry but the tunes, verbal music, the flights of fancy, the tenderness of sentiments and high suggestivity, facile expression, vision of beauty, romance of life and aesthetic splendour earned for him his place as a lyricist. In one of the Rasas Radha tells Krishna, using the symbol of the action of churning of curds:

Ah! churn the curd with a lighter hand
This is not the way, Lord! to churn the curd
The pot will crack, my blouse will be drenched,
The necklace of pearls, hanging over my breast
Will snap suddenly, and the gems will be scarred.
The pot would collapse and the precious butter
Plowing in a stream, will be lost

Here the poet has selected the most appropriate symbol, and the apparent meaning and the inner meaning are in perfect harmony.

In one of his devotional rasas he says to God—

This spring has blossomed with all its hundred petals. Come oh Hari!

The earth has dressed itself in her loveliest and best.
Now do please come!

Here the devotee assures the Lord that his efforts to create a congenial atmosphere for the reception of God, have fruitified.

Written in different moods Nanalal's Rasas are a valuable contribution to the development of Gujarati poetry.

NANAK DEV GURU (Hindi; Punjabi b. 1469, d. 1539). Various known as Baba Nanak, Nanak Dev, Nanak Shah, Nanak Patshah, Nanak Sahib and Guru Nanak, the first Sikh Guru and founder of Nanak Panth, he ranks second only to Kabir amongst the prominent poets of the early medieval period of the Nirgun Sect of devotional poets. Nanak was a devotee of the formless and attributeless. He declared God to be one, omnipotent, the only true being, the unborn, self-generating and omnipresent.

As a devotee of the formless, Nanak was opposed to idol-worship. He said that no external aids and rituals could lead one to God. The only way that leads to the Lord is through internal 'sadhana'. Much emphasis was laid by him on 'Nam-smaran' (recitation of the Lord's name) and on the grace of both the Guru and God, and of course one's noble deeds. Nanak's poetry is replete with a sense of devotion (Bhakti), of divine knowledge (Gyan), and of resignation (Vairagya). He was a man and a poet of the masses. He travelled widely during his three 'Udasis' (rambling missions), met people of all hues, saints and godmen of all sects and communities. The third and last of his 'rambling missions' ended after a period of three years in 1521 when he settled in Kartarpur where he stayed till the end of his life.

Nanak's religious and social outlook was based primarily on his own experience, reinforced by his realization of a sense of harmony and oneness of mankind. He condemned religious orthodoxy, parochial and caste considerations, evil social practices, and demonstrative religious rituals. He was a social and religious revolutionary in an age beset with ritualism. He had respect for other religious sects and had no quarrel with them, though he had an ardent faith in truth as he saw it. His voice is clear, lucid and resonant without being aggressive. His compositions have an undercurrent of 'Shantrasa' (equipoise), although the sentiments of compassion (Karuna) and marvellous (Adbhut) are also discernible in them.

Nanak's poetic compositions have also beautiful descriptions of Nature. His diction is a blend of words from various languages—Persian, Arabic, Sanskrit, Punjabi, Sindhi, Khariboli, with, of course, a preponderance of Braj. Many of his compositions find a pride of place in

NANAK DEV, GURU

Guru Granth Sahib. Amongst his well-known works are Asa di war, Rahiras, Sohila and Japuji, besides miscellaneous padas. His Nasihatnama is composed predominantly in Khariboli.

Ma.C.

He was born in a village called in those days. Talwandi Rai Bhoi, about a hundred kilometers west of Lahore. Now it is called Nankana Sahib. His father Kalyan Rai (Kalu), was in the service of Rai Bular, a zamindar of the place, and has often been described as a patwari, that is the keeper of the land records.

Guru Nanak received his early education from both the Brahmin and the Qazi of the village. He was married in his early youth to the daughter of Mula Ram, Chona Khatri of Batala. His elder sister, Nanaki, the only other child of their parents, was married to Jai Ram, described as an official at Sultanpur, seat of the Governor of Jullundur Doab of those days. Jai Ram is known to have managed for Nanak an appointment as a store-keeper of the above named administrator. Though about the age of thirty at the time and father of two sons, Nanak could not put his heart to his job. He believed to have received a mission from God to strive to save his people from spiritual degradation, a natural consequence of their political and social plight.

The next thirty years or so of his life, Nanak seems to have spent as a wandering fakir. Towards the end of his life he settled at Kartarpur on the bank of the Ravi, now a border town in the district of Gurdaspur. There he died at the age of seventy.

Guru Nanak's compositions are set forth in the Guru Granth, the scripture of the Sikhs, in different sections, alongwith those of his five successors and some other saints or 'bhaktas' selected for the purpose by his fourth successor, Guru Arjan Dev.

These compositions have a very definite metrical structure, but so many variations are rung upon the regular metres that superficial observers often miss the pattern. The expression is classical, chaste and well-thought-out, and yet an impression of spontaneity is given.

From the aspect of language, three divisions can be marked: first, compositions more or less in the Apbhramsha style; second, those in the Hindvi style; and third, more or less pure Punjabi. On the whole these compositions offer an instructive study in the development of the language in that period. It may be observed that in none of the three styles is there any consistent purity of linguistic form.

The content of this poetry is of course religious in purpose and, accordingly, variety of theme can be easily missed, but it is in an intensely personal idiom. In many places the formless and all-pervading Divinity of the Sikh concept has been addressed as the beloved husband, but the eroticism of the bhakti tradition of the middle ages has been consciously toned down. A strong moral censorship is seen at work so that erotic feeling is disciplined into conjugal warmth.

Guru Nanak's philosophy is a remarkable blend of Upanishadic idealism and empirical realism. Like most religious thinkers, Guru Nanak is also sometimes termed a mystic. But his mysticism is of a rather unconventional variety. He does not claim to have realised the Divine in any ultra-rational way. The Divine is a mystery to him and he strains to pierce through it with the help of reasoning, till he seems to have reached its limit. Then he finds himself baffled and falls back on the Divine in the human. Ultimately, it turns out to be his own universal sympathy and all pervading good-will towards all mankind which he realises as his God.

Guru Nanak's Japu is regarded as the most important piece in the literature of the Sikh religion. It is a long poem of thirty-eight stanzas of unequal length and composed in such a style—lyrical, incantatory and esoteric—that it is difficult to arrive at any consistent meaning. According to one line of thought among Sikh scholars, the Japu is a description of the 'sadhana' or effort that man has to make in order to realise the Divine.

The Sidhagosti is a polemic against the ascetic and esoteric practices of the 'Sidhas', believers in the legendary Gorakh Nath. In the third long poem, Onkar, there is a similar debate with the Brahmins. In all three, great emphasis is laid on meditation of what Guru Nanak calls the 'Name'.

Of the other form of long poems called the 'vars' in the Guru Granth, three are by Guru Nanak, i.e., in 'Ragas Majh', 'Asa' and 'Malhar'. A var in Punjabi folklore is a verse narrative of love and war. However, the vars in the Guru Granth are not of the narrative variety but they are philosophical and lyrical. The var in 'Raga Asa' is a composition of twenty-four core stanzas which present a metaphysical and cosmogenic thesis, and around which are clustered sixty couplets and longer hymns of which eleven are composed by Guru Angad, immediate successor to Guru Nanak. These clusters of verses have a distinctly metaphysical meaning of the core stanzas. But at places they suddenly get charged with a rather revolutionary social content. Some of them have, indeed, a shattering political tone, as for instance:

Sin is the king and greed the minister and falsehood the collector of revenues

Lust is the assistant who offers counsel when it is asked. The people, blind, devoid of understanding, are dead bodies filled with ash.

Guru Nanak is essentially an iconoclast. He condemns the caste system, idol-worship and various other rituals of the brahmanical creeds. He ridicules the rituals and superstitions that had come to prevail in 'Hindu Society in celebrations of birth, marriage, death and other occasions of life. He speaks rather cavalierly of Muslim formalism, of prayer, fasting and burial. Pilgrimage to shrines, Hindu and Muslim alike, he regards as futile and hypocritical. He seems often to speak lightly of Hindu gods and Muslim prophets and saints as being of no account in the court of the Infinite.

NANAK YUSUF-NANALAL

In the social scale, he declares himself to be on the side of the poor and the lowly. For instance, he proclaims:

Lowly among the lowliest, indeed, the lowliest of all, Nanak is with them, he does not envy the big.

Similarly, he has many kind words to say about woman, the victim of oppression, denigration as well as ravishment in the feudal age, and unfortunately, to a considerable extent, even today. What is rather rare among men of religion, Guru Nanak takes note with intense pain and bitterness of the oppression and rape of his people by an invading army. He complains against the invasion and conquest of India by Babar in strong words addressed to the Almighty.

In the third category come compositions that portray the relation between God and man, the Guru and his disciple, in terms of human situations such as between man and wife, master and servant and bestower and receiver.

Thus Guru Nanak's genius ranges widely over a vast field of human relations, and yet it keeps itself fixed to the Divine as its fulcrum.

S.S.S.

NANAK YUSUF (Sindhi; b. 1783, d. 1853) was inspired by Sachal Sarmast. He belonged to Khokhar community and hailed from Larkana district of Sindh. He was as handsome physically as in mind. He could read and write in Persian as well as in Arabic. He had learnt the holy Quran and had mastered the Persian language.

There is a legendary tale associated with Nanak Yusuf. It is said that when Yusuf went to Nanakana Sahib along with six other pilgrims, the priest of that shrine died on that very day. He declared himself as the heir and wanted to ascend the gaddi. The disciples were angry and they put him to a fiery test to prove the genuineness of his claim. Having come out of it unscathed, he chanted the verse:

Hum guru te hum jnan, Nanak Lachhman mera nam.
(I am the guru, I am the knowledge. Nanak Lachhman is my name.)
After this incident his name was changed to Nanak Yusuf.

He was a great devotee of Sachal. They say that Sachal put him through many trials to find out if he had the making of a real spiritual man. Nanak Yusuf very humbly obeyed the injunctions, however difficult, and proved that he deserved the blessings of his 'Murshid'. After the passing away of the dervish poet Sachal Sarmast, Nanak Yusuf passed his days in peaceful meditation by the river-side and died in his village Agras with the name of his master on his lips. His dedication was complete and love limitless.

The poetry of Nanak Yusuf is, as it were, a repetition or an echo of Sachal's poetry, and is characterised by the same self-intoxication and exuberance as that of the master, containing the same sufistic thought and spiritual wisdom.

NANALAL (Gujarati, b. 1877, d. 1946) was a major poet of his times in Gujarati. He dedicated himself to poetry, resigning from his lucrative Government service. His father, Dalpatram, was also a renowned Gujarati poet. For about a century the father and the son contributed generously to the modern Gujarati poetry.

He evolved his own rhythmic style to free poetry from the shackles of prosody and described his new style as "a revolt of a young man against the imperialism of prosody, twenty two thousand years old". He ushered a new era in poetry. He sang of beauty, joy and eternal hope.

Poet Nanalal's contribution to various forms of literature like epic, plays, novels, contemplative prose writings, pen-portraits, criticism, translations, has been rich both in quality and in quantity. The period in which he produced his literary works is considered to be one of romantic renaissance in Gujarati literature.

He has some ninety-seven books to his credit, some of which are Ketlank kavya, part I Vasantotsava, ketlank Kavya Part I & IV, Indukumar, Nhana nhana rasa Part I, II, III, Jaya-Jayant, Chitradarshano, Rajashi Bharata, Prem-kunj, Prembhakti bhajanavali, Kurukshetra I-XII, Ardha shatabdina anubhavbol, Vishvageeta, Indukumar, Act II, Jehangir-Noorjehan Shahanshah Akbar, Dampatyastrotro, Kavishara Dalpatram, Harisamhita Mandalo etc.

He delved deep in the realm of the mind and self-consciousness. He laid stress on religiosity and spirituality, which to a great extent his poetry reflects. He wrote many a poem also in patriotic spirit. His poem 'The Ascetic of Gujarat' is dedicated to Gandhiji. His choice of words is occasionally grandiloquent, pompous, artificial and loquacious. But the series of images in his compositions like 'Full-moon night of Ashvin', 'Oneness sleeping in hundred petals of lotus', 'Marriage anniversary', 'Oh God, come!', 'A small bowl of flowers', 'Drizzles', 'Curds' and 'A woman in the prime of life' and some of his pen portraits where a good poetic work is done show marvellous results.

In his vision of life Nanalal was a lover of beauty, whereas his style of expression displayed the characteristics of romanticism and idealism. Search of God was the centre of his poetic activity. The bunch of his devotional poems shows his experience of intense longing for God.

Right from the time of Dalpatram, Narmad, Manhararam, K.H. Dhruv, etc. prosody was much in vogue in the genre of verse. Many a writer endeavoured to find a metre like blank verse for an epic poem. Narmad by his Virvrita, Manhararam by his Ramachhanda, Goverdhanram by his Katav, K.H. Dhruv by his Vanveli, Khabardar by his Mahachhanda (grand metre), Thakor by his flowing Prithvi examined the capacity of blank verse to suit the theme of their compositions. In spite of the difficulty in employment of Sanskrit metres in Gujarati language, their use increased continuously. It became inevitable to use the words in their original forms to suit the requirement of the compositions. Thus with an urge to write good plays all along and to compose an epic, Nanalal started his search of a 'mahachhanda' (grand metre). And he found out a unique style of a poetic composition that is neither verse nor prose and which others could not really use. His style described as 'dolan shaile' shows Nanalal's genius flowing vigorously like a cascade in the manifestation of his romanticism. The ascent and descent of free verse or the rhythmic style of prose became the best medium for his poetic experience. The rhythmic melody of his ras-songs set in traditional style of singing and imbued with the element of music and his masterly command over the rhymes in his metrical compositions are a great event in Gujarati poetry.

Meera, Dayaram and Nanalal are the three major poets of Gujarati lyricism. His contribution to ras and songs is unique. They have made the whole of Gujarat swing in joy. Nanalal's lyrics are best described by Umashankar Joshi as Gujarat's paragon of melody in words.

Umedbhai Maniar in his book on Nanalal says "Nanalal was a stylist and truly in his case the style is the man. Though he was open to the winds of the West, he was committed 'to live the poetry and history of India.' His poetry—lyrical, dramatic and epic—is thinly partitioned; and his prose if suitably placed and re-arranged could easily pass off as poetry in his own characteristic rhythmic style." Some of his devotional songs have the authenticity and intensity of personal experience and embody a transcendental vision touching the truly sublime.

But Nanalal was not content with merely writing lyrics, which to him was a prelude to his 'poetic plays' that provided him with a broader canvas. His grand epic poem Kurukshetra, is considered to be the height of his poetic achievement. His plays like Indukumar, Jaya Jayant, Jehangir-Noorjehan and Shahanshah Akbar, at least half a dozen cantos of the Kurukshetra, and a substantial body of his lyrical poetry including his songs and rasas, enough to fill up several volumes, reveal him as a literary genius.

In Indukumar Vasantostava, Jaya-Jayanti, etc. he has made a deep reflection on love, marriage and the matrimonial life. Some of his reflections are 'Wordly life is the greatest truth of the world/Matrimonial life is the greatest truth of worldly life'. 'Wherever there is a love marriage, there is a heaven in the world'. He reflected upon 'Tamsik' (wrathful), 'Rajsik' (passionate) and 'Satvik' (peaceful) love, and at the end of Jaya-Jayant, showed the fulfilment and sublimity of love as a dedication to the spirit of service. Similarly in Samsarmanthan (Struggle of worldly life) he has discussed some social problems. In Rajarshi Bharata and Ranagito (Warsongs), his heroic sentiments are manifested. In Kavya Triputi of Rajasutra (three poems of Royal aphorisms) he reflected upon the duty of the king towards the nation. History was his favourite subject, he composed Jahangir-Noorjehan and Shahenshah Akbar based on historical themes. He wrote a few poems on mythical themes, namely Rajarshi Bharata, Cantos of Kurukshetra, Vishvageeta and an epic poem Harisamhita. In Vasant Vijay (Triumph of Spring) and 'Atijnan' (Excessive knowledge), he has expanded and interpreted different aspects of mythical stories.

NANAPANCHAMI KAHAO (Prakrit) is an enormous book in 2000 verses, distributed over ten chapters of unequal length. Its author, Maheshvarasuri, is said to have flourished before A.D. 1053, which is the date of its earliest palm-leaf manuscript. The book deals with ten stories, illustrating the theme of the observance of the vow of 'panchami', which falls on the fifth day of the bright half of the month of Karttika. Those who observe this vow are said to attain not only worldly gains but also Moksha, made possible by right knowledge and right conduct. The tenth chapter gives the last story, entitled 'Bhavisayattakaha', which tells about the future results of the attainment of worldly gains and Kaivalya (Moksha), is supposed to have influenced the Apabhramsha book Bhavisayattakaha, composed by Dhanapala (about 10th-11th centuries).

The book throws light on the contemporary socio-religious conditions, the four fold institutions of the Sangha and the general nature of women, besides virtues gained by the observance of vows. The book is written in Ardhamagadhi Prakrit, and its style is both narrative and didactic. It is a distinct contribution to the religious literature of the eleventh century from the Jain point of view.

NANDA. PANDIT GOPINATH-NANDADASA

NANDA, PANDIT GOPINATH (Oriya, b. 1869) was a great scholar of Sanskrit and Prakrit literatures, the first philologist, lexicographer and a pioneer of literary research in Oriya.

Born at Manjusa (now in Adhra Pradesh) in a family of 'raj vaidya', traditional physicians who looked after the health of the royal house of Paralakemedi, he learnt Sanskrit at home. The profession of a physician did not attract him and he moved on to the realm of literature instead.

In his youth he became deaf which turned out to be a blessing in disguise as it enabled him to concentrate more on his studies and research. He was a profound scholar of Sanskrit, Telugu and Oriya. In 1910 he joined the Raj College at Paralakemedi as an Oriya pandit where he remained upto 1924. During this time he compiled three of his monumental works: Bhashatattwa, Shabda-tattwabodha abhidhan and Bharat-darpan. As a philologist and grammarian, he opened new avenues for further research. In Shabda-tattwabodha abhidhan he provided the meanings of words showing their origins with illustrative quotations from Oriya literature. His Bharatdarpan is an authoritative treatise on the Dandi Mahabharata, the first famous Oriya epic. His observation on the various aspects of this work are still valid. He also attempted to write a treatise on the Oriya Dandi Ramayana and the Bhagabata, but could not complete them. He translated many classical works such as Maghadutam, Kumara-sambhabam, Bikramorbashiya, Janaki-parinaya, Chaurapanchashika, Uttar Ramcharita, Unatta Raghava into Oriya. He also wrote short plays such as Mukundananda vana, Rasollasa and Radhamadhaba villasa. In most of his poems and translated works he used the Sanskrit metre instead of the Oriya metre. The language of Pandit Nanda's works is highly Sanskritised, gorgeous and complex.

FURTHER WORKS: Ramashwamedha, (1901), Sita Banabasa (1904), Pecyusadhara (Poem, 1904), Draupadi Bastraharana (1905), Billahaniya Kavya (1908), Oriya Bhasatattwa (1927), Kumarabijaya.

NANDADAS (Hindi; 16th c.) was one of the poets of 'Ashtchhap'. According to Dosau bawan vaishnavan ki varta, he was the younger brother to Tulsidas. It is said that Tulsidas inspired him to Ramabhakti, though he was formally initiated by Goswami Vitthal. It is said that his failure in worldly love turned him towards 'Krishna bhakti'.

The famous works of Nandadas are Ras panchadhyayi and Bhanwar git. Both these works have Shrimadbhagvata as their base. He has narrated the 'Raslila' of the Lord in Raspanchdhyayi in beautiful stanzas. He has taken up, in simple but attractive language, the Uddhav-Gopi episode of the Bhagawata in his Bhanwar git, and has given it some dramatic zest. His other books are Siddhant panchadhyayi and Shyam sagai. The former brings out the spiritual side of 'Ras', while the latter is concerned with the relationship of Radha and Krishna. The Manjari literature of Nandadas is also famous, comprising Rasmanjari, Anekarth Manjari, Man-manjari, Virahmanjari, and Rupmanjari. Rasmanjari distinguishes between the hero and the heroine; Anekarth-manjari and Man-manjari deal with the amorous sulking of Radha and her refusal to talk to Krishna. Virahmanjari describes an imaginary lady's pangs of separation. Rupmanjari is a ballad which reveals the hero's loftiness of love for a woman other than his own lady. From the view-point of poetic charm this Manjari is the poet's most attractive creation. In addition to these, Nandadas has also written Rukmini mangal and Dasham-skandh masa. He is also accredited with many songs which are available in collections of the 'Pusti' cult. In brief, Nandadas is a major poet of the 'Bhakti yug'. Being a devotee of a particular cult, he was a conscious artist in whose hands poetry acquired excellence of craft and beauty of expression.

V.R.P.

NANDADASA (Oriya) was a great devotee of the Panchasakha tradition. Nothing is known about his birth place. But he can be placed after Balarama Dasa and Dvaraka Dasa as they have been frequently referred to in his writings. His book Anakara samhita not only vividly describes 'brahmajnana' or the 'nirguna brahma upasana' but also recounts the life story of certain reputed poets of Orissa like Balarama, Jagannatha, Achyutananda and Ananta. It is undoubtedly a major work in philosophy which deals with things like penance, sacrifice, idolatry, belief in spirits and priesthood.

In introducing himself the poet tells us that he was born in the Tretaya Age when he accompanied Rama to Lanka. He also mentions his association with Srikrishna in Dvaraka in the Dvapara Age. He further states that in his previous life he was also Sarala Dasa, Balarama Dasa and Achyuta Dasa. In the seventh chapter of his Anakara samhita he indicates his own name.

Suryanarayana Dasa in his book, History of Oriya Literature (Part-II), places him in the 18th century. He passed his days mostly in the worship of nirguna brahma and in the service of man. He was very critical of the existing social customs and traditions. He had, therefore, to suffer a lot. He led a pious and saintly life. His book Anakara samhita has not yet been properly edited and many of his nirguna bhajanais still remain unpublished.

NANDALIKE LAKSMINARAYANA–NANDANAR CHARITTIRAKKIRTANAI

NANDALIKE LAKSMINARAYANA (Kannada; b. 1870, d. 1901), the author of the famous Ramashvamedham, was a transitional figure whose deliberately chosen antique style and manner only thinly disguised the modern spirit in the treatment of traditional themes. This combination of tradition and modernity produced a peculiarly delightful amalgam and resulted in a literary work, unique by virtue of the self-taught and highly individualised style of writing and manner of treatment he evolved for himself.

Born of poor parents, he had his early schooling in his native village, Nandalike, in Udupi taluq of the South Kanara District. With his hopes of continuing his English education thwarted by indigence, he joined a teachers' training institute and qualified to be a primary school teacher. The authorities of the Institute, however, deputed him, because of his robust physique, to train himself as a physical instructor, which he did. In that capacity for a pittance he worked for the rest of his short life, except for a very brief while at the end as a Kannada Pandit. It was ironical that poverty should have compelled him to continue in a job totally incompatible with his innate and irrepressible love of poetry and his equally irrepressible desire to cultivate poetic composition on his own.

The deep and early impression which the songs of the 'yakshagana', the indigenous and popular musical dance-drama of the region, had left on his mind probably led him to compose on his own. Encouragement from Malali Subbarao, a senior teacher in the school, who became his literary mentor, helped him complete his first original work, Ratnavati kalyana, a yakshagana based on Harsha's Sanskrit play. Subbarao's personal library gave him the opportunity to pursue his study of the classics of poetry and grammar—a study which enriched his vocabulary and helped him develop a style based on earlier models. Soon followed another yakshagana, Kumaravijaya, based on the Skandapurana version of Shanmukha's exploits. The writing won appreciation, but being too literary for the folk stage, it was never performed.

Encouraged by such success in writing, Muddana wrote during the last eight years of his life his three works Adbhuta Ramayanam, Shriramapattabhishekam and Ramashvamedham. The first is a condensation in prose of the Sanskrit purana story which depicts Sita as the symbol and embodiment of Adi Shakti (or primordial power) that destroyed the thousand-headed Ravana, who sprang from the dead ten-headed one, and against whom even Rama was powerless. Shriramapattabhishekam, though started as a preliminary to narrating in verse the later Ramayana story, stops at the coronation. The rest of the story, Rama's Ashvamedha sacrifice and Sita's restoration, becomes Ramashvamedham, his masterpiece. The narrative is put within the framework of exquisitely delightful exchanges between Muddana, the young poet who narrates and Manorama, his young wife who listens and who with her lively responses and interruptions enlivens the narration.

Muddana's charm is in his style and manner of narration. The writing stands midway between poetry and prose. Its structure and movement are modern, while the diction is deliberately archaic. Lest his works, if offered for publication as his own, should be rejected, he passed them off as others' works found by him. The style was a deliberate disguise to conceal his identity. The trick worked only for some time. Soon the first of the moderns was discovered to be wearing the cloak of the ancients.

V.M.I.

NANDANAR CHARITTIRAKKIRTANAI (Tamil) is a classic in Tamil music literature. Literally, the title means the story of Nandanar set to music. It is an opera and the only one of Bharati's few works available in print. It is a masterpiece on the story of Nanda, the untouchable saint. Basing his story on Chekkilar's Periapuranam, Bharati has made his work more vivid and entertaining by introducing 134 kirtanas, 5 kathas, 13 tantakas, 14 chindus, 17 kannis and 1 duet, besides a few poems and prose pieces intervening as in champu to fill up the gaps in the narration.

In Chekkilar, Nanda is an untouchable of Atanur, filled with Shiva bhakti.. He went to Tiruppankurai to worship Shiva in the temple, but being a low caste, he would not be allowed to go in. Nandi, Shiva's bull, obstructed his vision, and the dismayed disciple prayed to the Lord who ordered the bull to keep away. Nandi did as ordered and Nanda worshipped God. Next he went to Chidambaram, and here the temple authorities, as ordered by God in their dreams, asked Nanda to take a fire bath, and after Nanda had done so, he emerged as a brahmin with ash marks on his body and wearing a holy thread round his neck. The bewildered authorities followed him soon. They found Nanda had vanished! His body and soul merged into the Infinite!

Bharati made one important change in the story by introducing a brahmin landlord, who always ridiculed Nanda and his devotion to Shiva. Only when he saw, as in a miracle, all his fields transplanted in a single night, did the brahmin repent and give Nanda permission to go the Chidambaram.

The story is rich with the varied elements of humour, anger, sadness and wonder. It highlights the value of true devotion and condemns the vice of untouchability. When such a moving story is set to music and sung by an expert author, no wonder it will draw large audiences from far and near.

The kirtanas in the book are important landmark in the history of Tamil kirtanai literature. Some of them are sung even today, e.g. 'Vali maraittirukkude malaipole oru matu patuttirukkude' (The path is obstructed by a mountainous bull lying down), 'Misai naraitthuppoche kilava achai narakkalakado' (The moustaches have grown grey but not the desires), 'Tillai talamenru cholla todankinal illai piravip pinium pavamum' (Once you say tillai you stay to the circle of births and to sins.)

NANDAPUKAR, N.G.—NANDIKESHVARA

R.B.

NANDAPUKAR, N.G. (Marathi; b. 1909, d. 1956) was an eminent scholar of ancient Marathi literature, who specialized in the Marathi language and folk-literature. He was a Professor of Marathi at Osmania University in Hyderabad. His comparative study of the Marathi versions of the Mahabharata by Mukteshwar and Moropant, and the original Sanskrit version is marked by scholarship. His books Mukta mayuranchi bharate and Marathi Mahabharatache swatantrya also bear the mark of his scholarship. He advocated that these Marathi versions were not translations, but independent poetic creations.

He shows excellent understanding of folk literature in his books, Maherache Marathi (1953) and Marathicha mohor (1956), collections of folk-songs and Lakadi sasuni etargoshti (1954), a collection of folk-tales. A history of Marathi literature written by him in the folk style, Mayabolichi kahani (1947), is quite popular. He also wrote poems that are collected in the books Vangamaya vilas (1928) and Mazi Marathi (1965).

In recognition of his great service to Marathi language and literature, he was made President of the Marathawada Sahitya Smmelan held in 1955 at Parli. He was also a member of the Sahitya Akademi Advisory Board for Marathi.

T.S.K.

NANDI (Sanskrit) is a term denoting the benedictory verse or song preceding the actual commencement of the play. Derived from the root 'nand' (to rejoice), the term etymologically means 'rejoicing' or 'satisfaction'.

Nandi is a kind of blessing or benediction, pronounced as a prologue in a Sanskrit play. Generally, the benedictory verse found at the beginning of a play is called a nandi.

According to Bharata, nandi is so called because it always contains blessings of gods, brahmins, kings, etc. (Natyashastra, V. 24-25). He further elucidates that by the recital of nandi, God Chandra (presiding deity, the noon) is delighted. Sagarananandin explains this statement: Chandra being repository of all rasas, his satisfaction bestows success on the proper production of all sentiments in a dramatic performance. Later authorities have further extended the connotation of nandi to mean that it is so called because on hearing its recital, the poems, the poets, the actors, and the audience—all are delighted ('nandan-ti'). Removing the obstacles to a dramatic performance is another purpose of the recital of a nandi.

Much has been discussed in the classical texts on dramaturgy about the form of a nandi. According to Bharata, a nandi should contain the blessings of gods, brahmins, kings, etc. and should have, as its components, eight or twelve padas (Natyashastra, Ch. 5). The extent of a benediction has been much disputed by later authorities, depending on various interpretations of the term 'pada'. A pada may mean an inflected word ('sup-tinanta'), a line of a stanza (shlokapada), or a proposition ('avantaravakya'). Abhinavagupta allows three, six or twelve padas in a benediction of three times, four, eight or sixteen in one of four times. He seems to have taken pada as a proposition. Sagarananandin accepts both 'inflected word' and 'line of a stanza' as pada as allowed by Bharata, but rejects 'proposition' as an unorthodox view.

Some authorities also opine that a benediction should hint at the theme of a play ('vastunirdesha'). So attempts have been made by commentators to extract from the benedictions references to the main characters and to the chief events.

The question of the existence of the nandis as the opening verses of standard Sanskrit plays is still quite complex. The Natyashastra prescribes a set of elaborate preliminaries ('purvaranga') to be performed before the actual dramatic performance begins. The recital of the nandi by the stage director (sutradhara) being one of the items of the preliminaries, has to be performed in the green room. The nandi verses, therefore, need not be composed by the playwright. This place of the nandi among the preliminaries is well exhibited in the plays of Bhasa which commence with the statement, 'Then the stage director enters after the nandi ('nandyante tatah pravishati sutradharah'). But other Sanskrit dramas, including those of Kalidasa and Bhavabhuti, open with benedictory verse or verses followed by the statement "after the nandi" (nandyante) indicating that the preceding verses constitute the nandi. Visvanatha Kaviraja (Sahityadarpana, Ch. 6) refuses to accept the opening verses of plays like Vikramorvashiya of Kalidasa to be nandi and calls them 'rangadvara' (The beginning of the drama).

The elaborate rituals of the preliminaries of a play gradually fell out to practice, but nandi being a very important part of the purvaranga, was shifted to the main body of the play and continued to be composed by the playwright himself.

S.M.

NANDIKESHVARA (Sanskrit) is a name which has wide ramifications in the cultural history of India in both myth and history. As a mythical figure, it is mentioned as the Bull, Shiva's vehicle in the 'Anushasan Parva' of the Mahabharata. His association with Ravana is described in the Uttarakanda of the Ramayana. His origin and ceremonial 'abhisheka' are discussed in the Lingapurana. His role in the destruction of Daksha's yajna is described in the Bhagavata-purana, and he is frequently mentioned in the Shivapurana.

Nandikeshvara or Nandin is also the name of numerous authors in many disciplines. They flourished in different parts of India at different times before the Christian era and upto the 17th century A.D. Thus Vatsyayana cites Nandikeshvara as an authority on Kamashastra. Nandikeshvara is an honoured, prolific writer on Jyotisha (astrology). Several works such as Aksharaprashna, Kalottara, Rashyadilakshana, Rashinakshatra phala and Shakuna come under the authorship of this name. He is cited as an authority by Bhatta Utpala in his commentary on the Brihatsamhita. One Nandikeshvara, author of Ganakamandana and son of Vedangaraya, belonged to the 17th century. An author of Prabhakara vijaya, a work on Purvamimamsa, is also known by this name. Nandikeshvara is also an acknowledged authority on grammar; he is cited by Kshiraswamin in his commentary, Kshiratarangini, on Amarakosha, and by Sayana in his Dhatuvritti. He is also cited in Ganaratna mahodadhi. A work on ophthalmology, Netraprakashika is ascribed to Nandikeshvara. Vagbhata refers to an authority of this name on medicine in his Rasaratnasamuchchaya. The famous work on the yoga, viz., Yogataravali, also called Nandikeshvarataravali, is also a work of Nandikeshvara. An author of this name composed a work of fiction, Simhasana-dvatrimshika, which is an anthology of stories narrated by the thirty-two dolls, bearing the legendary throne of Vikramaditya. Nandikeshvara is also cited as a lexicographer by Vishvanatha Vaidya in Koshakalpataru and by Rayamukuta in his commentary on Amarakosha. Rajashekhar cites the author of this name as an authority on rasa. Nandikeshvara is quoted as an authority on tantra (Nandikeshvara samhita) in Tarabhaktisudharnava. Nandin is a respected promoter of the mixed mode (mishra) in Shrividya tantra.

Nandikeshvara is regarded highly as an ancient authority on Virashaivism, and such works as Pashupata tantra, Shivakarpurastava, Shivadharmapurana and Shadaksharasevachanopavasa and Lingadharanachandrika are ascribed to his (or his namesake's) authorship. Another text called Lingarchanachandrika speaks of a Nandikeshvara as the son of Maheshwaradhyaya. Other works ascribed to this name include Nandikeshvara tilaka, Nandikeshvara mantra, Nandikeshvara samhita, Nandikeshvarastava, Nandikeshvara stotra and Nandikeshvara ashotottarashatanamavali. An important Virashaiva source book, Nandikeshvarapurana, classified as a minor purana, includes smaller works, such as Kalagnirudra upanishat, Dashashloki, Durgapuja and Shivastotra.

Nandikeshvara is a highly honoured ancient authority on Indian music and dance also. He is the author of a work called Taladhyaya and another one called Talalakshanam. He is cited in the Brihaddeshi by Matanga on 12-tone scales in Abhinavabharati by Abhinavagupta on chitrapurvarangavidhi (special propaedeutic prelude to dance), in Sarasvathihrdayalankarahara by Nanyadeva on the kala and the four margas of kala, in the Sangitaratnakara by Sharngadeva on special manual techniques on percussives, in Bhavaprakashana by Sharadatanaya, etc. The following works on dance are ascribed to Nandikeshvara and are available: Abhinayadarpanam, Bharatarnava, Bharatarnavasangraha, Karanabhushana, Nandibharata, and Guhesha Bharata.

Abhinaya darpanam and Bharatarnava are among the most important works ascribed to Nandikeshvara, but their authors seem to be different because the corresponding subjects are differently treated in them. Abhinayadarpanam is the older and the shorter of the two and is held in high esteem by dance exponents. It is a descriptive handbook written in a clear, direct and succinct style. The available text is incomplete and may be placed between the 8th and 11th centuries A.D. The 324 verses of this text are not chapterised.

Bharatarnava, on the other hand, was composed probably in the 12-13th century A.D. Its text, though descriptive, is better organised. It is written in the 'purana' style and includes discussion of earlier works. An important difference from Abhinayadarpanam is the description of several provincial dance forms and extracts from 'nritta' compositions in 'pata' syllables, and its 992 shlokas are segmented into 15 chapters. An important reason to ascribe different authorships to these works is the variance in the treatment of the same or similar material. This includes varieties of head movements, glances, stances (especially samapada, ekapada, garuda and nagabandha), leaps, 'charis' and 'hastas'.

NANDI, N.R. (Telugu) is one of the brilliant novelists of Telugu literature today. His novel Nyimi sarangam, which deals with the problems of Harijans, is considered to be the best novel in Telugu on Harijan problem next only to Malapalli of Unnava Lakshminarayana. The novel Drishti on the problem of clairvoyance brought him name and fame abundantly. His dramas Punyastali, Vana velisindi, etc., won many prizes and awards in many drama competitions. He worked as a script writer for many Telugu films. His drama Maro Mahenjodharo is a good experiment in modern Indian drama. Nandi selected the names of the characters in this drama according to their temperament, behaviour and personality. It was translated into eight languages, and hundreds of performances were given in these languages. Nandi spends his time in writing novels, stories, etc., of social purpose in order to awaken the backward and distressed people of India. He has won many laurels and awards for his works.

NANDIK KALAMPAKAM–NANDY, JYOTIRINDRANATH

NANDIK KALAMPAKAM (Tamil). The term 'kalampakam' denotes a garland made of different flowers. Hence a work that consists of several features of varying content and form within it, was aptly termed so. Panniru pattiyal (Twelve-prosody), the grammatical work gives the salient features of kalampakam, and also the total number of verses it should contain. But while it enlists 13 topics and the later works raise the number to 18, the kalampakam literature consists actually of even more topics.

Nandik kalampakam was the first to appear in this genre. The format was the author's own invention, and it formed the basis for grammar written later.

The author's name is not known, but he was a contemporary of the Pallava king, Nandivarman III. Several myths have been spun around the author and his work. One goes like this: Nandivarman had four step-brothers who conspired to kill him. One learnt mantra, another tantra, another sword fight, and still another the art of poetry. The poet was skilled in a particular type of verse called 'aram patutal'—a sort of pun on words that had an overt praise and a covert curse. The myth goes that the king listened to every verse, hiding under a canopy made of fresh green leaves. On the completion of every verse, the canopy was swallowed by fire. When the penultimate verse was sung, the king performed all the rites due to a dead body and lay on a couch made of fire wood. When the last stanza was sung the fire broke out and consumed him. This myth exists as a proof for the king's thirst for literature and love for language even at the cost of his own life.

This work was first published in 1872. Again in 1927, Gopala Iyer of Madurai Sangam published the work that consisted of an introduction and notes on the curse-verses alone. In 1959, S. Rajam's publication came. The latest, 1965, contains elaborate notes by Punnaivana Nata Mudaliyar and Ramasamy Pillai.

All the verses are in praise of the king, but instead of a monotonous poet's voice, imaginary situations such as a love-stricken lady sending a message to the king through a bird or a cloud, are depicted. Different situations form the different features of the work, namely Dutu (messenger), Puya Vakuppu (valour), Irankal (painful feeling), Matal (suicidal attempt), Arruppatai (putting in the path), Uchal (swing), Kalam (time), Champiratam (magic), Matanku (drum), Maram (valour) and Panan (bard). Out of the 18 enlisted in the Pattiyal works as the features of a Kalampakam work, only these 11 are present in this pioneering work. Also, the general pattern of antati—the technique of having the end-phrase or word or letter of the previous song as the beginning of the following song throughout the work—is followed by the author in general, except in a few places.

The literary merit of the poems by way of imagination, similes, metaphors, etc., is unsurpassed, as in the following pieces of translations. A lady-love who is angry with the bard, since she considers him responsible for her lover's going astray, tells him one day:

"O bard of Nandi, the famous king,
Hearing you from my sister's home, sing,
'Ghost' cried my mother, 'fox' the others,
'Dog' said my friend, 'Nay, the bard' said I".

A love-stricken lady laments:

"They poured upon me what they called sandal paste But oh, it was an extract from red hot fire."

To give a few examples for the phrases typical of 'Aram': Mantalam which means 'the world' in the ordinary sense, will denote 'increasing sorrow', if interpreted as 'Mantu Alam'. 'Tiruutiyum' which means, 'the royal crown' will denote 'cessation of wealth' when separated as Tiru (wealth) and Mutiyum (will end). 'Kariyay ninray manna,' which means, 'O king, you stood witness (to...)', will mean "a destroyed man", when 'kari' 'black' is interpreted in a different way.

NANDY, JYOTIRINDRANATH (Bengali; b. 1912, d. 1982), passed his Matriculation examination in 1930 from a school at Brahmanbadia (now in Bangladesh) and joined Victoria College at Kumilla (also in Bangladesh). His involvement in freedom movement disrupted his education to some extent. In 1936 he went to Calcutta. He had no fixed occupation; he worked for a short period as a clerk with the Bengal Immunity and J. Walter Thomson. Later, he worked for some newspapers like Jugantar, Azad and Janasevak.

He started writing even when he was a student. His first story came out in Bangabani, a journal published from Dhaka. The story of 'Nadi o nari' appeared in Parichay in 1936. It was an immediate success. In 1946 he published Khelna, a collection of short stories. By the late forties and the fifties he became famous as one of the outstanding story-tellers in Bengali.

In 1948, his novel Suryamukhi was serialised in the Desh. Jyotirindranath has a keen perception and an intense knowledge of the world he describes. He deals with the life of the people who belong to the low-income group (Baro ghar ek uthon, 1955), but even then his preoccupation is to excavate the inner soul of the folk, where each man differs from the other and lives essentially as an individual and less as a member of a community or a class. His masterly portrayal of emotional crisis may be found in Mirar dupur (1958), Bananir prem (1953), Nil ratri (1958), Grishmabasar (1960), Nischintpurer manus, (1961), Pasher phlater meyeta (1961), Chandramallika (1962), Nihanga jauban (1964) and Nir (1969). His published works number more than fifty. His Khalpol o tinergarar chitrakar (1960) and Shalik ki charui (1964) have added a rich flavour to Bengali short stories. The short story 'Girgiti,' beside others, remains an unforgettable portrayal of his conception of beauty.

NANDY, PRITISH (English; b. 1947) is an Indian English poet. He was educated at Presidency College, Calcutta, where he lived at one time and from where he edited Dialogue. At present he is the editor of The Illustrated weekly of India. He is the most experimental of the Indian poets writing in English today. He has published over forty volumes. His collections of poems include Of Gods and Olives (1967), On Either Side of Arrogance (1968), I Hand you in Turn My Nebbuk Wreath (1968), From the Outer Bank of the Brahmaputra (1969), Masks to be Interpreted in Terms of Messages (1970), Madness is the Second Stroke (1971), The Poetry of Pritish Nandy (1973), Dharatrashttra Downtown Zero (1974); Lonesong Street (1975), In Secret Anarchy (1979), A Stranger Called I (1976), The Nowhere Man (1977), Pritish Nandy 30 (1978), Tonight this Savage Rite (1979) and Riding the Midnight River (1975). He has edited anthologies like Indian Poetry in English Today (1973) and Modern India Poetry (1974). He has also translated a number of poets like Amrita Pritam, Kaifi Azmi, Samar Sen, Subhash Mukhopadhyay, Agyeya. He has also rendered into English the devotional songs of Kabir and Mirabai. He has edited two collections of short stories. His voice of protest against the contemporary setting becomes quite obvious in his translations, Voice from Bangla (1971) and The Last Poems of Tagore (1973). He has written a verse-play as well.

Pritish Nandy turns his poems into songs, and makes use of assonance, half-rhyme, word-melody. By using Cummings' style-spacings, he gives his poems new stylistic effects. He has attempted prose poems also which have both a lyrical fervour and an immediacy of feeling. His themes are love, death, suffering and loneliness.

B.R.N.

NANGA RUKH (Dogri), the second Dogri novel by Omprakash Sharma 'Sarathi' and published in 1978, got the author the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979. It broke new grounds in both content and style, and marked a significant development in the history of Dogri fiction. It has been translated into English, Hindi and Punjabi.

It is an unusual novel in the sense that it is not a conventional piece of narrative fiction written in a conventional style with plot and characters. It is, instead, a sequence of situations, piquant and interesting and often tantalising, through which a sensitive and questioning consciousness runs and illumines the contemporary social scene.

The composition, as it emerges, shows the city divided between the dark-half (the poor, the neglected, the exploited segment of society) and the brighter-half (those people who have usurped even the bare necessities of life that the other half needs so badly). These are monstrous automatons replacing workers, 'mahatmas' and so-called 'devis' with supporting muscle-power controlling vantage points and places of worship, men in masks playing the game of catchy slogans and deluding credulous masses of human beings fragmented in their personalities and related to nothing. The book raises certain fundamental questions about the human situation.

The style of the novel is quite engaging: short, clipped sentences, interspersed with bits of dialogue, investing the whole thing with a dramatic immediacy, brisk movement of lines, a tongue in cheek irony, and effective strokes of comment. All this strengthens and deepens our awareness of the changing face and values of the city, and presents a sketch of the churning of the city which is also the churning of the consciousness of man.

NANJUNDA (Kannada; b. 1560) holds an important place on account of his work Ramanatha charite written in the sangatya metre. Unlike the earlier Kannada poets, he has actually selected a historical theme for his work and handled it successfully without sacrificing the poetical aspects.

Nanjunda belonged to a family which was well-known for gallantry and his ancestors served as ministers in the court of Chandal. Nanjunda's father seems to have embraced Shaivism, whereas his brother, Mangarasa, continued to be well-known as a Jaina poet. One of the uncles of Nanjunda, known as Vijaya, is said to have sacrificed his life in a battle for the sake of his king. All these go to show how Nanjunda imbibed the qualities of a valiant soldier and the talent of a poet from his elders. It was quite natural that he was attracted by the story of Kumara Rama who was held in high esteem by his followers for his valour and virtue.

The hero of Ramanatha charite is Kumara Rama who is known to have lived before the establishment of Vijayanagar kingdom. He was a Beda by caste and was a soldier. His father Kampila has been recognised by the historians as a great warrior and we come across a few inscriptions throwing light on his heroic deeds. It is learnt that Kampila was ruling from Hosamaledurga situated in Bellary district and Kummatadurga was one of his important forts standing on the banks of Tungabhadra in the vicinity of Anegondi. The Muslims who were able to capture Devagiri, Warangal and Hoysala territories were unable to defeat Kampila due to the unpenetrable natural fortresses around his country. He resisted them three times. Kumara Rama is said to have taken a major role in all these battles. Besides, Kampila had the good fortune of having a wise minister known as Baichappa who was greatly helpful to his master at the crucial times. The Sultan, of Delhi was bent on putting down Kampila as he had given asylum to his nephew Bahaudin Gustaph. It appears that Kumara Rama fought very bravely in the last battle till his last breath. When the royal family came to know about the death of Kumara Rama and learnt that the fort was captured by the enemies, all of them, both men and women, gave up their lives plunging into fire. The enemies were just able to catch Hakka and Bukka who were in charge of the treasury under Kampila. Leaving behind a Muslim agent to look after the conquered territory, the enemies returned to Delhi with the two captives. As per the history it is learnt that Bahaudin Gustaph had fled from that place seeking the protection of Ballala III, who was helpless and could not save him since he was already under the mercy of the Muslims. Ultimately Bahaudin was caught by the Muslims and he was burnt alive. In the meantime, the Muslim agent appointed to look after the conquered territory of Kampila could not get on smoothly. The Muslim authorities were obliged to send Hakka and Bukka to take care of the Hindu territory on behalf of the Muslims. In due course, Hakka and Bukka became powerful and they proclaimed their independence severing their connection with the Muslims. Some scholars are of the opinion that these two brothers, Hakka and Bukka, were mainly responsible for the foundation of Vijayanagar empire. In course of time it so happened that Kampila's younger queen Ratnaji fell in love with Kumara Rama, attracted by his beauty. She tried her best to win his love and failed miserably. She became furious and did not hesitate to level false charges against Kumara Rama. She complained to Kampila that Kumara Rama attempted to outrage her modesty when the king was away. The old Kampila who had a fascination for his younger wife, was naturally upset and he did not hesitate to order his faithful minister, Baichappa, to cut off the head of Kumara Rama without delay. But, the wise minister, who could not pacify his master in any way, acted most cleverly. He concealed Kumara Rama in an underground cell much against the will of the prince in the interest of the state. When the news of Kumara Rama's death by his own father spread far and wide, the enemies who were watching for an opportunity, waged war against Kampila. Then Kampila realised his fault and fervently appealed to Baichappa to save the kingdom at any cost. At the time, Baichappa brought out Kumara Rama under disguise as a valiant soldier and with his help the enemies were defeated. Soon after the victory, Kampila came to know that the valiant soldier who won the battle was no other than his own son, Kumara Rama. Ratnaji did not dare to live longer after this revelation and committed suicide. Though the whole incident does not find any place in history, it has the sanction of the great reverence of the people for Kumara Rama.

Unlike the previous Kannada poets, Nanjunda directly selected a historical theme and tried his best to mould it in the form of an epic. Still, he seems to have been forced by circumstances to give a mythological touch to his historical theme since Kumara Rama had come to be considered a demi-god by his time. Consequently Kumara Rama is portrayed as Arjuna reborn and Ratnaji as Urvashi, who is born again intently to take revenge upon Arjuna who did not yield to her persuasions in her previous birth. This conception of reincarnation is stretched to such an extent that Babamma, the daughter of the Sultan of Delhi, is said to be Draupadi born again to fulfil her love for Arjuna solely for herself, which she could not attain in her previous birth.

The work consists of 49 Cantos running very nearly to 5,000 stanzas. The whole work is devoted to depict the life of Kumara Rama. The work is known as Ramanatha chairte as well as Kumara Rama charite. The first one-third of the work is set apart to describe the birth, boyhood and the earlier achievements of Kumara Rama. This is followed by the episode connected with Ratnaji, which occupies the other one-third of the work. The rest of the work deals with the last two battles waged by the Muslims against Kampila. Ratnaji episode is the most attractive portion of the work. Nanjunda handles it in such a manner that it reveals the voluptuous nature of Ratnaji on the one side and the unblemished character of Kumara Rama on the other. The particulars about the costumes of men and animals are equally interesting. Many of the customs referred to in the poem reflect indirectly the social life of his days.

The story of Kumara Rama does not end with Nanjunda's monumental work. Two other later poets known as Panchala Ganga and Mahalingaswamy have dealt with the same theme with a few alterations here and there. Even these poets have written their works in sangatya metre which is flexible and hence well-suited for singing. Although the scholars are of the opinion that sangatya metre is fit only to depict shringara rasa, these works may be said to be an exception to this, as 'vira rasa' is also depicted by the poets. Perhaps all the three poets might have preferred this metre for its inherent musical quality in order to immortalise the deeds of Kumara Rama.

NANNAYA BHATT

NANNAYA BHATT (Telugu; b. 11th century), the first among the classical Telugu poets, is believed to have been a poet laureate in the Court of Raja Raja Narendra, a Chalukyan king with Rajamahendravaram (now Rajahmundry) as his headquarters. Nannaya Bhatt was a gifted poet with a versatile genius, well-versed in Telugu and Sanskrit and perhaps in Kannada too. He had a Kannada friend, Narayana Bhatt, who helped him in his composition of Andhra Mahabharatam. While acknowledging his help, Nannaya says in the preamble that Narayana Bhatt was to him as Krishna was to Arjuna in the battle of the Mahabharata. Nannaya not only enjoyed the royal patronage, but was also very close to the king who was all admiration for the poet laureate. It was at the instance of Raja Raja Narendra that Nannaya undertook the translation or transcreation of the Mahabharata.

The Sanskrit work is a great book with one hundred thousand verses, eighteen parvas and a number of episodes knit together with the main object of advocating righteousness as the greatest virtue of humanity. It was therefore not an easy task to render this great work into Telugu, particularly when Telugu language had no literary tradition of its own. Some form of literature no doubt existed before Nannaya, but it was mostly in the form of folk-songs and folk-tales. In order to present a decent and dignified version of the Mahabharata, which is acclaimed as the fifth Veda, it required a pioneering brain and a palatable heart to mould the literature of a language so that the foundations laid could last long. Fortunately Nannaya had all this equipment and his patron king, Raja Raja Narendra, observed these qualities in Nannaya with a discerning eye.

When Nannaya undertook the translation of the Mahabharata, Sanskrit language was dominating over the local idiom. He had therefore to evolve an equation which would enable both Sanskrit and Telugu not only to live together but also mix with one another. Choice of suitable metrical patterns for the Telugu language was also a problem which Nannaya had to face. He borrowed a number of metres from Sanskrit and gave them a local colour. He refined the local tunes popular among the masses and gave them a presentable shape in classical poetry. It was he, who started the tradition of combining prose with poetry as a characteristic feature of Telugu classics. He had also to establish an adaptable system of translation which would enable the readers not only to understand and appreciate the original, but also to enjoy the translation as an original form of expression. In order to achieve this, he exercised a reasonable and desirable freedom in abridging a few portions in the original and elaborating a few others according to his taste and a general sense of propriety. It is gratifying to note that this method of translation was followed by almost all the Telugu poets till the end of nineteenth century. His aim was not to present a verbal translation, but to communicate the sense and spirit of the original in a homely way to the native readers. It is because of this pioneering work done by Nannaya that he is acclaimed as the 'Vaganushasana' an administrator or ordainer of speech.

Nannaya must have laboured hard to lay the foundation of a classical diction for Telugu literature and this preliminary work alone must have consumed a considerable amount of time and energy in his life. Therefore he could only render the first two Parvas (Adi and Sabha) and a part of the third one (Aranya Parva). It was nearly two centuries later that the composition was continued by another eminent poet called Tikkana. Till then the work remained unfinished. But the foundation laid by Nannaya was so strong that he provided inspiration to several poets who succeeded him. Apart from his contribution to the grammar and prosody of the Telugu language and literature, Nannaya demonstrated three great qualities of any classical writing, particularly epic writing. He himself mentions these three qualities in his preamble to the work. The first among these qualities is a pleasant and palatable form of narration which he calls 'prasanna katha kalitartha yukti'. It is very difficult to achieve poetic success in narrative poems. While narrating stories, the tendency is to focus more attention on the events and ignore the purport. The events and the purport should go hand in hand and the presentation should be pleasing to the average reader as well as to distinguished scholars. This art of narration with a purpose in a pleasant manner is the characteristic of Nannaya's poetry. Perhaps he borrowed this from Valmiki. Nannaya was also fully aware of the fact that he was writing an itihasa and not a kavya. He was also aware that the style of an itihasa had to be different for different languages. He had therefore to evolve a new method of narration for his Telugu rendering of the Mahabharata which served as a model for his successors.

The second characteristic of Nannaya's poetry can be described, in his own words, as 'akshara ramyata'—right words at the right time by the right persons in an upright and appealing manner. This ideal which Nannaya had before him while transcreating the Mahabharata, made his work very popular. Even the highly philosophical truths were expressed in a soft and sophisticated language. The average reader may not understand the meaning of the words employed, but the presentation invokes the spontaneous appreciation of the readers.

The third characteristic of Nannaya's poetry is 'ruchirardha sukti'—refined expression of axiomatic truths. The Mahabharata is said to be an encyclopaedia of Indian culture. It contains not only poetry and history, but also ethics, philosophy and other disciplines connected with human experience. But these truths have to be expressed without making the readers conscious of them. They should form the part and parcel of the story and its narration. In order to achieve this, Nannaya adopts different styles of expression. Sometimes he simply narrates the story, sometimes he makes an elaborate description as is done in poetry and at times he presents a dialogue and makes it dramatic. But whatever style he adopts, he exercises commendable restraint and tries to observe the law of modesty in all his artistic expression.

Among the various episodes handled by Nannaya in the partial translation of the Mahabharata, the story of Shakuntala, Devayani, Shishupala and Maya Sabha are worth mentioning. He chooses words, metres and the method of narration according to the context. Suggestivity is the key note of any poetic composition and Nannaya achieves this in more than one way. The vocabulary metre, dialogue, characterisation and the figures of speech—all contribute to the evolution of suggestivity (dhwani), the greatest quality of any artistic expression.

In addition to the translation or transcreation of the Mahabharata, Nannaya Bhatt is believed to have written (i) Chamundika vilas, (ii) Andhra shabda chintamani, (iii) Indra vijayam and (iv) Lakshana saram. His Andhra shabda chintamani is the first grammar of Telugu language written in Sanskrit. This was commented upon by Balasaraswati (1575-1626) and also by another scholar, Ahobal Pandit, in the beginning of the eighteenth century. This grammar is based on Panini's Ashtadhyayi and is very concise consisting only of eighty-eight Arya metres. There is a difference of opinion among critics about the authorship of these four books. But Andhra shabda chintamani is definitely the work of Nannaya. It is only natural that a poet who laid the foundation for the classical writing in a language should have thought of writing a grammar also for the language. The foundation laid by Nannaya is providing strength to a number of poets even today—nearly one thousand years after his death.

NANNECHODA (Telugu; b. 12th century). The period between Nannaya and Tikkana is generally called the age of the Shaiva poets because three great poets that lived during this period wrote works enunciating the tenets of the Shaiva cult without attempting to complete the translation of the Mahabharata begun by Nannaya. The first of these Shaiva poets is Nannechoda who wrote Kumarasambhava, the first great original prabandha in Telugu. He belongs to the dynasty of the Velanati Chola kings. He is the son of Srisati and Chodaballi and the disciple of Jangama Mallikarjuna and called himself Tenkanadity (the sun of the south and the lord of Orayavin). Karikalachoda, the first king of this dynasty, bore these titles and the kings that succeeded him also used them before their names. Nannechoda mentioned that his father was the lord of 21000 villages in Pakanadu and critics are of the opinion that the number 21000 denotes the people and not the villages. No other historical dates about him are given in his book. Late Manavalli Ramakrishna Kavi, who first published this work in 1910, states that Nannechoda lived prior to Nannaya who is generally regarded as the Adikavi in Telugu. This caused great commotion among the critics; in determining the date of no other poet in Telugu have so many articles been published and so much discussion taken place. Even today the question remains unsettled. He seems to have lived in the first half of the 12th century.

Nannechoda bears the title 'Kavirajasikhamani' which he highly deserves. He was very much devoted to Shiva as well as to his guru. No other details about his life are available either in his work or elsewhere.

NANNOOL (Tamil) After the great ancient Tamil grammatical work Tolkappiyam, followed by a long pause, there emerged during the early period of the present millennium (of the Imperial Cholas) a series of grammatical works, namely Neminatam (after the Jain Tirthankara) by Gunavira Pandita, Viracholiyam (after the Chola king Virra Chola) by the Buddhist Buddha Mitra and Nannool (meaning 'good grammatical work') by the Jain Bavanandi Muni of the 12th century.

The significant factor in the development of Tamil grammar during the Chola period is the fivefold classification. Prosody and poetics, included in the 'Porulatikaram' of Tolkappiyam, developed into separate branches, and the need of the day was a comprehensive treatise on all the five. The Nannool must have been an attempt to fulfil that need since the prologue in Nannool speaks about the treatment of all the five in the work. But the available book consists only of two, namely, the Eluttu (Phonology) and the Chol (Morphology).

The Nannool stands foremost among the grammatical works in Tamil. Even from the days of the British it had been included in the curriculum as text book for students of various standards. It served also as a reference book for Caldwell while writing his comparative study of Dravidian languages. It was also the first Tamil grammatical work to be translated into English by many scholars.

The salient features are its brevity, clarity, lucidity, assimilation of new concepts without discarding old theories, and acceptance of the development and changes in the language.

NANTHANAR

The present edition consists of three sections, namely, the Payiram (Introduction), Ezhuttatikaram (Section on Phonology) and Chollatikaram (Section on Morphology) which respectively are made up of 55, 202 and 205 sutras. The Payiram is a later interpolation. Ezhuttu consists of 5 subsections and Chol 6.

Among the six in Chollatikaram, the order followed in many editions is Peyariyal (Ch. on Noun), Vinai iyal, (Ch. on Verb), Potuviyal (Ch. General) Itai iyal (Ch. on Middle Words), Uri iyal (Ch. on Lexical items). Some consider Potuviyal as consisting mostly of exceptions in the grammar of the language (similar to the Echchaviyal in Tolkappiyam which is kept in the end) and hence, place it at the end.

The popularity of the work may be understood when one thinks of the numerous commentaries written on it. There are 44 commentaries, of which 6 are not yet printed; 13 are referred to, but not available; and among the rest, 22 are written from the period of Mayilainatar to the close of the 19th century, and 3 written in the 20th century. Among these, 6 are by the Ceylonee.

The work has been translated into English by Ranius, Walter Joyce, Samuel Pillai, Aurnachalam Pillai, Henry Power Iyer and Lazarus Iyer.

The importance of the Nannool lies in its recognition of the changes that occurred in the language after Tolkappiyam and adoption of the new ideas in language study. The principles of syllabification—the phonemic sequence—and the enumeration of adverbial participles are examples for his acceptance of language changes. The Pataviyal (Ch. on the study of words) which deals with the segmentation of words and Tamillization of Sanskrit words, employs new ideas and techniques in language study. Therefore, this is the grammatical work for the present day literary Tamil to a large extent.

The commentators of Nannool are Mayilai Natar, Antippulavar, Sankara Namachchivayar, Sivagnana Munivar, Kulankaithampiran (of Ceylon), Visakap Perumal Ayyar, A. Muttuttampip Pillai (of Ceylon), Ramanuja Kavirayar, Vedagiri Mudaliyar, Tirupprkatal Natan, G.U. Pope, E. Samuel Pillai, K.P. Soundara Nayakam Pillai (of Ceylon), Arumuga Navolar of (Ceylon), Satagopa Ramanujacharyar, Gopalacharyar, Saravana Muttuppulavar, and Kumarasamippulavar (of Ceylon).

NANTHANAR (Malayalam; b. 1926, d. 1974) is the pen-name of P.C. Gopalan born at Angadipuram in Malapuram district as the son of C.V. Parameswara Tharakan and Nanikutty Nanga. He was an outstanding novelist and short story writer in Malayalam. After studying in the local high school he joined the army in 1942, and was in service for 25 years. Nanthanar was a prolific writer with nine novels and about sixty short stories to his credit. Many of them lay bare before us the life of soldiers and present colourful scenes from military barracks. His first short story 'Moitheen', was published in 1923.

Ariyappetatha manushya jivikal (Unidentified human beings, 1956), Atmavinte novukal (Pains of the soul, 1963), Anubhuthikalude lokam (The world of emotions, 1964), Manhakkettitam (The yellow building, 1968), Ayiravallikkunninte tazhvarayil (In the valley of Ayiravalli hills, 1971) and Anubhavangal (Experiences, 1975) are his novels.

Ariyappetatha manushyajeevikal is the story of five Keralite youths in a signal regiment in Srinagar in Kashmir. Lance Nayak Thomas who was demoted as sepoy and who had lost his leg while working in an electric line, and P.K. Nair who lost his life on the banks of the river Jhelum, are characters in the story that touch our hearts.

Though Unnikuttante oru divasam (One day in the life of Unnikuttan, (1966), Unnikuttan schoolil (Unnikuttan at school, 1967) and Unnikuttan valarunnu (Unnikuttan grows, 1969) are also novels in form, they are to be classified along with children's literature. They are set in a peculiar world of the little child Unnikuttan and are written in a simple style.

Nanthanar's short stories have been published under the titles Akasama telinju (The sky has become clear, 1955), Sneham niranja kuppukai (Folded hands with love, 1956), Thokkukalkkityeile jivatam (Life among the guns, 1957), Nellum patirum (The grain and the chaff, 1957), Jivitattinte ponnalaqal (Golden rays of life, 1958), Nishkalankathayute atmavu (The soul of innocence, 1961), Mister Kulkarni (1965) and Our varshakala ratri (A night in the rainy season, 1969).

Through his stories Nanthanar could unfold the vivid scenes and characters of the war front and military camps. In 'Jivitavum maranavum' (Life and death) he gives a clear picture of the heroic resistance of Indian soldiers during the Chinese aggression. 'Manushyanum mrigavum' (Human beings and animals) is a story written against the background of the Hindu-Muslim conflict.

But Nanthanar is more interested in going deep into the lives of the soldiers and in depicting their personal desires, pleasures and sorrows. Kunnilakshmi who is eagerly awaiting the arrival of her husband on leave in 'Tokkukalkitayile jivatam', Devaki who sees her former lover as Nayaka under her husband in 'Captante bharya' (Captain's wife) and Satyabahama who could not marry the person whom she loved, but enjoys life in the family quarters with her husband and children in 'Vedanikkunna manassum yadhardhyangalum' (The sorrowful mind and the realities) are representative wives of the soldiers.

The story of Nayak Kartar Singh in 'Tikacchum sainikamaya rantu jivitangal' (Two purely military lives) is very pitiable. He was demoted as Sepoy on the ground that he did not have the educational qualification, though he had been awarded the certificate of I.D.S.M. for his meritorious service earlier. But he is not at all discouraged because he is alone. His wife and the only son were killed in the communal riot at Multan.

There are a number of stories based on themes altogether different from the above type. In 'Nettiyile vatu' (The mark on the forehead), a poor mother throws her son down a ladder, in her helplessness to face the allegation that it is because of the greed of her son that a boy of the neighbouring rich family has stomach disease. 'Achhan' (The father) narrates the feelings of a soldier about the changes that have taken place in his life within a few years after his joining the army, especially about his becoming a father.

Nanthanar has also written three short plays Huen Tsang, Prashnamavasannikkunnilla (The problem is not solved) and Oru kudumbam pirakkunnu (A family is born) published under the title Oru kudumbam pirakkunnu in 1957.

NAOTHINKHONG PHAMBAL KABA (Manipuri) is a manuscript assigned to the first part of the early period of Manipuri literature. The literal meaning of the title is 'the accession of Naothingkhong to the throne'.

Hongnemyoi Khunjao was the name of Naothingkhong before he became king. He was the third of the four sons raised by Urakonthouba, the Meitei king and Nongchensu, his queen. The prince stayed away at the place of his young and pretty wife, Petanga Liklu Louthibi, the daughter of the Langmai chief and settled on the slopes of the Langmai Hills situated on the east of the Meitei region. During this time, the Langmais, who had no right of way, crossed the Meitei territory by force to raid a few villages situated on the far away Koubru Hills and tried to kill a Meitei fisherman whom they found on the way. This provoked Urakonthouba, who with his armed men waylaid the Langmais when they returned and put them to death with only ten of them giving the slip. Those who survived informed their people of the savage deed of the Meitei king. They decided to take revenge on the Meitei prince who was staying with them. At the dead of night the infuriated Langmais, armed with deadly weapons, surrounded the houses of their chief and demanded the person of the Meitei prince. Thereupon, Langmai Petanga came out, tried to pacify the angry mob and begged mercy, but in vain. Unruffled she requested her close relatives to grant a little time so that she might prepare a few delicious dishes and offer them to her sweet-heart. Having got these short but precious moments the young couple exchanged parting love and also promises that they would remain constant. The prince escaped. Losing patience the rowdy Langmais broke into the house. When they did not find the prince there they pursued him for a long distance. As instructed by his beloved, the Meitei prince first sought shelter in the capital of the Khuman king who gave his daughter to the prince in marriage. The Moirang king, too, did likewise. Thus the prince with his two young consorts began to lead a comfortable life. But the old Khuman king did not want the heir apparent to the Meitei throne vegetating in this way and sent him off to the court of the venerated Luwang king to study the vast Meitei lore. At that time Urakonthouba died and Hongnemyoi Khunjao was sent for by his mother to succeed to his father's throne. Meanwhile, Pitanga Liklu Louthibi who had been pining for her love since their separation felt greatly shocked at her not being remembered at all. She came down to the Meitei capital and found her prince sitting along with the Khuman princess on the throne. Unable to bear this she committed suicide before the royal couple. Her soul left the mortal frame and became a divine being whom generations of the Meiteis have worshipped since then.

The work, a combination of history, legend and myth, is an excellent artistic creation. The descriptions are moving. They are as aptly and skilfully arranged as the filigree work of a master goldsmith. All this together with the deft portrayal of Petanga Liklu Louthibi, make the work stand out distinct in the old Manipuri literature.

It was first published only in 1967 after being transliterated from Manipuri script into that of Bengali and edited by N. Khelchandra Singh.

NARA SINGH (Manipuri), a play by Lairenmayum Ibungohal Singh, was written in 1922 but published much later in 1952.

Nara Singh is a historical play based on the life and achievements of Nara Singh otherwise known as Awa Ngamba, the defeater of the Burmese. He was the king of Manipur during 1844-1850. The state of Manipur was overrun by the Burmese for seven long years (1819-1826). This period is known in the history of Manipur as the Seven Years of Devastation. Nara Singh and his elder brother, Gambhir Singh, took shelter in Cachar and with the help of the king of Assam regained the throne of Manipur. Nara Singh was modest and not very ambitious.

NARAHARI-NARANG, GOPI CHAND

After the death of his elder brother, Gambhir Singh, people wanted him to be the king. But he refused and made the infant Chandrakirti, son of Gambhir Singh, the king of Manipur, himself remaining his protector. But palace intrigues compelled Chandrakirti to run away with his mother to Cachar and Nara Singh became the king. The play deals with all these episodes and tries to highlight the magnanimity, sacrifice and noble-mindedness of Nara Singh.

This play is one of the earliest in Manipuri. The style is verbose and ornate and there is an influence of Sanskrit and Bengali plays on the style and language. In fact, the language is strewn with Bengali and Sanskrit words. In keeping with the taste of the period the playwright inserted in the play a good number of songs. This play is a landmark in the development of Manipuri drama.

NARAHARI (Gujarati), also known as Narharidas, was a medieval Gujarati poet of the 'Jnan-dhara'. He was a native of Vadodara, and is said to have had the same guru (teacher) as Akho (a major poet), Gopal and Butio had. There is no evidence to support this belief, though all the four are poets of the same period and belong to the same 'Jnana' tradition. Narahari uses the term 'Brahma' 'Sri-guru brahma chaitanya prasad' to indicate, if at all, the name of his guru. Gopala explicitly names his guru as Somaraj.

Narahari is a philosophical poet, and his language is mature and capable of lucid exposition of terse philosophical concepts. Linguistically, his language is considered by experts like K.K. Shastri to belong to the fourth satge of middle Gujarati. His works include Prabodha-manjari, Bhagvad-gita (1621), and Vasistha Gita-sara (1618). His Anand ras, Gopi-Uddhava samvad, Kakko, Jnan Gita, Bhakta-manjari, Masa, Santanam Lakshana, Haritralamrta and Hastamalaka are still found only in manuscripts.

S.Y.M.

NARANG, GOPI CHAND (Urdu; b. 1931), a Professor of Urdu at Delhi University and a National Fellow, is a leading scholar, literary critic and linguist of Urdu. His work covers wide areas of interest ranging from the influence of Indian thought and culture on Urdu poetry, and Indian folk-tales in Urdu 'masnavis' to modern Urdu poetry and fiction. Born in Dukki (Baluchistan), he received his early education in Musa Khail and Leiah, and moved to Delhi for college education, where he completed his Master's degree from Delhi University in 1954. He was awarded Humanities Research Fellowship and took his Ph.D. in 1958. He started his academic career as a lecturer in Urdu at St. Stephen's College in 1957 and moved to the department of Urdu, Delhi University, in 1958, where he was appointed Reader in 1962. The following year he went to the United States as a Visiting Professor at the University of Wisconsin, where he worked from 1963 to 1965, and taught a second term from 1968 to 1970. He also taught at the University of Minnesota for some time. During this period he pursued his study of Linguistics and took summer courses at the Indiana University, Bloomington. He participated in the 27th International Orientalists Congress held at Michigan University in 1967 as the official delegate of the Government of India. He was made a Professor of Urdu in Jamia Millia Islamia University in 1974, where he taught till 1986, and also worked as Acting Vice Chancellor of Jamia during 1981-82. He rejoined the University of Delhi in July 1986.

Narang's critical works fall into three categories: (i) Language and Linguistics, (ii) Classical Urdu literature and (iii) Modern Urdu poetry and fiction. His published books numbering more than twenty-five, prominent among them being Urdu ki ta'lim ke lisaniyat pahl, (1960), Karkhandari Dialect of Delhi Urdu (1961), Hindustani qisson se makhuz Urdu masnaviyan (1962), Readings in Literary Urdu Prose (1968), Imla namah, (1974), Puranon ki kahaniya, (1976), Anthology of Modern Urdu Poetry (1981), Urdu Afsanah, Rivayat aur masa'il (1981), Safar ashna, (1982), Usloobiyat-e-Mir (1985), Saniha-e-Karbala bataur sheri istiara (1986), and Amir Khusrau ka Hindavi kalaam (1987).

Gopi Chand Narang's literary criticism is marked by a high degree of originality and depth of thought. His distinguishing feature is his application of stylistics and structuralism to Urdu literary criticism by which he has provided new insights, and a new awareness of tradition and modernity in Urdu literature. In 1978, he was awarded the President of Pakitsan's Special Gold Medal for his work on the poetry of Iqbal. His other honours include Ghalib Prize on "Indian Folk Tales in Urdu Masnavis" (1963), Association of Asian Studies Award for promotion of Urdu Language and Literature in the Universities of the United States (1982), Aligarh Alumni Association Award for Distinguished Achievements in Urdu Language and Literature (1982), Ghalib Award (1985) and Khusrau Award (1987). A widely travelled person, he has delivered lectures at the Universities of London, Prague, Chicago, Berkeley, Los Angeles, Columbia, Arizona, Colorado, Minnesota, Cornell, Pennsylvania, McGill and Toronto. A noted broadcaster and telecaster, Narang is acclaimed for his contribution to the Urdu literary studies.

NARASARAJU, D.V.-NARASIMHA SWAMI, KIKKERI SUBBARAO

NARASARAJU, D.V. (Telugu; b. 1920), who graduated himself from Madras University, earned a name for himself as a playwright and actor even when he was a student. He was awarded a gold medal by the university for standing first among the graduates in Telugu in 1941.

Narasaraju came into limelight when he won the first prize for his play, Natakam (based on 'The Play is the Thing' by P.G. Wodehouse), in the drama competition held by Andhra Nataka Kala Parishad in 1951. That play won the first prize for the best performance also.

His playlet, Vapas, exposes the defects of the present system of education which cannot provide employment to the youth.

Veelunama (A will), Antarvani (The inner voice), Yee illu ammadununu (This house is for sale) are some of his other plays and playlets. He selects his themes from ordinary incidents of day-to-day life and exposes the evils, fallacies and problems in the society in such a humorous way that we laugh at our own weaknesses identifying ourselves with some of the characters of the play.

D.V. Narasaraju is introduced to the Telugu film field as a dialogue-writer through the film 'Pedda manushulu' (Honourable men) which was based on Ibsen's play 'The Enemy of the People' and directed by the late K.V. Reddy. Then onwards he has written dialogues for a number of films most of which have become box-office hits. So far he wrote scripts for nearly a hundred films. He received the best story writer's award more than once. Some of his stories were filmed in Tamil, Hindi, Malayalam and Oriya.

A.S.R.A.

NARASIMHA RO MEHERO (Rajasthani) deals with the life and works of Mehata (Narsingh), the famous Saint-poet of Gujarat. A number of compositions dealing with the subject are available in Gujarati and Rajasthani out of which the one written by Ratansah is perhaps the earliest and the most famous. Scholars like K.K. Shastri hold the traditional view that he lived between 1413 to 1479. On the other hand K.M. Munshi puts the dates between 1500 to 1580. Further researches are necessary to arrive at an exact date. Irrespective of the dates, the author's Mahero has earned him wide popularity and great eminence. 'Mahero' is a custom under which relatives on the parents' side of a married girl are expected to give her presents on the occasion of the marriage of her children. The custom is also known as 'Bhat' in Rajasthan. It is the sacred duty of every family to perform the ceremony with due honours failing which the lady feels insulted in her in-laws' house, for she would not like any indignity to be cast upon the name of her parents.

The story of Mahero rests on such an episode. The late Narattamdas Swami edited the work written by Ratansah. The story runs thus: Nani Bai, daughter of Narsiji, was married in a family at Anjar in Gujarat. On the occasion of her own daughter's marriage, she sends an invitation to her father but advises him to come only if he has funds enough to perform the mahero's. She would not like to see him humiliated for putting up a poor show. But despite her advice Narsiji reaches Anjar with his retinue of saint-disciples. He firmly believes that Lord Krishna will definitely come to his help. Thus assured, Nani Bai awaits Krishna. To avoid her in-laws' jeering remarks, she goes to the village tank to fetch water where she sees her brother, Krishna, arriving in a chariot. The Lord performs the custom and her heart is filled with joy and pride.

This work of Ratansah, because of its great popularity, has seen a number of editions and consequently it is heavily padded with interpolations. This is clear from a comparative study of different editions. One may compare, for instance, the 1895 edition from Bikaner (Anup Sanskrit Library, Bikaner, copy No. 50) with the edition of 1918 from Rajgadh by Ruliram Sharma Pujari. Some other important editions are: 1. Narasi Mehta ka bada mamera, edited by Sivakaran Ramaratan Darak (Gangavishnu Shri Krishnadas, Bombay, 1955) and 2. Narasi Mehta ko Mahero, published by Shyamlal Hiralal (Shyam Kashi Press, Mathura). Besides Ratansah's Mahero, there are two more Maheros one attributed to poet Basant (19th century Vikram) and the other to Miran Bai, edited by J.N. Trivedi, Jodhpur. The authorship attributed to Miran Bai is, however, absolutely unfounded.

Hi.M

NARASIMHA SWAMI, KIKKERI SUBBARAO (Kannada, b. 1915) is a poet and prose writer, renowned in Kannada as the author of Mysore mallige. He was educated at Mysore and Bangalore. He had to drop out of college when he was hardly 19. He took up a job under the Mysore Government in 1937 and retired from service in 1970. Early in life, inspired by B.M. Sri's English gitagalu, he developed a passionate love for poetry and wrote his first poem 'Kabbigana koogu' in 1931 which was published by A.R. Krishna Sastry in 1933. The rare talent of the young poet was first discovered by A.R. Krishna Sastry and T.S. Venkanniah. Most of his Mysore millige group of poems were first published in Prabuddha Karnataka, and he won instant fame when they were published in book form in the same year. Subsequently, he has brought out his poems in eight other collections. An omnibus volume of his works appeared in 1986.

NARASIMHACHAR, D.L.

Although Narasimhaswami is famous as the poet of youthful and tender love, the poet of flowers, and moonlit nights, he has revealed an extraordinary progression in his vision and artistry, in his ability to draw on fresh and varied experiences and in his talent for painting vivid images. Even as early as in Bhumigita and Panditana mancha (1947) his poetry had acquired a heightened intensity of rhythm and imagery. But it is in the later collection that we notice the real take-off point. Gana-mandiradalli impresses us by its refreshingly concrete images. The way an auditory experience (the music of the veena player) is transfigured into fanciful pictures forming a charming fabric, is a rare feat of art. The first three collections are a remarkable achievement. But the greatest phase of the poet's career is yet to begin and with Shila late the poet finds himself at the cross roads. Here, to the surprise of many, he seems to be reaching forward to the technical ingenuity of the Navya School. The new trend is to be attributed partly to the younger generation of readers for whom the poet is writing and to the poet's own maturing sensibilities and his growing awareness of the complexity of life and the mystery of death. 'Gadiyara-da angadiya munda' (Shila lata) and the poems in Terada bagilu establish the poet's technical mastery. In the former poem, the poet describes how he is confronted with the baffling complexity of time, time which is a continuum, time that was, when the earth and the moon were made, when the seasons changed, long before man joined the primaeval pilgrimage, Time that no chronometer can measure. Terada bagilu finds the poet, once again, brooding on the theme of death. The protagonist 'experiences' the confrontation with death. The mistakes are cleared and all is well at the end. But the thought that death has made an attempt in his direction shakes him. The irony and the humour, the dramatic twists and turns, are all there. But the way they are made to reflect a universal human predicament is what makes the poem enduring. The range of Narasimhaswami's diction and imagery is limited but with this he manages to cope with a wide range of experience. And in all these poems the intensity of experience stimulates his power of analysis and exploration. And with a poem like Terade bagilu, our poetry reached a watershed.

Narasimhaswami commands an exquisite prose style as evidenced in his Upavana, a collection of reflective essays the aim of which is, obviously, 'to lead the mind into new trains of thought.'

He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for his Terada bagilu in 1977.

FURTHER WORKS: Poetry: Airavatha (1945) Deepada malli (1947), Ungura (1949), Iruvantige (1952), Maneyinda manege (1960), Nava pallava (1985); Prose: Mariya kallu (1942), Upavana (1958), Damayanti (1960), VI.SI. avaru (1971); Translation: Mohana male (1956) Nanna kanasina bharata (1961), Prapanchada balyadalli (1965), Madia (1966), Huckleberry Finnana sahasagalu (1969), H.K.R.M.

NARASIMHACHAR, D.L. (Kannada; b. 1906, d. 1971) was a noted Kannada scholar and researcher. He had his early education in Tunkur and higher education in Bangalore and Mysore. After taking M.A. in Kannada and Ph.D. in Virashaiva Literature from Mysore University, he joined the Department of Kannada of the same University as Pandit, and later retired as Professor in 1962. He served in various capacities in Mysore and Osmania Universities and also in the Education Department. He was a U.G.C. Scholar from 1962 to 1969. He took D.Litt of Mysore University in 1969.

Narasimhachar was elected President of the 41st Kannada Literary Conference (1960) at Bidar. Jnanopasa-ka, a felicitation volume of research articles was presented to him. Again in 1970, he was felicitated by the presentation of a collection of research articles entitled Upayana. The erstwhile Mysore government also honoured him in 1967 with a state award.

Narasimhachar was the Chief Editor of the Kannada-Kannada Dictionary and also served as Chief Editor, Prabuddha Karnataka, a research magazine of Mysore University.

Acharya is known as an erudite scholar and an ardent student of literature. His edition of Bheeshmaparva (Kumara Vyasa) set standards in editing classics. He also edited with a scholarly introduction, Siddarama charita sangraha, Kesi Raja's Shabdamani darpana, Sakala vaidya samhita sarana and Vaddaradhane. With his experience of teaching for 40 years, he continued his research in the field of Kannada literature pertaining to epigraphy and old Kannada. The fruits of his thought-provoking criticism, reviews, scholarly introductions, mastery over prosody, linguistics, have all emerged in one big volume—Introductions and other writings. Also his research work on textual criticism (Kannada grantha sampadane), and a scholarly commentary on Pampa bharata by the name of Pampa bharata dipike and Shabda vihara are major achievements. He was an erudite scholar in Kannada, Sanskrit, Pali and Prakrit and equally at home in English.

His Kannada granthasampadane deals with topics relating to editing an epic, prose and poetry in various traditional ways. His exposition of how to determine the origin of an epic and the different methods by which textual criticism can be studied (Krama Patha, Jata Patha, Veda Patha, etc.) and the numerous illustrations testify to his scholarship.

Pampa bharata dipike is a commentary on Vikramarjuna vijaya of Pampa. The work not only interprets Pampa's epic but goes into the minutest particulars in the descriptions and pays close attention to words and phrases. He held that the imagination has to build on a solid foundation of facts.

Shabda vihara, a small book but rich in information, is again an anthology of research articles.

N.K.R.

NARASIMHACHAR, PUROHITHA TIRUNARAYANIYENGAR (Kannada; b. 1905) is a Kannada poet, short-story writer, writer of operas, essayist and critic. He is among the important Navodaya poets of modern Kannada literature. He was born in an orthodox family in Melkote renowned for its scholarship in Sanskrit. After his education at the elementary school and the Sanskrit Pathashala at Melkote, he took his B.A. degree from the Maharaja's College, Mysore. Philosophy and Sanskrit were the special subjects which he studied under teachers like Professor Hiriyantha. He joined the Army administrative office of the then Mysore government (1926) and retired after 34 years. He was also for sometime an editor in the office of the state legislative assembly. His poetical works include Hanathe (1933), Mandaliru (1936), Sharada yamini (1944), Ganesha darshana (1947), Rasa Saraswiti (1954), Male degula (1955) and Hridaya vihari. Among his prose writings are Ramachariya Nennapu (1931), a collection of delightful essays, stories and sketches, Dwajarakshane, an anthology of short stories, Rathasapthami, a handful of vignettes and skits, Eechalumarada kelage—a delectable collection of reflective essays. Narasimhachar is eminent among the very few opera writers Kannada has had, and his celebrated works in the genre include Ahalye (1941), Gokula nirgamana (1945), Doniya binada mattu kavi, Shabari Harinabhisarana and Hamsa Damayanti. He has also written four plays—Vikatakavi vijaya and Satyavana Harishchandra being the most notable among them. He is also a critic of rare perceptiveness and acumen. His Rasaprajne and Kavya kutuhala clearly reveal his indebtedness to Sanskrit rhetoricians and poetics; his critical thoughts provide an excellent introduction to his poetry.

His Hamsa Damayanti mattu itara roopakagalu was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1966, and Mysore University conferred on him an honorary doctorate degree in 1971. He presided over the Kannada Sahitya Sammelana held in Chikmangalore in 1981.

In reading the poetry of Narasimhachar one is constantly aware of a profoundly sensitive personality with his roots deep in the ancient culture and the time-honoured human values of our land. He firmly believes that the supreme power of God governs our life, shaping and guiding our thoughts from moment to moment. He is often troubled by teasing thoughts of doubt and questioning. But he can always resolve the conflict through his strong and abiding faith in the supreme wisdom of the Omnipotent Power. He says in one of his poems.

My mind struggles with misgivings about you
But my heart rejoices in comprehending you

He, like the ancient Indian rhetoricians, believes that 'Poetry is to be regarded first and foremost as a means of securing a spell of detachment from common life and not for any lessons or 'criticism of life' it may contain. The aim of poetry is not to provoke or excite the mind but to soothe and assuage a high-strung state. The thinking mind of man must resolve the conflicts through its own resilience, its own meditateness. He does not think that a poetic experience is an end in itself. An event in the physical world, or an experience, acts as a mere catalyst in so far as it attracts the poet's imagination to hover around it. What abides in his poem is not the basic thought or the germinal idea but the dialectics of the meditative mind. Take for example his celebrated poem 'Neralu' (The shadow). The poet sees an eagle flying aloft and the shadow of the bird fleeting swiftly below touching land, water, housetops, clumps of trees and thickets. The untiring speed of the bird knows no obstacle. From this mundane thought the mind leaps forward to contemplate on Gandhiji, his heroism and courage. Like the eagle in its unabated flight, the heroic Gandhi could bestride the land as if moved by the will of God (Hariya chitta). Thus we find here that the structure of the poem is made up of the abstract thoughts engendered in the poet's mind by the flying eagle. Similarly his 'Yadugiriya maunavikasa' begins with a description of silence manifesting itself at different points in the valley of the temple town and finally resting in the sanetum sanctorum of the temple where the sudden silence of the singing devotees evokes the poet's serious reflections on life and death.

Narasimhachar believes that the language of poetry must be shorn of all colloquialism and regional vagaries and through a continuous process of refinement a poet must forge a language for poetry.

The poet's mind, so deeply moored in the hallowed milieu of the past, naturally finds the framework of mythology and legend suitable material for poetry. His operas like Ahalye and Gokula nirgamana make use of the atmosphere and the characters of the Ramayana and the Bhagavata not only to recreate the myths but also to explore them in order to find a new meaning, a new vision.

NARASIMHACHAR, R. (Kannada; b. 1861, d. 1936) was a distinguished scholar and researcher of Karnataka. After his M A from Madras University, with Kannada as major and Tamil as minor subjects, he worked for a time as translator to the government of Mysore. Subsequently, he entered the archaeological department as an assistant to the famous B.L. Rice, the then director of the archaeological department. He succeeded Rice in 1906 and retired in 1922. He is a scholar in Kannada, Sanskrit, Tamil and English.

Narasimhachar's important work is Karnataka kavi charite in three volumes (I: jointly with S G Narasimhachar, 1907, II: 1919, III: 1929). The work took him thirty-five years. This work, a history of Kannada literature, demanded the patient and thorough study of a daunting mass of material of varied types—edicts, inscriptions, palmyra leaf manuscripts, other types of manuscripts and historical evidence. The three volumes together extend to a thousand pages and throw light on 1148 poets, spanning a period of more than a thousand years, from the eighth century to the nineteenth century. The work received enthusiastic appreciation from Lewis Rice, G.F. Fleet and L.D. Barnett.

Narasimhachar's work covered many areas of study. In all, he is said to have studied some five thousand inscriptions during his tenure. He published several hundred inscriptions. He paid attention to numismatics, and identified several coins. He started the practice of issuing annual reports, and these contained among with other studies, the fruits of his study of Dravidian and Hoysala styles of architecture. He distinguished the Hoysala style from the Chalukyan style. Under his guidance his department accelerated the collection of manuscripts. It is said that two of Bhasa's plays, Swapnavasavadatta and Pratijnayaugandharayana, were discovered by the department before they were published in Travancore. Narasimhachar studied several works and either edited and published them or wrote about them. He edited, with helpful notes, Shasana padyamanjari, a collection of 1463 poems culled from the edicts and epigraphs he had studied.

Narasimhachar also rendered into Kannada more than 6000 poems from Tamil and published them in a collection entitled Neetimanjari. His Nagegadalu (1898) is a collection of humorous stories about five simpletons.

Many honours were bestowed on this great scholar. The British Government conferred two titles, Rao Bahadur and Mahamahopadhyaya: the Maharaja of Mysore conferred the title of Praktana Vimarsha Vichakshana and the All India Literary Conference at Calcutta honoured him with the title of Karnataka Prachya Vidyavaibhava in 1915.

Narasimhachar presided over the fourth Kannada literary conference at Dharwad in 1918.

L.S.S.R.

NARASIMHACHAR, S.G. (Kannada; b. 1862, d. 1907) was one of the pioneers of modern Kannada literature. Even before S.M. Srikantia's epoch-making talk at Dharwad on the rejuvenation of Kannada (1911), Narasimhachar made concrete suggestions for standardizing Kannada (1907).

Narasimhachar completed undergraduate course and studied Sanskrit and English. His early influence was his teacher, Pandit Periaswamy Tirumalacharya, who was a great scholar. Narasimhachar worked as teacher and later in the department of education as a translator. With a view to enriching Kannada literature he translated a number of poems from Sanskrit and English. The following have survived: Preshita priyasamgam (Trans. of Goldsmith's The Hermit, 1869), Dilipa charite (Trans. of the first three cantos of Kalidasa's Raghuvamsha), Ajannipa charite (trans. of cantos 4-7 of Raghuvamsha, 1899), Allavuddin mathu adbhuta deepa (the story of Aladin and the Wonderful Lamp, for children, with 48 illustrations), Uttara Ramacharitam (trans. of the three acts of Bhavabhuti's play; 1900). Bharata vira charite comprises life-sketches of nine great persons in Indian history.

Narasimhachar also translated Swift's Gulliver's Travels (Galiva rana deshasanchara) and some of Aesop's fables (Nithikathasara). The story of Shakespeare's The Taming of the Shrew was narrated in Gayyalayannu sadhu naduvike.

He contributed articles to periodicals like Vidyadayini and Suvasini. As librarian of the Oriental library in Mysore he brought out critical editions of Pampa's Adi purana and Rudrabhatta's Jagannataha vijaya. He collaborated with M.A. Ramanuja Iyengar to edit old Kannada classics like Gadayuddha Mallinataha purana, Leelavati prabhanda and Karnataka panchatantra and with R Narasimhachar to edit Karnataka kavicharite.

He introduced some English romantic poets to Kannada readers and experimented with new metres. Some of his original poems were included in school readers published by M. S. Illan.

All the poems of Narasimhachar have been brought together in the Poems of Narasimhachar (ed.: T.V. Venkatachala Sastry; p. 1 B H Bangalore, 1986).

M.V.S.

NARASIMHADAS, TI (Kannada; b. 1809) was a great composer of songs. He was the son of Anchay Tyagaraja, the great composer of songs. He was well-versed in Sanskrit and music also. For his services he was employed as a 'Peshkar' at Ponnur.

It so chanced that one day a holy man who imparted to him the 'Ram mantra'. From that day onwards, inspired by the 'Ram mantra', he gave himself up to the glorification of Ram by song and worship. He resigned his job because it proved an obstacle to him. He started composing songs of devotion and went about singing them to popularise the Bhakti cult.

During the time he set out with his family on a pilgrimage to the south he visited Kanchi, Srirangam and other centres of pilgrimage in the south. He composed songs on the deities of all the temples he visited. In Madras he visited the temple Parthasarathi Swamy and worshipped the deity. From there he proceeded to

NARASIMHAIAH, C.D.-NARASIMHARAVU, MUNIMANIKYAM

Tiruvathiur where transported by the songs of Tyagaraja he composed extempore the following verse;

Who can excel Tyagaraja in his devotion to Rama?
If he but called out to the lord, the lord
Would respond to his call at once.

Of his disciples, two were the most important. One was Alluri Venkatadri, and the other, Nagandla Varada Rama Dasu. Accompanied by them he visited Bhadrachalam where he lived the rest of his life. He composed several hymns to Rama and his consort and sang them himself. At that time the offerings and services to Rama arranged by Gopanna with the permission of Thanisha ceased owing to neglect. But with the efforts of Narasimhadas they were resumed again.

The songs and hymns of Narasimhadas were characterised by a deep awareness of the other world, devotion to Rama and an understanding of the essence of Vedanta. The songs are varied, some purporting to wake up the lord in the morning, some lullabies sung to put the lord to sleep and some songs of benediction (Mangala Arati). All his songs are sweet and simple, and they are sung even today at many temples or by groups of devotees singing together the glory of Rama.

Narasimhadas spent the rest of his life at Bhadrachalam as a devotee of Rama.

NARASIMHAIAH, C.D. (English, b. 1921) is an eminent man of letters, writer and editor. He was educated at Mysore, Cambridge and Princeton Universities. He joined the English department of Mysore University as a lecturer in 1942, and he rose to the position of professor. He has been a visiting professor at various foreign universities like Yale, Wisconsin and Texas. He was also a research fellow at the Indian Institute of Advanced Study, Simla. His interest in literature is wide-ranging, and he has been the founder-editor of The Literary Criterion, which he has been editing till now.

Narasimhaiah is not merely a scholar of English literature or Commonwealth literature but he has been a guiding spirit in fostering an inter-disciplinary approach to literature. He is well-acquainted with European and Indian traditions, and has given a new direction to the opposite eastern and western attitudes towards fundamental problems of literature and aesthetics. His works include Jawaharlal Nehru: A Study of His Writings and Speeches (1960), Shakespeare Came to India (1964), The Human Idiom (1967), The Writer's Gandhi (1967), F.R. Leavis (1968), The Swan and the Eagle (1969), Awakened Conscience (1970), Indian Literature of the Past Fifty Years (1970), Moving Frontiers of English Studies in India (1977), Raja Rao (1978). He has also edited works like Literary Criticism: European and Indian Traditions (1966), Commonwealth Literature : A handbook of select reading list (1976), Asian Response to American Literature and Indian Response to American Literature.

His major contribution as a scholar lies in fostering cross-communication among different cultures and sensibilities and in encouraging from the standpoint of Indian metaphysics and transcendentalism, comparisons with indetical issues in European, American and Commonwealth literatures. He is presently associated with the Dhvnyaloka Centre at Mysore which is projected as a meeting ground for scholars from different parts of the world.

B.R.N.

NARASIMHARAVU, MUNIMANIKYAM (Telugu; b. 1898, d. 1956) was a popular short story writer in Telugu. Born in a Niyogi brahmin family, he had his education in Guntur and Vijayanagaram. He was a B.A., L.T. He worked as a history teacher in Hindu College High School, Masulipatam, for a major part of his life. After retirement he worked for a few years as a producer for spoken word in A.I.R., Hyderabad. As the creator of Kantam (Kantam kathalu), an immortal character in Telugu fiction, which had become a household word in the thirties and the forties, he is held in great esteem. Having cultivated a peculiar colloquial style of his own he tried to immortalise some of the sweet and electrifying moments in the life of a middle class brahmin householder. His stories are realistic and appear almost like pen-pictures of certain often-repeated situations in Telugu life. They are tinged with light humour and make a pleasant reading. There are about 25 books to his credit. Among his short story collections may be mentioned Talli prema (A mother's affection), Kathanikalu, Upadhyayudu (A teacher), Munimanikyam kathalu, Tagu number three (Dispute number three and five other stories) and Radhababu. Besides, he wrote a few short novels like Sharadrutulu (Autumn nights, 1944) Dikshitulu, Meri kahani (My story), Tirumaliga (Sacred abode) and Ruk-kutalli, a few one-act plays like Jayamma kapuram (The family life of Jayamma) and Elopement, a full length play Dampatya jivitamu (The family life) and some humorous skits like Na snehitulu, Yatharth drsyalu (Real scenes), Hasya kathalu (Humorous episodes) and Hasya prasangalu (Witty conversations). His frankness and sincerity endeared him to his readers. In the preface to Sharadrutulu he states, "The second story in the volume is not entirely my own. I have appropriated an interesting incident from one of the stories of Sarath. A few sentences in these stories may sound like those of Vishvanatha Satyanarayana. It is a fact that I moulded them on his pattern. Anyone, I think, has got a right to take one or two tumblers of water from the holy Ganges." He will be remembered as one of the pioneers who introduced subtle humour and a realistic representation of the day to day life in modern Telugu fiction.

B.V.S.

NARASIMHASASTRY, MOKKAPATI (Telugu; b. 1892, d. 1973) was a noted humorous novelist of Andhra. Mokkapati Narasimha Sastry hails from a brahmin family well-known for its refined taste and cultural activities. The family originally belonged to Penumallu Palem in West Godavari district, but migrated to Gandredu in course of time. His great grandfather received an 'inam' (gift of land) from the then ruler of Peddapuram Samsthanam (estate). As his elder brother, Subbarayudu, the famous divan of Pithapuram was at Pithapuram, he settled there. He had his early education in Telugu and Sanskrit from his father and his second grandfather. He studied English at Pithapuram and Machilipatnam. After passing his F.A. examination he went to the U.K. for higher studies. He joined Edinburgh University where he studied agriculture for four years. As the First World War broke out in 1914, he had to discontinue his studies and return home without taking a degree. Western education had very little influence on his well-disciplined Hindu way of life to which he clung to the end. He edited two literary journals of high standard called Shakti and Kala respectively for some time. He used to take active part in all cultural activities. He was elected Fellow by the A.P. Sahitya Akademi in 1971. Although he had other works to his credit, his fame rests on his first novel, Barrister Parvatisam (1925), which has delighted the public for over half a century. There is yet no sign of decline in its popularity. Its hero, Parvatisam, has become a household word in Andhra, a distinction he shares with Girisam of Gurajada. A sequel in two parts was written as a serial for a popular weekly in 1971 after a long lapse of 56 years. It failed to click. His second novel, Ekodarulu (1931), was well received. In it the author has discussed in detail some of the problems arising out of an inter-caste marriage. A gifted story-teller, Sastry has three volumes of Short stories to his credit. They are (1) Kannavi-Vinnavi (parts I and II, 1951) (2) Bhiksuvu (1970) and (3) Pratibimbalu. In these stories, the author makes a study of contemporary human situation with great sympathy and understanding. Though he is remembered as a humorist, in some of these short stories and plays in the collection entitled Mrokkubadi (1967), he plumbs the depths of human tragedy. Barristarugari batakhani (A Barrister's tittle-tattle) is a collection of light-veined essays full of biting satire on the life, customs and manners of the Andhras. Beneath the strain of humour, a genuine desire to reform the society is unmistakably present. Sastry's treatise on humour called Hasya tattwamu (A philosophy of humour) is yet to be published. His other unpublished works are (1) Miss Manohari (Novel) (2) Jagannatha ratham (short stories) (3) Neti

Varudhini (short stories) (4) Subbarayudu (one-act plays) (5) Satyam vada (One-act plays) (6) Peddamamayya (one-act plays) (7) Anaswaram (one-act plays) (8) Manpramukha hasya rachayitalu (criticism).

NARASIMHASASTRY, NORI (Telugu; b. 1900, d. 1980) was a poet playwright and novelist. Narasimha Sastry was born in an orthodox brahmin family well-known for its literary and Vedic scholarship for generations together. His father, Hamumachchastry, was a renowned Telugu pandit while his paternal uncle, Gurulinga Sastry, was a formidable pandit well-versed in the Puranic lore and esoteric learning. Sastry had his early education in Sanskrit and Telugu at home in the traditional way. His proclivity for literature was manifest even at the age of ten. After passing his F.A. in 1918 at Guntur he proceeded to Madras. Graduating from Pachchayyapa's College, he obtained his B.L. degree in 1925 and practised law first at Guntur and then at Repalle. He came into contact with the members of Sahiti Samiti like Talla Vajjahala Sivasankara Sastry, who influenced him profoundly. Though an uncompromising classicist at the beginning of his career he relented a bit later in life and began to use colloquial style and diction in appropriate cases. A felicitous poet gifted with historical imagination, a curious scholar of abiding antiquarian interest, he was honoured with the title 'Kavisamrat' (Emperor of poets). He had been an active member of A.P. Sahitya Academy for a very long time. He was its Vice President, too, for sometime. Though a prolific and versatile writer, he is chiefly remembered today as an eminent writer of historical fiction, a distinction he shares with Vishwanatha Satyanarana and Adavi Bapiraju, two of his titanic contemporaries. As a poet, too, he ranks high, his most important work being Devi Bhagavatam (1950). He had a particular penchant for writing verse plays. His short stories are technically finished products while his criticism deeply coloured by his powerful personality is often provocative. His style is racy, impeccable and scholarly. Narasimha Sastry is one of our most outstanding writers of prose. An inordinate love for the Telugu language, culture and history and a deep-rooted veneration for the hallowed traditions of Vedic origin characterize his writings and make him unique even in the field of historical fiction. All his novels deal with different periods of Andhra's history: Chalukyan period in his prize-winning first novel, Nannaya bhattu, Kakatiya period in Rudrama Devi, Reddi period in Mallareddi, Kavisarvabhaumudu, Sahajapanditudu, Vizianagara period in Dhurjati. Even when he writes a novel like Vaghira (1971) based on the artistic masterpieces of the Ajanta caves, he glorifies Andhras by making the chief Sculptor-cum-painter Kondapa, an Andhra, drawing on the historical fact that one of the first direct disciples of the Buddha happens to be an Andhra by the name of Kondanna (Kaundinya). Deviating from the practice of his contemporaries and forbears in historical writing, he weaves his plots around the outstanding literary personalities like Nannayya, Tikkana, Yerrapragada, Srinatha, Potanna and Dhurjati instead of the kings, queens, ministers and generals of the respective ages. He holds his own in presenting historical incidents from his own angle of vision against standard historians of the day. His method of imaginative reconstruction of the spirit of the age and interpretation of social relations, though sometimes runs counter to the accepted opinions, is not as much of distortion as deviations.

NARAYAN DEV (Bengali; 15th/16th century) was one of the most well-known poets of mediaeval Bengal who wrote Mansamangal kavyas, also known as Padmapuran. He was born probably in the later part of the 15th or the early part of the 16th century. The autobiographical part of his work indicates that he was born in the village Bor in the Kishoreganj sub-division of the district of Mymensingh, now in Bangladesh. His parents were Narasimha and Rukmini. His grandfather, Uddharan or Udhav, had left the Rara (south western region of West Bengal) and settled at Bor. The full name of the poet was Ramnarayan Dev, and he was also known as 'Sukabiballabha' or 'Kabiballabha' meaning 'the master of poets'. Some scholars maintain that Ballabha Ghosh, one of the poets of this tradition, assumed the name of 'Sukavi' so as to identify himself with the name of Narayan Dev. As a result it is at times difficult to distinguish their individual compositions. The name Sukavi Narayan took the form of Sukananni or Hukananni in Assamese. His poems became very popular in the Brahmaputra and Surma Valleys of Assam. In Assamese his compositions underwent a total change and it is largely for this reason that the people of Assam claim him to be an Assamese poet.

Narayan Dev's Padmapuran is divided into three parts. In the first part we find his biographical accounts and invocation of the deities. The second part consists of the puranic tales of Hara and Parvati. The story of Chand Saodagar is related in the third part. The poet was well-versed in Sanskrit. The second part of his composition is based on the Astika Parva of the Mahabharata, different Shaiva Puranas, Kalika Purana and Kalidasa's epic, Kumarasambhavam. The poem contains both pathos and mirth and one of its characteristic features is sharp satire. The character of Chand Saodagar as portrayed by him symbolises the futility of human powers against fate. although his compositions reflect the Shakta traditions, he was deeply attached to Vaishnavism.

The manuscripts of his work are available at the following places: Calcutta University Manuscript Library, Calcutta; Asiatic Society Library, Calcutta; Dacca University Library, Dacca, Bangladesh; Silchar Normal School Library, Assam; Mokshada Collections, Jadavpur University, Calcutta.

NARAYAN, HEMCHANDRA (Gujarati; b. 1855, d. 1904) was the first person in Gujarati to write his autobiography, Hunpote (I myself), published in 1900. Earlier, he had written about the genre of biography in 'Jaivancharit vishe charcha' (1895), an article based on Samuel Smiles's essay, 'Character'. In his autobiography he dwells impartially and frankly on his shortcomings and drawbacks. He was also the first writer to introduce Bengali authors like Romeshchandra Dutta and Bankimchandra to Gujarati by translating some of their works, such as Jivan prabhat and Durgeshnandini. At the age of sixteen he came in contact with a Bengali gentleman, Navinchandra Ray, whom he held in esteem. With him, Narayan travelled in Europe and almost all over the northern India, and his experiences were recounted in his travelogues in Gujarati. Besides describing different landscapes, he wrote about the people, their way of life, their history and culture and social customs. In 1896, his two books, Snehmandir and Jyanmandir, were published. The first one is a translation of short stories from places far and near, such as France, Hungary, England, Bengal, besides summaries of classical Sanskrit works like Shankuntala and Uttararamcharita. In the second book there are articles on religious, literary, and social topics. He discussed poetics mostly on the basis of Sanskrit poetics. He was the first to write on the genre of short story and to point out the essential difference between the novel and the short story. He has also compared the characters of Kalidasa and Shakespeare, which was the first attempt at comparative criticism in Gujarati. He also translated a Bengali drama, Ashrumati, by Jyotindranath Tagore into Gujarati.

NARAYAN, R.K. (English, b. 1906) is an eminent Indian English novelist. Rasipuram Krishnaswamy Narayan had his early schooling in Madras, but moved to Mysore when his father was appointed Head Master of the Maharaja's high school there, and got his bachelor's degree from the University of Mysore. One of the few Indian-English writers spending nearly all his time in India, he went abroad to the U.S.A. in 1956 at the invitation of the Rockefeller Foundation. He began his literary career with short stories which appeared in The Hindu, and also worked for some time as the Mysore correspondent of Justice, a Madras-based newspaper. His autobiography tells us about the difficulties he faced in finding publishers for his earlier novels.

Narayan's fiction is remarkable for capturing with ironic humour the human foibles of ordinary men and women, set in the fictitious town of Malgudi which closely resembles Mysore city. The locale of his fiction hardly ever shifts from Malgudi and its environs—the outstanding exception being The Guide (1958), where the hero Raju turns his back on Malgudi when he comes out of jail. The second part of Raju's life is spent in the village of Mangala, where he easily slips into the role of a holy man. Narayan generally concentrates on male characters; the only important women characters he has created are Savithri of The Dark Room (1938), Rosie of The Guide, and Daisy of his latest novel, The Painter of Signs (1976). Daisy is an altogether new character in Narayan's work. An emancipated woman, she runs away from home and disowns her caste and the very name her parents gave her. She lives alone and works as a Government counselor of family planning. But she leaves the staid Malgudi at the end of the novel in pursuit of her work in some other town. Narayan accepts the social system as it is, and makes no attempt to criticise social evils or deal with the plight of the under dog; his forte is the middle class which he knows intimately. In keeping with his themes, his language is simple. He makes no attempt to present India in an exotic light for the sake of the foreign audience, a failing common to other Indian-English writers. In addition to fiction, he has published a fine autobiography, My Days (1974) and My Dateless Dairy (1960) about his stay as a resident writer in a U.S. university where he wrote The Guide. He has brought out a collection of legends drawn from the Mahabharata and the puranas entitled Gods, Demons and Others (1964), and an English version of the Ramayana based on the Tamil epic by Kamban. He has also written a travelogue about Mysore state, The Emerald Route (1978) with sketches by his younger brother R.K. Laxman, the famous cartoonist. Narayan's best work, The Guide won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1961, the first time an award was given to a work in English.

FURTHER WORKS: Novels: Swami and Friends (1935); The Bachelor of Arts (1937); The English Teacher (1945); Mr Sampath (1949); The Financial expert (1952); Waiting for the Mahatma (1955); The Man-Eater of Malgudi (1961); The Vendor of Sweets (1967); Short stories: Malgudi Days (1943); An Astrologer's Day and other stories (1947); Lawley Road (1956); Next Sunday: Sketches and Essays (1960); A Horse and Two Goats (1970).

S.A.N.

NARAYANA BABU, SRIRANGAM (Telugu; b. 1906, d. 1960) was born in Vizianagaram, a cultural centre of renown where epoch-making writers like Gurajada Appa Rao (1862-1915) and Sri Sri (1910-1983) were also born. Although he came from a fairly rich family, the family soon found itself on the streets as his father was not very worldly-wise. Narayana Babu was admitted into a course of veterinary science after his matriculation, but that was never completed. On the other hand, he developed a strong and lasting love for both literature and music. He devoted his entire life for the cause of poetry and music. Even though his knowledge of music did not affect the style of his poetry, there are frequent references to music, both Karnatak and Hindustani, in his poems. It is said that he was well-acquainted with the art of dancing as well.

In his youth Narayana Babu came under the influence of the romantic poets like Devulapalli Krishna Sastry (1897-1981) and wrote in their tradition. But soon, around 1935, new friendships led him on to new paths. His association with Sri Sri the poet, Romanki Appala Swamy the multi-linguist and scholar, Chaganti Somayajulu the short story writer, the others like Puripanda Appala Swamy, Kompella Janardana Rao, etc., left indelible impressions on his personality and poetry. The years between the two World Wars was the period when the youth of Andhra was subjected to a number of influences, foreign and indigenous. They could not continue any more to be romantic, withdrawn and subjective. Young writers like Narayana Babu readily adopted themselves to the new fashions and trends, and in their enthusiasm, did not distinguish between constructive and destructive forces. With equal faith they welcomed clear-sighted revolutionaries like Mayakovsky, Gorky and Nazrul Islam on one hand, and anarchists like Andre Breton, David Gascoyne and Salvador Dali on the other. This produced varied results in different individual artists, who reacted to the contemporary native situations in a variety of ways.

It was here that Sri Sri and Narayana Babu began travelling in different directions. Although common influences were at work on both of them, made familiar to them by Ronanki Appala Swamy, the extent to which each absorbed and assimilated the new knowledge was different. If Sri Sri devoted himself more and more to Communism and Marxism the strong influences on Narayana Babu were Imagism, Symbolism, Surrealism and Dadaism. In spite of the influence of these Western trends, surprisingly, Narayana Babu made capital use of native myth and religion, by way of allusions, in his poetry. While Sri Sri's poetic muse gradually grew in variety and intensity, embracing the concepts of internationalism and universalism, championing the cause of the oppressed and the exploited working class, Narayana Babu's world of poetry remained highly personal, impressionistic, disorderly and unredeemed.

With regard to their poetic genius and craftsmanship too, Sri Sri and Narayana Babu have nothing much in common. Their poetic visions and modes of expression came to differ significantly. Sri Sri easily impresses, with his perfect, though traditional rhythms and musical diction. Narayana Babu's poems demand a close study and analysis to be understood. His style is elliptical and fragmentary. His images and symbols are either orthodox or personal, and at times synaesthical and surrealist, thus verging on the obscure. However, his genuine emotional intensity, forceful expression and apt imagery are his strong points. Brevity is the hall-mark of his poetry. His range is small and his talent, almost uni-dimensional. As Sri Sri had assumed many 'avatars' and his talent is multi-faceted, his achievement is uneven and poses problems of assessment. But Narayana Babu's modest output—some forty poems and a few folk songs collected posthumously—yields to critical evaluation in terms of his thematic pre-occupations and technical innovations. Such a critical appreciation, in fact, was attempted in 1952 by Ronanki Appala Swamy, the one scholar who had been consistently recommending Narayana Babu's work from the beginning.

Narayana Babu led the life of an ascetic—detached and poor. He was supported by his friends' circle, gradually widening to include Jalsutram Rukmininatha Sastry the parody-poet, Antyakula Pydi Raju the painter, Dwaram Bhavanarayana the son of the famous violin maestro Dwaram Venkata Swamy Naidu on whom Narayana Babu wrote a poem, Arudra the poet, etc. A number of his poems like 'Lendoyi rushulu' (Get up, ye rishis), 'Vishakhapatnam', 'Neevevare' (who are you?), 'Kushtu rogi pata pade' (Thus sang the leper), etc., give evidence of his complex mind to this, where the sub-conscious levels of experience are sought to be expressed in evocative terms. Though the said,

I am the lover
Of the flame-woman
Of the blood-lamp!
I am a rishi
Of the revolution!
I am a poet
Of protest!
My heart is a battlefield!

('Kadana kutuhala ragam')

Narayana Babu was in the main a humanist. He did not grow into a real revolutionary like Sri Sri. All his adventures and experiments in the realm of poetry did not bear any significant fruits. Hence, like Pattabhi, like Byragi, Narayana Babu used to be only occasionally remembered as a curious phenomenon in Telugu poetry.

NARAYANA BHATTATIRI (Sanskrit; b. 1560, d. 1666) was a famous scholar, grammarian and devotional poet of Kerala. He is known as Melpattur Narayana Bhattatiri from the name of his ancestral family. Patronised by the rulers of Cochin, Calicut and Chempakasseri, and widely respected as a scholar, he was a polymath who made outstanding contributions to more than one branch of Sanskrit learning and to Sanskrit literature both of the secular and devotional variety. His Prakriyasarvasvam (A compendium of morphology, 1616), on Sanskrit grammar has become a work of all-India importance. His Narayaniyam (On Narayana, 1586), a devotional work in praise of Krishna of the famous temple at Guruvayur, Kerala, is profoundly moving in its devotional fervour and poetic imagination. The poet composed the 1036 verses of the work in sections of ten verses generally, at the Guruvayur temple when he was a resident devotee there praying for the cure of his severe rheumatic condition. The title of the work is doubly meaningful. It is a work on Narayana by Narayana.

Among Bhattatiri's other works are a number of compositions written in a prose-cum-verse style called 'prabandhas'. He wrote these for use in the 'kuttu' exposition by his friend Eravi Chakyar. These works, more than twenty five in number, show his scholarship and command over words. There is, for example, one named Niranunasikaprabandha (A composition without nasals) which as the title indicates does not contain any nasal sound. The story is the lament of the demoness Shurpanakha before Ravana and Shurpanakha naturally could not use nasal-sounds, her nose having been cut by Lakshmana. Among Bhattatiri's other works is the Manameyodayam (On means and objects of knowledge). He wrote only the first part of the work. There are also some eulogies of his patrons to his credit as well as hymns in praise of deities and a work on ritual. Altogether he wrote more than fifty works. He was a gifted extempore poet well-versed in the use of double meanings.

NARAYANA DASU, ADIBHATLA (Telugu; b. 1864, d. 1945) was a noted Telugu poet and musician. He was born in a Dravida brahmin family of great literary and spiritual heritage. He used to recite verses from the Bhagavata melodiously in various ragas when he was quite young. He had a unique blend of artistic talents and literary genius in him. He had innate ability for imitation and was considered 'Ekasandhagrahi'.

He attained perfection in the fields of music, dance and literature. His melodious tone mesmerised people of all walks of life. Thrilled by the competence of Dasu, Challapilla Venkata Sastri, the poet laureate of Andhra, ranked him with Prahlada, Narada and Parashara. Toomati Donappa made him the Yugakatha of Harikatha Vanamaya and divided the periods into pre-Narayana Dasu Yugamu, Narayana Dasu Yugamu and post-Narayana Dasu Yugamu.

Dasu was the pioneer in the art of Harikatha in Telugu and was rightly described as Harikatha Pitamaha (Grand father of Harikatha). He moulded Harikatha into a creative art where the faculties of literature, music and dance are blended harmoniously to provide a feast to the connoisseur as well as to the common man.

Dhruvacharitam (1883) was his maiden attempt in Harikatha literature. His creative genius was so tremendous, that he could compose Ambarishopakhyanamu (1884) within twelve hours. He wrote Savitri charitamu in 1902. In 1908, he composed Mrityunjaya shatakamu extempore at the bed of his ailing brother, Peranna. This, 'shatakamu' worked as talisman and his brother began to recover from his illness. In 1915 Yadatha Ramayanamu came out from his pen to keep the soul of his wife at rest. Dashavidharaga navati kusuma manjari (1938) was his tremendous gift to the goddess Saraswati.

At the age of 36 he acquainted himself with the languages of Urdu, Parsi and Arabic. In his Harikatha performances he used to quote with ease from the writings of Kalidasa and Shakespeare drawing comparisons. Though he had not much of formal education to his credit he became the Principal of a music college in Vizianagaram in 1919 on account of his paragonic skill in the realm of music. His mastery over the art of Astavadhanam deserves special mention.

He was honoured with many titles during his life time. In a great congregation of musicians in Bangalore (1904) he was honoured with the title of Laya Brahma (the creator of rhythm). When he defeated the proud Subrahmanya Ayyar by performing a feat of singing Pallavi with five talas he became Panchamukhi Parameswarudu (five-faced Lord Shiva). He was acclaimed as Sangeeta Sahitya Sarvabhowma (Emperor of music and literature) in 1933 in Visakhapatnam. The scholars of the South called him Andhra Desha Bhushanam (The jewel of Andhra). The Behag Raga rendered by Dasu impressed Rabindranath Tagore very much. Andhra Gujapati, the Rajah of Vizianagaram was his chief patron.

During a span of sixty years he gave thousands of Harikatha performances. Though the world recognised him only as a performing artist of high order, he was a literary genius too. Of the 46 books he wrote, 14 were Harikathas, 7 were shatakas, 2 were rupakas, 4 were prabandhas, 7 were translations, 9 were on shastras, one was his autobiography, one was ashtakamu and one was a kirtana. He could not be popular as a literary figure on account of his inordinate love for a typical diction of Telugu which is Telugu for Telugu's sake.

NARAYANA DEVA, JAGANNATH (Oriya) was born in the first half of the 18th century in the royal family of Paralakhemundi, a small state in the district of Ganjam. His full name was Gajapati Jagannath Narayana Deva. He was the king of Paralakhemundi and reigned for forty years. The family chronicle of Paralakhemundi dynasty in palm leaf manuscript, preserved in the palace, supplies many authentic informations about Narayana Deva. He was a great warrior, a benevolent ruler, a learned scholar, a master musician and a talented poet. He became a true Vaishnava devotee in later life. He fought many battles and defeated many kings such as those of Vijaynagaram and Kujanja. In spite of all these wars and conflicts, he found time to contribute to the Oriya and Sanskrit literatures. In 1767, on his return from a pilgrimage to Vrindavan, he composed Vrindavana vihara (amorous sports in Vrindavan) in Oriya. It was his master piece. Before this, he had written in Sanskrit three books, viz., Sangita narayana, Sangita kaumudi and Alankara chandrika.

NARAYANA GURU (Malayalam ; b. 1856. d. 1928) inaugurated an age of spiritual consciousness and social change in Kerala. He hailed from a cultured Hindu (Ezhava-avarna) family of Chempazhanthi near Trivandrum. A precocious child, Nanoo (Narayanan) was grounded in the classics and showed an early religious leaning. To forestall it, the elders arranged his marriage.

NARAYANA MENON, KUNDOOR

He left home and wandered far and long in South India, learning meanwhile Vedic and Shaivite philosophy and practising Yoga. After a long interval of learning and self-realisation, he settled down at Aruvippuram, near Neyyattinkara, where, in 1888, he consecrated a Shiva temple. He took a phallus-like stone from the adjacent river bed and installed it with Vedic rites on a flat granite surface on the bank. A banner with these prophetic words was hung beside it:

This is a model arena
Where all in brotherliness live,
Sans caste differences
Or religious hatred.

There sprang up a temple assembly, which, in 1903, became the Sree Narayana Dharma Paripalana Yogam, a mighty organisation of the backward and dispossessed sections. The conservatives frowned against an Avarna consecrating an Aryan god. But the Guru went ahead in his quiet, inoffensive manner and established more than 30 temples. The onus of this act was on reforming worship. He insisted on airy, clean temples and premises. Later, he dispensed with even idols. In one temple he installed a lighted lamp. In another the pratishtha is a mirror with 'Aum' inscribed in the middle. In the temple at Murukkumpuzha the object of worship is a piece of glass with the words Truth, Dharma, Compassion and Love etched on it. As temple annexes, there were libraries, schools and halls. Vocational training was given to poor children. The temples were accessible to all. The Guru denounced caste and untouchability. The Vaikom Satyagraha of 1924, started on Gandhiji's advice, was blessed and assisted by the Guru. His messages and warnings have enthused multitudes. He said: 'Educate to be enlightened, organise to get strong, enrich by enterprise and hard work.' He was a strong votary of prohibition: 'Liquor is poison; brew it not, drink it not, vend it not' His grandest message is the very essence of Advaita: 'Of the same species is man; one religion and one God for him'. A humanistic rider is that 'it's enough man is ennobled, whatever be his religion.' At his headquarters in Shivagiri, Varkala, he established Sharadamadam, with the Goddess of Learning as the deity. The Guru's Mahasamadhi draws millions of pilgrims. The order of monks at Shivagiri runs a Vedic school which trains in priesthood youths of all castes. At Alwaye, on the banks of the Periyar river, is the Advaitashram, with the Sanskrit school. Here, in 1924, was organised the first ever All Religious Conference in India, with the motto, 'To know and to make known: not to argue and to vanquish.'

Though he was a philosopher, the Guru's commitment to life was equally strong. To suit both these ends, he forged a new way of 'Atmadarsahana', which is an integrated extension of the six darshanās. It is expounded in his great philosophical poem in Malayalam, Atmo- padeshashatakam (One hundred verses of Self-knowledge), and in the Sanskrit piece Darshanamala (A garland of darshana).

The Guru wrote several songs and hymns of poetic excellence in Malayalam, Sanskrit and Tamil. Among them, 'Anubhuti dashakam' (Ten verses in Realisation) and 'Advaita dipika' (Light of Advaita) charter his efforts at self-discovery. The ecstatic delight of the Advaitic experience is immortalised in 'Kundalini pattu' (The song of the Serpent Power). 'Daiva dashakam' (Ten verses to God) is a prayer of elemental simplicity with profound significance.

Sree Narayana Guru's greatness is that he lived the Truth he had realised. Poet Tagore and Gandhiji visited him at Varkala. Both were impressed by his humanistic ideals. He brought Vedānta up-to-date and made it accessible to the common man.

NARAYANA MENON, KUNDOOR (Malayalam; b. 1861, d. 1936) was a member of the Kundoor family, and was born in Oorakam near Trichur. He took his B.A. degree in Malayalam from the Presidency College, Madras, in 1883, and worked for a time as Head Clerk in the Police Department of the former Cochin State, but was, before long appointed as Tahsildar, a post which his father and grand-father had held. Even before superannuation he resigned his post since he was more interested in poetry and chess. The rest of his life he spent engaging himself mainly in literary activities.

Though academically a student of Malayalam he was equally proficient in Sanskrit too, which he studied privately.

One of the foremost poets of the time, Narayana Menon was in touch with the leading literary contemporaries. In writing poetry in the classical style he seems to have excelled all of them, including even Kodungallur Kunjikkuttan Thampuran, the greatest poet of the times. 'Kannappan', published along with three other similar poems, has been printed out as a supreme example of Menon's achievement in this regard. All the four are based on certain ballads and hearsays prevalent in Kerala. Ajamila moksham or the deliverance of Ajamila is his first major poem revealing all the skill and artistry of the poet including his predilection and capacity for 'dvitiyakshara prasa'.

Equally remarkable are his translations from Sanskrit, of which there are four from the work of Kalidasa alone. What is particularly noteworthy is that most of the translations are in the same meter as the original and that, besides the rhyme mentioned above from start to finish, 'yamaka' is easily retained in the 9th canto of Raghuvamsha and the 10th canto of Kumarasambhava, a feat not even attempted by any other translator. Those not well versed in Sanskrit can have a fairly good taste of Kalidasa in Menon's translations, which in a sense are more popular today than his original poems.

NARAYANA MENON, NALAPPAD (Malayalam; b. 1888, d. 1954), a great philosopher poet, was the son of Nalappad Madhavi Amma and Mannur Purushothaman Nambuthiri. He was born in Vanneri and brought up by his step-father. He completed his matriculation at different places like Chavakkad, Kunnamkulam, Trichur and Calicut. Though he had to stop his regular education with this, he continued his effort privately and attained such mastery over English as to translate into Malayalam Les Misérables of Victor Hugo (from English) and Light of Asia of Edwin Arnold. He had his primary lessons in Sanskrit from his step-father. Later, the constant company he kept with the great poet Vallattol helped him greatly to achieve mastery over Sanskrit. His knowledge of English helped Vallattol, who had no English education and the profundity of Vallattol's Sanskrit helped Narayana also.

Being the senior member of the family, he had to take up the responsibility of running the household very early in life, which made him face innumerable difficulties. He was attracted to philosophy which gave him mental consolation to some extent. He went through the lectures of Swami Vivekananda and took membership in the Theosophical Society. This instilled his mind with Buddhist philosophy and resulted in the translation of the Light of Asia. He married Kalyappurath Madhavi Amma in 1921. But she died in the same year at child birth leaving the poet in great distress. The pangs he suffered gave birth to his masterpiece, 'Kannunirttulli' (Tear-drop, 1924). 'Kannunirttulli' perhaps, is the greatest elegy in Malayalam language. As innocent children, playing on beach, build castles with sands, human beings, planning their future, build fortresses in their minds; and some incomprehensible Force smashes them to smithereens, like the unseen wind which destroys the sand castles. This is the eternal order of the universe and the poet stands before this, helpless. The thought of re-birth comes to console him. But the Eternal Father, who loves alike all His creations may not make care to get for him in the next birth also what he had lost now. The unbounded sorrow again rushes forward and seeks solace in the hands of philosophy. The poet looks back with tearful eyes at his married life that ended fruitless. The realisation that his beloved was a harmonious combination of all that was beautiful in universe gives him the insight to love the whole universe as his sweet-heart. The poem ends with this rare and divine philosophic grandeur. Here there is no unbridled wailing. The smouldering agony that burns within, makes the poem a furnace of sorrow. The poet appears extremely calm and poised, like the Earth, with a boiling interior. This stoic love of grief and this Tagorian grandeur make 'Kannunirttulli' a poem remarkable in Malayalam.

Nalappad had started writing poems very early in his life. It was in Kavana kaumudi, the then renowned literary periodical, that he published his works. 'Kaitappoo', 'Nakshatrangal', 'Asuya', 'Matr', 'Matribhumi', 'Rajasimhan', 'Vanaprasthante virakti', 'Sulochana', etc. are the remarkable poems published in Kavana kaumudi. These early works were clear evidences of an original poetic genius endowed with creative imagination, though some slight flaws in the use of words, etc. can be pointed out. He belonged to the Vallattol School in Malayalam poetry. Nevertheless he had his own individuality and an independent style, both in poetry and prose and was free from any touch of imitation, though his poetic personality was influenced by Kumaran Asan also. It has been pointed out that the external beauty of Vallattol and the internal grandeur of Asan can be seen amalgamated in Nalappad.

'Pukayila mahatmyam' (Glory of tobacco), 'Lokam' (The world), 'Pulakankuram', 'Chakravalam' (Horizon), 'Daivagathi' (The way of God), 'Ratisamrajyam' (The kingdom of love), 'Dayananda Saraswathy', 'Vivekananda Swamikal' are his other original literary contributions. Of these 'Pulakankuram' and 'Chakravalam' establish emphatically the height of philosophical vision the poet had achieved. Though this trend in literature used to be described as mysticism, this is slightly different, in that it is the mysticism that delineates the progress of human soul towards the omnipotent Perfection beyond mortal eyes. The developments the science had achieved then were not alien to the poet. The scientific knowledge had only enriched his philosophical insight and made it healthier. The supreme visions of Upanishads and modern atom theories can be seen mingling in him. That it was from the same pen that wrote 'Chakravalam' that we got 'Ratisamrajyam' also, a treatise on the science of sex, may appear to be intriguing. But it can be seen that they are complementary to each other. 'Dayananda Saraswathy' and Vivekananda Swamikal are attempts at biographies. His 'Chakravalam' has been translated into English by Balamani Amma.

Pavangal (translation of Les Misérables—Vols. I & II, 1925, and Vol. III, 1928), Pourasthya dipam (The Light of the East—Tr. of Light of Asia—Vol. I, 1915; Vol. II, 1939), Sapathnyam (1935), Vesu Ammayute vishari (The fan of Vesu Amma—adaptation of Oscar Wilde's Lady Wintermere's Fan, 1947), Arshajna— na (1953), and London kottarattile rahasyangal (The secrets of London palace—Tr. of Reynold's Mysteries of the Court of London) are his other contributions. Of these Pavangal is the greatest and most invaluable work. Publication of Pavangal effected great revolution in the whole of Malayalam literature, particularly in the realm of prose.

NARAYANA MENON, VALLATTOL (Malayalam; b. 1878, d. 1953) 'There is something of an aura of legend about his grand old man. Totally deaf since his early manhood, he lived in a soundless world of his own within whose impenetrable stillness he wore web after web of lovely rhythms that are wafted to outer regions of sonorous verse', wrote Gertrude Murray about Vallattol. As the tribute affirms, Vallattol Narayana Menon (born at Chennara in Malapuram district as the son of Mulasery Damodaran Elayath and Kuttiparu Amma) was a great man and a great poet. Having had the traditional kind of learning in the elements of Malayalam and also some reading of kavyas and grammar in Sanskrit he started, at the tender age of twelve, composing poems which were mostly devotional hymns and narratives. Vallattol's first collection of poems, Kiratashatakam (Hundred hymns on Shiva) came out in 1903.

Towards the end of 1904 he migrated to Trichur to take over the management of the Keralakalpadrumam Press. It was during his stay there that he completed the translation of the Valmiki Ramayanam, and its publication in 1909 raised him into the galaxy of great poets.

At the age of thirty-one he lost his hearing, which became the theme of a lyrical poem Badhiravilapam (Lament of a deaf man, 1910). Despite the devout prayer in it to the Goddess to restore his auditory power he remained stone-deaf through out his later life. He returned to his native village, and started working on Chitrayogam, a mahakavya based on the Mandaravati-Sundarasena story in Kathasaritsagara. It is an epic in the conventional style with 18 cantos and about 1600 stanzas. Though its publication in 1914 securely established his status as a poet, Vallattol soon abandoned that heavy-weight form in favour of simple episodic narratives and short lyrical poems.

This was the period of the romantic revival in Malayalam poetry, and it saw the highest level of Vallattol's creative genius. During the period he wrote he an epistolary poem 'Oru kattu' (1914) and five short narrative poems 'Bandhanasthanaya Aniruddhan' (1914), 'Shishhyanam makanum' (1918), 'Magdalana Mariyam' (1921), 'Kochchu Sita' (1928) and 'Achchhanum Makalum' (1936).

'Oru kattu adhava Rukmiyute pashchathapam' (An epistle or Rukmi's repentance), a poem of 52 stanzas, is a letter written by Rukmi to his sister Rukmini expressing his regret for his earlier inimical attitude to her love of Krishna and proposing the marriage of his daughter to her son as a gesture of reconciliation. 'Bandhanasthanaya Aniruddhan' (The captive Aniruddha) is a poem of 73 stanzas dealing with the mythological love story of Usha, the daughter of the demon King Bana, and Aniruddha, the grandson of Krishna. The meeting of the lovers in the prison and their conversation are portrayed with such feeling that the passage is justly one of the most famous in Malayalam poetry. The description of Aniruddha as Usha enters the prison cell is most graphic.

Another narrative poem based on a puranic theme is 'Shishyanum makanum' (The disciple and the son). It is an interesting description of the conflict between Parashurama, Shiva's disciple, and Ganapati, Shiva's son, when the former visited Kailasa and was refused access to the presence of the Lord. Parvati's angry words to Shiva on her son being wounded by Parasurama are quite telling.

In 'Magdalana Mariyam' (Mary Magdalena) Vallattol's muse rises to great heights. It has two distinguishing traits. The theme is taken from the Bible and it is written in the musical Dravidian metre Manjari. It is the story of the conversion of a courtesan into a pure woman as a result of the impact of her meeting with Jesus Christ, who pardons her sins. Kochchu Sita (Child Sita) is a poem on a contemporary theme written in three different Dravidian metres. It is the poignant story of a charming Devadasi. Chempakavalli, who commits suicide in order to evade her grandmother attempts to coerce her into prostitution. Achchhanum makalum (Father and daughter) is a narrative poem on an imaginary meeting between Vishwamitra and Shakuntala at the hermitage of Kashyapa, a few years after her repudiation by Dushyanta. It has a number of complex arresting situations which are well handled by Vallattol with great dramatic skill and poetic terseness. Here are a few lines for example:

Fully aware of the dread consequence she instantly
Clutched that missile of destruction
With both her hands and cried
'Father, for my sake; forbear! forbear!
Let not your daughter be the destroyer of her husband,
Let her not be consumed by the fire of dire widowhood,
Forsaken first by her own parents the unfortunate one
Has been abandoned at his will by husband too,
That is all,
Let my life be completely destitute,
But let not my son too become an outcaste
On account of my sin.

Vallattol, the poet, is seen at his best in the 200-old lyrical pieces collected in eleven parts under the title Sahityamanjari (Literary florilegium). These poems were written by him for publication in magazines like Kavana-kaumudi and Atmaposhini. The poems are short, but each one is a masterly treatment of its theme. They cover a very wide range of subjects and are written in a variety of metres. These are stories from Hindu mythology as well as episodes from the life of prophet Mohammed. Quite a large number of them are patriotic pieces. The poems in the first part of Sahitya manjari (1916) include 'Matruvandanam' (Salutation to Motherland), 'Matrubhoomiyodu' (Ode to the Motherland), 'Virapatni' (The brave wife), etc. 'Matrivandanam' a hymn to Kerala, testifies to the poet's patriotism. Poems like 'Keerattalayina' (A torn pillow) and 'Aripravu' (A dove) are also included in it.

NARAYANA PANIKER, KAVALAM

'Satyagatha' (Song of truth), 'Puranangal' (Epics), 'Radhayute kritardhata' (Radha's contentment), 'Kilik-konchal' (A sweet parrot's talk), 'Ente gurunathan' (My preceptor) 'Krishnapparuntinodu' (To the kite), 'Otuk-katte kurippu' (The last note), 'Parikshayil jayichchu' (Success in the trial), 'Thookkumarattilum' (Even on the gallows), and 'Bhaktiyum vibhaktiyum' (Devotion and grammar) are the most important ones included in the ten parts of Sahityamanjari. The spontaneity and wealth of his emotions, the beauty and variety of his imagery and the effortless ease and lucidity of his diction mark him out as a born lyric poet.

Vallattol gave a strong impetus to the spirit of the national movement. His forceful patriotic poems are of an infinite variety. It was the impact of the personality of Mahatma Gandhi, whom he personally met in 1925 at the time of the Vaikom Satyagraha, that wrought the great expansion of Vallattol's poetic sensibility. His poem of homage to the father of the nation entitled 'Ente gurunathan' (1922) is very important in this regard. The lines from his most famous patriotic poem 'Pora, pora' (Not enough, not enough)

Not enough, not enough! day by day
Let mother India's rise flags Higher, yet higher rise

were sung by the volunteers of the freedom struggle as a marching song. 'Chakragatha' (A song of the spinning wheel), 'Khadivasanangal' (Khadi clothes) 'Kaikkol-vinevarum' (Accept ye all Khadi clothes), 'Toniyaatra' (Journey by boat), 'Karmabhumiyude pinchukal' (The tender feet of the motherland), etc are poems that instil admiration for the hoary past and rouse patriotic sentiments in the minds of the readers.

Another aspect of Vallattol's literary talent is seen in his translations from Sanskrit. During a span of fifty years (1904 to 1955), he translated more than twenty works. His translation of Valmiki Ramayana (1909) was followed by the rendering of Markandeya purana, Vamanapurana, Matsyapurana, Padmapurana and Agnipurana in 1915.

Translation of the plays Urubhanga, Madhyamavyayoga, Abhishekanataka, Pancharatra, and Swapnavasavadatta of Bhasa and Abhijnana Shakuntala of Kalidasa are also there to his credit. The magnum opus among the translations of Vallathol is the Rigveda (1958).

Vallattol was closely associated with literary organisations like Bhashaposhini Sabha and Samastha Kerala Sahitya Parishad. It was he who founded Kerala Kalamandalam at Cheruthuruthy in 1930, an institution devoted to the development of the classical dance forms of Kerala such as kutiyattam, kathakali, bharatanatyam and mohiniyattam.

His wide-ranging travels and tours in India and in countries like France, England and Italy enroute his visit to attend the world peace conference at Warsa in 1950 and Soviet Union (1951) and China (1953) broadened the horizon of his mental vision and brought him into close contact with the new awakening spirit of freedom all over the world.

Vallattol was one of the few fortunate poets to whom recognition came rather early in life. The Maharaja of Cochin conferred upon him the titles of 'Kavitilakan' (1919) and 'Kavisarvabhauman' (1928). With the publication of Chitrayogam he became a 'mahakavi'. In 1948 the Government of Madras made him the Poet Laureate of Malayalam. He was a member of the Sahitya Akademi and also Vice President of the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. In 1955 he was honoured by the President of India with the title of 'Padmabhushan'.

NARAYANA PANIKER, KAVALAM (Malayalam; b. 1928). Born in the family of reputed people like K.M. Paniker, as the son of Kunjulekshmi and Goda Varma Tirumulpad, Kavalam Narayana Paniker passed his B.A. degree examination from a college near Alleppey and took his law degree from the University of Madras. He was a practising lawyer for six years at Alleppey but left the profession to take to performing arts and devoted himself to the study of music, miming, dance, etc. By the time he acquired mastery of some of these arts and so brought up some professional artistes, he had used up a substantial portion of his ancestral wealth. Nevertheless he went on experimenting with staging modified forms of classical and folk styles and emerged in time as a remarkable innovator. The result was that even those who had scoffed earlier became his admirers. Before long he took the art forms to most cultural centres in India and abroad and won laurels.

A major contribution of Kavalam is the stage presentations of some of the plays of Bhasa. In this attempt he tried to integrate the traditional aesthetic and theatrical principles of India with those of the modern stage.

All this has been possible for Naryana Paniker partly or even chiefly because of his poetic talent and dramatic insight which perhaps are more relevant in the present context. His poetry is lyrical and narrative. In fact in the 1960's he introduced fresh rhythms and folk idioms into modern Malayalam poetry. His main works, apart from his translations of Bhasa's one-act plays, are dramas such as Avanavan kadampa, Deivatar, Tiruvazhitan, Karimkutty, Suryathanam and Pasu gayatri and the poetical collection Kavalattinte kavitalakal (Kavalam's poems).

Kavalam served the Kerala Sangita Nataka Akademi as its Secretary for ten years. He is the founder of 'Sopanam', an institute solely devoted to Sanskrit plays and poetic dramas.

Kavalam received awards from the Kerala Sahitya Akademi and the Sangeet Natak Akademi for his successful experiments in dramas. He was a recipient of the award for the best lyricist twice from the film world and once for the best drama from the S.P.C.S. At present he is a member of the Bombay University Senate and an Executive Member of the Sangeet Natak Akademi and the Kalidasa Akademi.

P.N.K.

NARAYANA PANIKKAR, R. (Malayalam; b. 1889, d. 1959), was a literary historian, translator and novelist. Born in Ambalappuzha, he held the degrees, B.A. & L.T. He was a teacher and Head Master for a long time. Panikkar was scholar in seven languages and was a prolific writer. He was given the Sahitya Akademi Award for his important work in seven volumes on the history of Malayalam literature in 1955.

Panikkar has written about sixty works of different kinds. There are histories of literature, novels, translations from Indian and European literatures, histories of peoples, children's literature, dictionaries, works on grammar and commentaries and editions of ancient works and biographies to his credit. Some of his works are: Aryacharitam (Historical stories, parts, 1915, 1931); Amritavalli (1923); Annapurnalayam (Transl. of Bengali novel, 1927); Premotkarsham (Trans. of French drama, 1928); Sri Ramanujan Ezhuttacchan (Biography, 1930); Adikeraliyacharitam (A history of early Kerala, 1931); Tiruvitamkur charitram (A history of Travancore, 1933); Mukilaprabhavam (The power of the Mughals, 1934); Kunchan Nambiar (Biography, 1944); Mahatma Gandhi (1948); Ezhuttacchan's Mahabharata (ed. com, 1948); Ashalata (Trans. of Marathi novel, 1950); Mrinalini (Transl. of Bankimchandra's novel, 1953); Adarshamani (1954); Hindi Literature (1958).

Panikkar's lasting fame rests on his Kerala bhasha sahitya charitram (A history of Malayalam literature, 7 Vols. published over a period from 1928 to 1951, his English Malayalam brihat shabdakosham (An English Malayalam Dictionary, 1931) and Navayuga bhasha nighantu (A Modern Malayalam Dictionary, 1951, 2nd ed). His History of Malayalam Literature is a standard work and shows painstaking labour and research. His dictionary Navayuga bhasha nighantu too is a useful work.

K.R.P.

NARAYANA PILLAI, P.K. (Malayalam; b. 1878, d. 1938) known also as Sahitya Panchananan, was born in Ambalappuzha, a place famous for its Sri Krishna temple. He had his education in the Allapetty Government High School and the Maharaja's (now the University) College at Trivandrum. Having taken his B.A. degree in 1902, he worked first as a clerk for a few months and then as Malayalam Pandit under the famous critic and Grammarian, A.R. Rajaraja Varma, for about eight years. In 1908 he took a degree in law and started practising at the Alleppey bar in the following year, but shifted to Kottayam in 1910 and finally to Trivandrum in 1924, where he was appointed a Judge of the Travancore High Court in 1929 four years later he retired from service.

Narayana Pillai's life, especially when he was not in Government Service was marked by varied activities, mainly social, legislative and literary. He held various positions of trust and responsibility such as those of the President of Social Reforms League (1922), and President of Nairs' Conference (1923). He was twice elected to the Travancore Legislative Assembly (1922 & 23) and was actively associated with the Kerala Sahitya Parishat right from its inception in 1927. In 1936 he was made a member of the Madras University Senate.

To the people of Kerala Narayana Pillai is better known as Sahitya Panchananan, i.e. a literary lion having five faces, the faces being those of the prose-writer, poet, orator, grammarian and critic. In the early days of his literary career he used to contribute to the Bhasha poshini and Malayala manorama and in later days to the magazines Sahrudaya and Sakrudaya samajam. These articles as well as his speeches have been collected and brought out in three volumes of Prasanga tarangini, Prabandha kalpalata and Vijnana ranjini. Kimapikavyam and Bheka gatha are his main poetical works. His most memorable works are the critical studies based on Cherusseri, Tunchattu Ezhuttacchan and Unnayi Varier and their poems, which reveal an analytical skill and reasoned

K.S.N.

NARAYANA PILLAI, P.K. (Malayalam; b. 1910), born in Tiruvalla, was initiated into learning by his father Goda Varma. He had a brilliant educational career and was a rank-holder in his M.A. (Malayalam, 1936) degree examination for which he appeared after taking his post-graduate degree in Sanskrit in the previous year, both from the University of Madras. The University of Bombay awarded him the Ph.D. degree (1944) for his contribution to Vedic studies. He worked as Curator, University Manuscripts Library (1948-52), Professor of Sanskrit, University College, Trivandrum (1952-57), Principal of Sanskrit College (1957-63), Professor and Head of the Department of Malayalam (1963-70), a U.G.C. awardee (1970-73), Dean of the Faculty of Oriental Studies (15 years), a member of the Senate (21 years) and of the Syndicate (4 years), all under the University of Kerala. Among the other important positions held by him may be mentioned those of Chairman, Cultural Development Committee, Trivandrum, President, Kerala Hindi Prachara Sabha; President, Samasta Kerala Sahitya Parishat, and Founder-President, Sri Sankara Sanskrit Academy. It was P.K. Narayana Pillai who fathered the faculty of Oriental Studies in the University of Kerala in 1960 and it was under his guidance that two researchers, one in Malayalam and the other in Sanskrit, took the Ph.D degree for the first time in those languages from the University.

It is difficult to pronounce in what respect Narayana Pillai is most distinguished, so varied are the genres he has touched and so scholarly the contributions he has made to each. But judging by the appreciation he has commanded and the awards he has won he seems to be at his best in commentation, editing, poetics, criticism and Sanskrit versification. The twenty manuscripts edited by him and published by the University of Kerala when he was Curator of the Manuscripts Library together with his critical annotated editions of such works as Mayura sandesha (1965) have become an indispensable part of the mainstream of Malayalam literature. His efforts in this regard were crowned and climaxed by the discovery and publication in 1970 of the full text of Ayyippilla Asan's Ramu katha patter for which the literary world in Kerala, attracted by occasional quotations from and references to it, had been airdly thirsting for decades. This book won an award from Travancore Devaswam Board. His kairali dhvam (1977), a work comparable to Ananda Vardhana's Dhvanyalokam and partly based on it, won the Kerala Sahitya Akademi Award in that year itself and the SPCS award in 1980. His monumental work, however, is the epic Vishvabhanu (1979), which deals with the life, philosophy and achievements of Swami Vivekananda in 21 cantos of mellifluous Sanskrit verse, and this won him the prestigious Kalidasa Award (1979) from Madhya Pradesh and the National Award for Sanskrit (1982) from the Sahitya Akademi. In 1985 he was honoured with the Indian President's award for outstanding Sanskrit scholars in the country.

His other works include some translations from Malayalam into Sanskrit (e.g. Valiya koil Tampuran's Mayura sandesha into Mayuradutam, 1984), a few Malayalam books such as Samokrita sahitya pranayikal, Vichitra vipinam and Sahitikadaksham and dozen English books such as Non-Rigvedic Mantras in the Marriage Ceremonies (1958) and Kalidasa—An Assessment by Ananda Vardhana (1974). Asante hridayam (1968) one of his works in Malayalam, deserves special mention because it is one of the early critical studies on the renowned poet Kumaran Asan and his poems. Two more works are in the offing, the first a critical edition of Ayyippili Asan's brother, Ayyana Pillai Asan's Bharatam kilippattu, announced in 1980, and a biography of Sree Ramakrishna in Sanskrit verse, which is nearing completion.

A standing monument of Narayana Pillai's organising ability and leadership qualities is the Ulloor Memorial Library and Research Institute, Trivandrum, which has already served as a prominent centre of the capital's cultural and literary activities for nearly three decades.

NARAYANA PISHARODY, K.P. (Malayalam; b. 1909), a Sanskrit scholar of high erudition, was born as the son of a Nambuthiri Brahmin in the village Pallippuram. He could complete his education under the unique guidance of the late Punnasseri Nambi Nilakantha Sarma, the founder principal of the Pattambi Sanskrit College and the late Attur Krishna Pisharody. He qualified himself as Sahitya Shiromoni from the college and was awarded honorific titles like Sahitya Nipuna, Sahitaya Ratna, Pandita Tilaka, etc. from distinguished institutions and persons. He retired as Professor of Malayalam in the Sri Kerala Varma College, Trichur, where he continued as a professor under the U.G.C. Scheme. Pisharody has many books to his credit including remarkable Malayalam translation of the Natya shastra which is being published by the Kerala Sahitya Akademi. Pisharody is a known teacher of Sanskrit and Malayalam, a well-read speaker, grammarian and poetician of a high calibre. His speeches and studies on kutiyattam brought that art form to the lime light and the publications carry great importance. The Ascharyachudamani with 'krama dipika' and 'attaprakara', studies on Subhadra Dhanajaya and Toranayuddha, reveal many interesting facts on kutiyattam. Kuttampalattil (In the temple-theatre) is the latest publication in this line. His edition of Shrikrishna charitam manipravalam is also worth mentioning. His translation of Keshaviya mahakavya into Sanskrit from Malayalam, the interpretation of texts like Narayaniya deserve appreciation. Pisharody is a good essayist and critic also. His interests are not only limited to literature and Natya shastra, but they pervade grammar, astrology, logic, prosody and poetics also.

FURTHER WORKS: Manidipam, Kala lokam, Shruti mandalam, Swapnavasvadatta (Translation).

NARAYANA PODUVAL, AMBADI (Malayalam; b. 1871, d. 1936) was one of the earliest short story writers and a notable novelist of Malayalam. He studied upto Intermediate at the Maharaja's College, Ernakulam. He was a sub-registrar in the service of the erstwhile state of Cochin in his official career.

He started as a poet, but later switched over to prose. His works include three volumes of short stories entitled Kathasoudham (Mansion of stories, 1923), a historical novel entitled Keralaputran (Son of Kerala, 1924) and a drama, Mochanam (Emancipation, 1935).

Poduval was one of the pioneers of Malayalam short story. His themes were not only based on contemporary society, but also on history, legends and folklore. When he dealt with themes of the past, he was careful to create the atmosphere of the olden days by choosing an archaic language for narration and dialogue. He was fond of an alliterative and idiomatic language; when he had to make a point, he did so by quoting old sayings and proverbs. He tried to entertain the readers by narrating strange and uncommon incidents spiced with wit and humour.

NARAYANA RAO (Telugu) is a novel written by Adivi Bapi Raju. His novel can mainly be classified as historical and social. Among his novels, Narayan Rao has a predominant position among Telugu novels. This was written around 1934 and it received the first prize in the competition conducted by Andhra University in 1934. During the same year Vishwanadha Satyanarayana's Veyi padugalu (Thousand hoods) received another prestigious award. Having been first serialised in Andhra patrika daily, the book later took the form of a novel. That the book has been printed ten times might stand as proof of its excellence.

In the novel, Narayana Rao, the hero, is the second son of a landlord at Kottapet by name Subbarayudu. Lakshmi Sundara Vara Prasada Rao, Zamindar of Vishwatapuram, meets Narayanarao and friends accidentally. He makes discreet enquiries about Narayana Rao from his friends. He decides that this is the fit groom for his second daughter Sarada. Later he meets Subburajudu and persuades him to give his consent to the alliance.

The story takes here a fresh turn. Sarada's mother Varada Kameshwari Devi does not like the alliance and poisons her daughter's mind against her would-be-husband. This turns the first night very bitter and Sarada's mind is hard set against her husband. Narayana Rao puts up with this rejection with a smiling front before all. Passage of time mellows Sarada; she hears much good about her husband from Shyama Sundari Devi; finds him shine brightly in contrast to her cousin Jagan Mohan Rao; she realises the innate qualities of her husband. She regrets her earlier action and turns an ardent devotee of her husband. Thus the story takes a happy ending.

Though the story is roughly this, the novelist introduced many characters and discussions on a variety of subjects which lend support to the basic story. The novelist has excelled himself in characterisation. Narayana Rao, the hero of the novel, is an ideal man. The hero's character is delineated by the novelist keeping the character of Mushthi Lakshminarayana in mind. We see in the novel references to poets, singers, actors, lawyers and doctor at the proper places. This novel has been very popular in Telugu. Not only was the book prescribed for study at the university level, but it was translated under the auspices of the Sahitya Akademi into Tamil, Kannada, Malayalam, Hindi and Urdu. Further, Bapi Raju turned it into a drama for A.I.R. and himself played the role of the Zamindar.

NARAYANA RAO, CHILUKURI (Telugu; b. 1890, d. 1952) was born at Anandapuram in Srikakulam district. He passed the Matriculation examination from the Municipal High School in the first division. Being poor, he was helped with books and clothes by fellow-students. Narayana Rao passed his F.A., took his B.A. from Maharaja's College, Vijayanagaram, M.A. degrees in both Telugu and Kannada, and subsequently the L.T. degree and Ph.D from Madras University. He was the first among the Telugus to obtain doctorate for his research in Telugu.

For some years he worked as an inspector of schools. Then he was appointed as a lecturer in Telugu at the government Arts College, Rajahmundry. After a few years he was transferred to the Government College at Ananthapur as the Head of the Department of Telugu. Narayanarao settled at Ananthapur and lived there until the end of his life.

Narayana Rao has the distinction of having produced the largest number of books in modern Telugu literature. He is the author of fifty books dealing with a wide range of subjects—religion, ethics, hymns, history, biography, language, literature and education.

Narayana Rao wrote profusely on religion and translated several religious texts into Telugu. All religions—including Hinduism, Christianity, Islam, Jainism, Buddhism—came under his purview. He has written 8 biographies, 20 books on history, 10 histories of literature, 5 histories of language, 4 dictionaries, apart from a host of other writings in Sanskrit and English. His plays include Amba, Ashvatthama, Achi pendli, Vade, Nataka natakamu, Timmarusu, etc. His poems are Tholi sanga, Thali chayalu. He has also translated the Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.

Of all his works, the history of Telugu language is the most important. It was published by the Andhra University. In this book, Narayana Rao refuted Caldwell's theory that Telugu had its origin in the Dravidian family. He upheld the view that Telugu descended from Prakrit, a dialect of Sanskrit, adducing strong reasons to prove it.

He collected ninety five palm-leaf manuscripts in order to remove all corruptions from the Sauparnopakhyaṇa in the 'Adiparva' of the Mahabharata by Nannaya, and was responsible for printing it in its original form. Similarly he edited the Panditharadhya charitra of Palkuriki Somanatha with an elaborate introduction and several appendices. His essays on the native vocabulary in Telugu, the prosody of Telugu poetry, and the poetic style of Tikkana bear evidence to his ability as a research scholar.

Narayana Rao travelled widely gave lectures on Telugu language and literature to acquaint the non-Telugus with both. He set up Andhra Historical Research Society at Rajahmundry, Navya Sahitya Parishat (the Modern Literary Society) at Guntur, and Srikrishna Devaraya Vidya Peethamu, an educational institution, at Ananthapuram.

His service to the cause of education is evidenced by the schools he started. As the President of several literary organisations, and a member of the various academic bodies of Andhra, Madras, and Mysore Universities, he rendered yeoman service to Telugu. His interest in Agriculture, which brought him a gold medal in a competition held in Ganzam, is another facet of his genius.

It is but natural that his multi-faceted genius should be recognised and honoured by the Universities. The Andhra University conferred on him the title of Kalaprapurna, while Sanskrit Vidyapeeth in Benares awarded the title of Maha Mahopadhyaya.

J.J.K.B.

NARAYANA RAO, KALLAKURI (Telugu, b. 1876, d. 1929), of Kakinada was born in the last quarter of the nineteenth century. Though he could not continue his studies beyond the fifth standard, in his boyhood, he learnt a lot in later life and became scholar in Sanskrit, Telugu and English. Though he wrote poetry and novels, he is mainly remembered for his plays, Chintamani, Varavikrayam, Madhuseva, Chitrabhyudayam and Padmavyuham. An ardent social reformer, he broke the traditions of brahminical orthodoxy. His plays Chintamani, Varavikrayam and Madhuseva aimed at bringing to light the social evils of prostitution, dowry system and addiction to drinking respectively. He wrote Chitrabhyudayam mainly to contradict the false story then in vogue, that Chitrangi, the second wife of Raja Narendra, fell in love with her step son, Sarangadhara. The play, Padmavyuham depicts the valour of Abhimanyu in the Kurushetra battle. He also wrote a novel entitled Pratapa Rudrama Devi.

His Holiness Sankaracharya Swami of Sringeri Peetha conferred the title, 'Mahakavi' (Great poet) on Narayana Rao, particularly in admiration of his play, Chitrabhyudayam. It is significant that Narayana Rao chose to follow scrupulously Dasharupaka, the Sanskrit Alankara Grantha in writing his plays, though his themes were modern. Also a musician and painter, Narayana Rao was acclaimed as a versatile artist.

NARAYANARAO, S.R. (Kannada; b. 1915, d. 1976), who adopted the pen-name 'Bharati suta', was an eminent novelist. He gave up schooling in 1930 to participate in the freedom struggle, and was jailed in 1932 for six months, and again in 1933 for three months when he studied Marx, Lenin and Gandhi. After release worked as a coolie. Later became a supervisor in a coffee plantation in Vynad. In 1942 he became a teacher in the Ramaswamy Valley Primary School. In 1945 passed Vidwan Examination from Madras University and became a Kannada Pandit. He retired in 1973.

Narayana Rao is the author of 32 novels, 8 collections of short stories and 19 books for children. His novels include Chimba hidida meenu (The fish Chidimba caught, NARAYANA REDDY, C.

1962), Huli bonu (Tiger trap, 1963), Giri kannike (Tribal girl, 1969) and Giliyu panjaradolilla (The parrot is not in the cage, 1976). He won the Karnataka Sahitya Akademi Award in 1976. Of his writing H.M. Nayak states "He has retained the regional linguistic differences which are a source of study for linguists. While depicting middle class life, Bharati Suta has brought fresh breeze into the field of the novel. He shows the variety and beauties of life. Since tribals live a distinct style of life and so many traditions are strictly observed by them, the problems that they face are different from our problems. Except Bharati Suta no other writer has written about them."

NARAYANA REDDY, C. (Telugu; b. 1931), who belongs to Hanumajipeta, Karimnagar District, is a major poet writing in Telugu today. His poems are marked by a mellifluousness which makes them most suitable for recitation over mass media; the poems have done exceedingly well over the radio and his songs have become instant successes in films. But the poet is not merely a populist poet. He is an erudite scholar and currently Professor of Telugu at Osmania University, Hyderabad. His critical study of 'Tradition and Experiment in Modern Telugu Poetry' is a reference work for post-graduate students in the universities. Beneath the sweet poetic utterance lies an agonised heart, full of sympathy for the underprivileged, an abiding humanism and more recently an examination of the spiritual evolution of the human race.

His early poems included in volumes like Navvani puvvu (The unsmiling flower, 1953), Ajanta sudari (The damsel of Ajanta, 1954) and Karpura vasanta rayalu clearly mark him as a romantic poet under the influence of Krishna Sastry and Rayaprolu, the two leaders of romantic tradition in Telugu. A flair for fantasy and felicity of expression characterise the poet's work. But the poet has never been a recluse; he has always exhibited a keen awareness of contemporary reality, which included the spectre of inequity and exploitation of the many by the few. His awareness turned his outlook progressive and he sang of the downtrodden in Udayam na hridayam (Morning is my heart, 1973). More particularly, Mantalu manavudu (Blazes and humans, 1973) which won for the poet the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1973, contains some poetically expressed truths about his social convictions. He could discover 'in the sweat of the toiling mass/both the pearl of pearls and the sphere of fire'. He also announced that, 'when the consciousness of people is on the march, there's no place for the banyan which seeks to corner the entire resources of wealth'. In the same volume, we find several poems in which the poet expressed sympathy with the middleclass morons hesitant to enjoy the slight thrill life had to offer them. Calling them 'Paramahamsalu' (great saints), the poet poked fun at their inactivity and resignation to their fate. In an earlier volume, Madhyataragati mandahasamu (1968) (The smile of the middleclass), too, he presented portraits of the middleclass helplessness with sympathy and understanding.

Another aspect of Reddy's poetry is his instinctive celebration of Nature in its various moods and manifestations. In his early work included in Narayana Reddy geyalu (1957), and Nagarjunasagaram (1955), we find ample evidence of the poet's attachment to Nature. The poet sang of the love-infatuated Nature, which appears to the young poet incarnating before him as his own beloved. In Rituchakram (The Cycle of Seasons) the poet traced the changing moods of seasons and their impact on human endeavour. Abiding humanism is yet another concern of the poet throughout his work. In the structure of his values, the common man-occupies the pride of place. In the title poem of his collection of poems, Udayana hridayam, the poet declared:

Poesy is my mother tongue;
Humanism is my theme;

Along with his admiration for man, the poet also exhibits infinite faith in the capacity of man to endure and to progress.

Over the years, the poet has matured in more purposive manipulation of the verbal icon and in recent poetry, he appears to concern himself with more durable spiritual verities. In Bhumika (1977), the poet attempted to examine the value of humanism and sought to find answers to fundamental questions like: 'What is the base for creation, for the earth, for the fire, for water? Is there a beginning and an end? What is poetry and what is its soul? Is man cursed by God or can he still redeem himself?' etc. The march of Man toward the synthesis of the earth and the sky, the shaping of human dynamism and the eternal flame of evolution are the themes metaphysically explored in this long poem. In Mathanam (1978), divided into four parts, the poet examines introspection of physical aspects of life, aspiration, the conflagration of constant antithesis, the upward surge of Man's efforts and synthesis of the contending forces into a poetic harmony. In his latest work, Vishwambhara (1980), the poet attempts a more ambitious exploration of Man's spiritual Odyssey on the earth from the Vedic times to the present. Whether the poet takes a progressive outlook, humanistic attitude, romantic fantasy or a spiritual quest, apt and melodious articulation distinguishes his utterance, which is as thought provoking as it is enchanting.

Reddy has received over the years several honours both from the government and academic bodies. He received the State Sahitya Akademi and the Sahitya Akademi awards (1965 and 1973), honorary doctoral degrees from Meerut (1976) and Andhra (1978) universities and the 'Padma Sri' Award from the Government of India. Apart from his considerable poetic output, he also composed over two thousand lyrics for the movies. Reddy also exhibited considerable skill as an able translator/transcreator. He rendered fifty songs of Meera Bai into Telugu, translated a few sayings of Khalil Gibran into Telugu in Sikharalu loyalu and transcreated the poems of Sarojini Naidu in Mutyala kokila (1979). The poet also toured Malaya and Singapore at the invitation of the Andhra Associations, Soviet Russia, United States and United Kingdom delivering lectures on Telugu literature and culture and giving recitations from his poems.

FURTHER WORKS: Vennela vaada (Lyrical Play, 1954); Karpura vasanta rayalu (1957); Vyasa vahini (Collection of critical essays, 1965); Jati ratnam (1967); Adhunik Andhra kavithamu (Critical study, 1967); Maro harivillu (1969); Mukha mukhi (1971); Marpu naa tirpu (1974); Tejassu naa tapassu (1975); Chaitanya Shikharam (A collection of critical essays on 'Mantalu manvudu', (1975); Inti peru chaitanyan (1976); Mritiyuvu nanchi (1979); Maa ooru matladindi (1980).

NARAYANACHARYULU, PUTTAPARTI (Telugu; b. 1914) is a polyglot of fourteen languages from Greek, Latin, Russian and French to Marathi Malayalam and Hindi. For his versatile genius and multifaceted contribution to Telugu literature he was awarded Padmashri in 1972 by the Government of India and an honorary doctorate in 1975 by Sri Venkateswara University and the honorary title Sarasvatiputra by the head of the Shivananda Ashram, Hrishikesh.

At the age of fourteen he composed a poetic work Penugondalakshmi (published 1935). Born in Penugonda he had a sentimental attachment to that place and celebrated its past glory while lamenting its present ruined state.

In Saji Narayanacharyulu portrayed the characters of Nurjahan, Jehangir and Saji in the most impressive manner. In Sakshatkaramu he depicted Mamata as the personification of Tulasidas's desires and fathomed his heart torn by pangs of separation. Meghaduta, written after the manner of Kalidasa's Meghaduta to some extent, is the story of a social reformer who is imprisoned as he rebelled against the tyranny of the Government controlled by the exploiting rich class and who sends a message to his beloved through the cloud. The long poem holds up a mirror to the social conditions. He is famous also for his extempore poetic compositions. Gandhi mahaprastanam, Sepoy pituri, Bhaspatarpanam, Sudhakalasamu Prabodamu, Tenugutalli, Vedanashatakamu are his other poetic works.

The songs of Agni vina bring out N.P.'s revolutionary ardour and sympathy for the down-trodden. N.P.'s Shivatandavan is the most famous of his works. The cosmic dance of Shiva is depicted in rhythmic language and music and imagery are superbly blended. Janapriya Ramayana, which was given the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1979, is remarkable for the word-pictures and melody and combines the quintessence of Valmiki's Ramayana with that of Tulasidas. In Pandaribhagavatamu comprising 24,000 dvipada lines of verse, N.P. Portrays the lives of Maharian devotees Pundarika, Namadeva and Gorakumbhar. Like the Janapriya Ramayana, Purogamanamu was also written in free verse.

Shivakarnamritamu, 'Prabhatams' on Tyagaraja, Agastisvara, Mallikarjuna, are N.P.'s works in Sanskrit. He translated Buddha Bhagavan, Swarna Patramulu, Bhaktamche gatha, Ushakkal (novel) from Marathi into Telugu, Gadivala (Novel) Kabirvachanavali, Virahasukhamu from Hindi into Telugu; Kondiyilkkuru Silaikkur, Setrakkadu kathalu, Smasanadipam from Malayalam into Telugu, Merupulu Talapulu from English into Telugu, and Ekavira from Telugu into Malayalam.

Abhayapradanam, Pratikaramu, Haridasi are novels written by Varayanacharyulu, Leaves in the wind is a collection of English lyrics in free verse. The Hero (a drama), also in English deals with the death of Duryodhana.

Vasucharitra kavita saurabhamu, a long literary essay received the Andhra Pradesh Sahitya Akademi Award (1971-72) N.P. has written a number of biographies, critical essays and research treatises on history, religion and literature.

G.S.R.

NARAYANADASA (Oriya; b. 1735) is mainly known for his Khandikia Harivamsha (1762). Achutananda (16th century) before him had composed an Oriya version of Harivamsha in seven books. Narayanadas composed another version in a single book and hence the epithet 'khandikia' which means 'single'. Narayandas happens to be the predecessor of Pitambaradasa who mentions in his Narasimha purana that he himself was Narayanadasa on a previous birth.

Khandikia Harivamsha is in the form of a discourse between Shukla and Parikshita in the line of the Bhagavatapurana. The lila (pastimes) of Krishna and the Vaishnava philosophy are the main themes of Khandikia Harivamsha. The poet also narrates the controversial episode relating to the cremation of Krishna's mortal remains after his death. It is stated that the Pandavas set Krishna's body on the burning pyre, but it did not burn. A heavenly voice ordered that the body be thrown into the sea. The body floated on the sea and reached the seashore of Puri where it was transformed into a log of wood. From this log of wood the present image of the deity, Jagannath, was carved. The poet thus shows that Krishna and Jagannath are same. At the same time he mentions Jagannath as Buddha and says that Jagannath existed before the creation of the universe.

NARAYANAN NAIR, PALA-NARAYANIYAM

The poet was conversant with the whole of the Yajurveda, and was a profound scholar in Sanskrit literature though out of humility he tells us that he was illiterate.

Do.S.

NARAYANAN NAIR, PALA (Malayalam; b. 1911) is a well-known poet. He was, for a while, a teacher in a High School, was in the war service from 1943 to 1947 and later took his M.A. degree in Malayalam securing the first rank, studying privately. He joined the service of the University of Kerala from where he retired as Head of the Publication Department in 1967. He received best poetry award from the Kerala Sahitya Parishat and award for the best essay from the same organisation. He also received the Puttezhana Award for poetry. Narayana Nair's poetic career spans over five decades and he has a voluminous output to his credit (more than 35 collections). His poems have the lyrical beauty associated with the Romantic School of poetry. A recurring theme in his works is Kerala. Thus among his collections of poems are eight volumes entitled Kairalimurali (The lute of Malayalam, 1946); Keralam valarunnu (Kerala grows, 1949). In these poems one can read the poet's pride in the land where he was born. Among his other volumes are Omanappaital (The darling child, 1961), Palazhi (Ocean of milk, 1966), Kasturba (1969) being a collection of poems for children.

K.R.P.

NARAYANAN NAIR, V.K. (Malayalam; b. 1932) popularly known by his initials as 'V.K.N.' is a noted humourist, short-story writer and novelist in Malayalam. He had his early education in his native town. After passing the matriculation examination he worked as Manager for a few temples from 1951 to 1958. Later, he moved to Delhi and worked as a journalist for Shanker's Weekly, UNI, etc. He had brief spells of employment with National Co-operative Union of India and All-India Radio. Now he is back in his native place and is engaged in full-time writing.

V.K.N. has acquired a unique place among the contemporary fiction writers of Malayalam. Throughout his creations he appears as a humorist. He draws his characters from both the rural and urban societies. Most of them are typical caricatures of eccentric people drawn in deep colours. A series of his short stories have 'Payyan' (literally 'a lad' in Malayalam) as the central character who is a practical minded modern youth living along the currents in the pretentious high society of the city. These 'Payyan stories' have become very popular. He uses the language in an unconventional manner twisting words and expressions to give a comical effect. His novels are Pitamahan, Arohanam, Asuravani, Manchal, Oralcha, Sindiket, General Chattan, Penpata. Arohanam has been translated into English and published with the title Bovine Bugles.

NARAYANAN NAMPUTIRI, SIVOLLI (Malayalam; b. 1869, d. 1906) was one of the eminent Malayalam poets belonging to the Venmani school. He studied Ayurveda and became a professional physician. He wrote brilliant poetry both in Sanskrit and in Malayalam. His works which were collected and published posthumously in 1913 and 1952 included two long narrative poems, one 'sandesh kavya' one 'tullal' (solo dance-drama), one poetic drama, two Sanskrit poems, one short story and several letters in verse. Many of his longer poems were left incomplete.

Sivolli was a conscious poet who tried, by his satirical pen, to cleanse the world of letters of unhealthy trends and tendencies. Sandesh kavyas and poetic dramas in imitation of Meghaduta and Shakuntala were the fashion of the day. He tried to arrest their mushroom growth by his terse lampoon. His Datyuhassandesam (Owl messenger) is a biting satire in twenty shlokas. In his poetic drama, Dusparsha natakam, the characters are medicinal herbs. These two works have succeeded in arresting blind conventionalism and imitation which was the bane of nineteenth century neo-classical Malayalam poetry.

Sivolli chose a style saturated with slangs and folk expressions for his poetry. His ideal was to bring the poetic language as close as possible to the conversational language and make verse as intelligible and direct as prose.

NARAYANIYAM (Sanskrit) is a devotional poem written by Melpattur Narayana Bhattathiri (1560-1666) of Kerala. Narayana Bhattathiri composed several other works also, but among them, Narayaniyam is rated as the best.

Narayaniyam is written in the form of a colloquy addressed to Lord Vishnu, the presiding deity of the Guruvayoor temple in Kerala. (Legend claims that it was composed on the premises of the temple as an ardent prayer for the cure of an acute attack of rheumatism, and that after the composition, the poet miraculously recovered from the disease.) The author records that the work is 'dwedha narayaniyam' i.e., both ways, the book is Narayaniyam (written on Narayana by Narayana). It is a brilliant summary of the leading incidents narrated in the Bhagavata in 1036 verses, divided into 100 sections called 'dashakas' (decades).

NARENDRADEV ACHARYA-NARI

Narayaniyam is one of the finest devotional poems in Sanskrit. Though it is an epitomised version of the Bhagavata, it is marked by a sincerity of feeling and an originality of approach. The verses are in grandstyle, yet the exposition is lucid and chaste. Here is a verse from the first dashaka which testifies to the poet's devotional ardour:

Kashta te srishticheshta bahutarabhavakhedavaha jivabhaja mityevam purvamalochitamajita maya naivamadyabhijane
No chejjivah katham va madhurataramidam tvad vapushch drasardram netreih shrotreishcha pitva paramarasasudhambodhipurera-meran"

(Your activity in the form of creation is full of suffering carrying with it a variety of sorrows through rebirths for those who live in the world, such was my view at an earlier stage, O unconquerable. But I do not think so any longer. But for that creation, how will the living beings drink the flow of the beauty of your form, so very sweet, through the eyes and through the ears, and thus sport in the ocean of Supreme Bliss?)

In addition to the loftiness of the subject-matter, Narayaniyam is also significant for its elegant and powerful language. The author was a conscious craftsman who was at ease with both the 'vaidarbhi' and 'gaudi' styles of composition. Figures of speech, both of the sense and the sound, abound in the poem. Sometimes the metre employed is in consonance with the situation in the poem. For example, the use of Totaka metre for 'Kaliyamardana' (overpowering of the serpent Kaliya) and that of Kusuma-manjari for 'rasakrida' (the sport of 'ras' dance with the gopis in Vrindavan) are most appropriate to the occasion. There are plenty of instances where sounds are chosen to echo the sense. On the poem K. Kunjunni Raja comments: "The melody of the metres, the sweet diction, the lucid exposition of sublime philosophical ideas and above all, the fervour of intense and sincere faith and devotion pervading throughout, make the poem one of the best devotional lyrics in Sanskrit literature".

NARENDRADEV ACHARYA (Hindi; b. 1889, d. 1956) was an outstanding freedom fighter, educationist, scholar, thinker, and socialist. The Acharya was born at Sitapur in Uttar Pradesh. In 1920 he left the profession of law and joined the Freedom Movement. He started his political life under the leadership of Tilak. He joined Kashi Vidyapith in 1921, and later rose to be its Vice-Chancellor. He also served as Vice-Chancellor of BHU and Lucknow University.

Acharya Narendradev was a profound scholar of history, religion, culture, and socialism, and had great ease of expression in several languages. His love of Hindi was supreme and most of his writings are in this language. His articles and lectures on socialism are collected in his book Rastriya aur Samajvad, and to propagate socialism he edited for some time the weekly Sangharsh. As an educationist too he wrote periodically on problems of teaching and methods of education. His penetrating study of Buddhism, Buddha dharm darshan, a posthumous publication, won him the Sahitya Akademi Award in 1956. The range and depth of the Acharya's scholarship were remarkable. One of the architects of modern India, he was a creative thinker and a powerful leader.

NARHARI SONAR (Marathi; 19th century) is a saint poet, who was a goldsmith by profession living at Pandharpur. He was a staunch devotee of Lord Shiva. His devotion for Lord Shiva was so deep that he went to the extent of refusing to worship, and see other gods and deities.

He wrote a number of devotional 'abhang' on Lord Vitthala wherein his experiences transformed the 'Dwait' (dual existence) into 'Adwait' (unification) and established unified Oneness (sarvatmakata).

He has to his credit an unpublished voluminous work Maalutarna which elaborately describes the contribution of two communities 'Sonar' and 'Kolis' in the making of the holy city of Pandharpur.

NARI (Hindi; 1937) is the best of the three novels by Siyaramsharan Gupta. It highlights the silent suffering of an Indian woman abandoned by her husband, and brings out her deep-rooted loyalty to him as well as her indomitable will to fight against all odds in the spirit of sacrifice and self-negation. Her husband, Vrindavan, goes to Calcutta in search of a job, leaving Jamuna alone to rear his son, Halli, and is lost to the life of the city. Taking advantage of her husband's long absence, the village landlord exploits her and perpetrates untold atrocities on her, and ultimately usurps both her home and her land. In her adversity, another man, Ajit, comes to her rescue, and without any ulterior motive makes a rigorous search for her husband. Jamuna, impressed by his selfless help and having lost all hopes of her husband's return, is attracted towards him, though with a sense of guilt. In the meantime, her husband turns out to be alive. He visits the village, and falls an easy prey to the village banker, pledges his property against an old debt, and leaves without meeting his wife and son. He has already heard in the village of her relations with Ajit. Jamuna breaks down by the apathy of her husband, and leaves the village with her son, taking a plunge into the unknown.

NARIR MULYA-‘NARLA’ VENKATESWARA RAO

The central theme of the novel is Jamuna's relationship with Ajit, the second man in her life. Some critics see her 'fall' in her attraction towards him, but one must bear in mind that Jamuna was drawn towards him not for sexual fulfilment, but because of his selfless help and devotion to her. He would not exploit her; to him the woman was not an object of sexual exploitation, but of reverence. Further, the moment Jamuna came to know that her husband was alive, she left Ajit, ignoring her son's insistence on living with him. She rebuked her son, saying, "Your father will continue to be your father, even if you shift to Ajit. Nobody can change this fact.—The more you can learn to bear, the greater you will be."

Here the influence of the Gandhian philosophy on the novelist is evident. Despite his dissatisfaction with injustice meted out to Jamuna by the tradition-bound society, the author holds on to his faith in the woman's unflinching devotion to her husband—a value which may be questioned by many. Nari is, indeed, a much talked about novel in Hindi.

NARIR MULYA (Bengali) is a book of essays written in an unbroken chain on the problems of womanhood by Saratchandra Chatterjee under the pseudonym of Anila Devi which was, in fact, the name of his sister. It was first published in April 1923. The book is a sociological study on woman, her status in life and society, her relationship with man, and other allied topics and shows how deeply Saratchandra was moved by the miseries of womenfolk not only of this country but of the entire world. According to Saratchandra, women in our country have always been maltreated in one form or another and deprived of their legitimate rights. It was all along a conspiracy hatched by a male-dominated society to put women under eternal subjugation and to plague their lives by endless tortures. He heaps mockeries on the hypocritical utterances of the 'gurus' relating to the supposed deification of women as divine beings and their glorification of the cult of the 'Suttee'.

But the lot of women, the author asserts, was not so bad in the primitive state of society when it was more or less matriarchal in its structure. Evil days befell womenfolk when the matriarchal social mould yielded place to a patriarchal one.

In writing this book Saratchandra was enormously influenced by the thoughts of John Stuart Mill, Herbert Spencer, Macdugal Fraser and other sociological and anthropological writers. Originally he had plans to complete this work in ten volumes and amassed vast material as preparatory exercises to that end, but the compulsiveness of his calling as a novelist did not allow him time to translate that plan into reality.

NARLA, VENKATESWARA RAO (Telugu; b. 1908, d.1985) is popularly known by his surname Narla all over Andhra Pradesh and as V.R. Narla to readers outside the state. He participated in the struggle for freedom and entered the field of journalism when he was in his teens. He won great recognition as a journalist and became the editor of Andhra prabha, a daily which became extremely popular under his stewardship. Later he became the editor of Andhra jyoti, a daily which gained reputation. He added a new depth and dimension to Telugu journalism by his erudition, critical and rational approach, national perspective and universal outlook. He imparted to Telugu prose a new vigour, clarity and vivacity which compelled the attention and commanded the admiration of a vast circle of readers. He takes an honoured place among the stalwarts who used the press as a powerful medium for national awakening and dissemination of cultural as well as democratic values. He is bold, frank, forthright and fearless in expressing his views.

Besides being a great editor, V.R. Narla is a versatile literary artist, who made his mark as a playwright, essayist, poet and feature writer. His collection of one-Act plays Kotta gadda (New ground) broke new ground in the field of one-Act plays by dealing with the social problems of the rural and urban life with a delicate touch of humour, vivid portrayal of characters, gift of building up of atmosphere and mastery over the spoken idiom. His later plays like Jabali, Sita josyam and others are marked by a rationalistic approach to the epics debunking many accepted concepts and ideologies. The plays contain long but eminently readable prefaces comparable to the prefaces of George Bernard Shaw. The prefaces are brilliant, thought-provoking, scholarly and penetrating and administer shock-treatment to readers bound by tradition. Sita Josyam won the Sahitya Akademi Award for the year 1981.

As an essayist, Narla holds a place of distinction. Variety of theme and mastery of treatment render his essays delightful and enlightening. With an inimitable personal touch, he enlivens any type of topic however dull, abstract and tough it may be. Collections of his essays Mata-manti and Pitcha-pati (Talking casually, gossip) offer reflective and personal essays which may be favourably compared to the essays of Lamb and Hazlitt, Lynd and Gardener. Without any stiffness or pedantry he deals with an amazing variety of themes relating to various aspects of life.

His poems are aphoristic and satirical and written in the popular style of Vemana. He explodes many myths and exposes many of the shams which masquerade under different guises in modern life. "Nanymaina baata Narla maata" (Narla's word points out the right path) is the fourth line of the stanzas which runs as a refrain lending a personal touch to the satirical exposure of various aspects of human life.

NARMA GADYA

V.R. Narla has rendered memorable service to Telugu literature by writing in English fine monographs on Vemana, Viresalingam, and Gurajada Apparao, three remarkable literary personalities who exercised a deep influence on the life and letters in Andhra. The monographs published by the Sahitya Akademi in the series of Makers of Indian Literature were widely acclaimed and translated into many Indian languages. He has the unique distinction of having a good command over Telugu as well as English. His style in English is simple, clear and pointed.

V.R. Narla is a voracious reader, whose range of interests is amazingly wide and whose erudition is profound. When man first set foot on the moon, Narla celebrated the great event in an editorial which has become a classic, a paean of human achievement and glory, written in the manner of an inspiring rhapsody with boundless faith in man's limitless powers and bright destiny.

V.R. Narla is a critic, rationalist and humanist who has a rare combination of critical acumen and creative fervour. Though he occupied many honoured positions, his personality always remained more exalted than all those ephemeral honours.

NARMA GADYA (Gujarati) is a collection of the prose writings of Narmadashanker Dave (1833-1886). Narmad was the first Gujarati writer who had English education and through his writings he brought the literature of the West to Gujarati readers. He was the person who ushered in a new era in Gujarati literature, called 'Narmad era' in the literary history of Gujarat. His first article written in 1853 was an essay on 'Mandli malvathi thata labh' (Advantages of forming an assembly). Till 1856 he worked as an editor of a monthly magazine Buddhivardhak granth (A book of knowledge) and wrote articles on various subjects of contemporary interest. In 1864 he started his own magazine called Dandio (A drum stick) and wrote articles on a wide range of subjects. In 1865 the first edition of Narma gadya was published by him with his photograph on the first page. In the introduction of the book he says, "This collection of my writings I have published for my own sake. If the people want to take advantage of it they can. I must readily have on my table my writings in different genres, published in different periodicals. The writings are the powerful overflow of passion; scholars are requested to consider them as turbid water of the monsoon. After some years of course (if published after making some changes) the thoughts expressed might become clean like waters of autumn." In 1886 he published the history of Surat and named the book Narma gadya Book II Part I and then in the same year he published his autobiography Mari hakikat under the title Narma gadya Book II Part II. But the later two books are not considered as separate parts of Narma gadya. The history of Surat was included in the new edition, while Mari hakikat is published as a separate book under the same name. Thus Narma gadya is the collection of prose writings of Narmad, published in 1865. In that edition Narmad had expressed a hope that his writings may be revised in future. The book was acclaimed as a pioneering attempt towards the emergence of modern prose. As he was the pioneer of the modern writing, those who wrote literary history of Gujarat called him the first amongst the modern. The book is divided into six parts. The first part consists of his essays on different subjects ranging from war ethics to principles of literary criticism. In the second part there are two dialogues on the social problems. The third part consists of his writings on various contemporary subjects whereas the fourth consists of his serious writings on different subjects published in Buddhivardhak grantha. In the fifth his writings in his periodical Dandio are included which are full of wit, humour, and satire, and in the sixth thirteen character sketches of mediaeval Gujarati poets are published. These essays established him as an essayist and it was a government's decision to prescribe Narma gadya as a text book for schools. In 1874 education department requested him to prepare a school edition of Narmagadya. Accordingly Narmad revised his book, made necessary changes and published two thousand copies of the revised edition in 1874. As the edition was meant for the school some changes in the articles on political and ethical subjects were thought essential to which Narmad consented. The edition was named Sarkari Narmagadya (Government Narma Gadya). When the government edition was printed the head of the education department was changed. The new head found that in the revised edition some of the articles were such that they were unfit for teaching in the schools and he destroyed all the two thousand copies. He decided to get the book re-revised and asked for Narmad's opinion but he did not reply, so the work was entrusted to Mahipatram who was the Gujarati translator in the department. He was asked to delete some portions and make necessary changes. Mahipatram prepared a new edition which was published by the government in 1875. The revised edition and its interpretation created controversy about its authenticity. This debate continued till 1912 and then Gujarati printing press came out with the original edition of Narmagadya. In 1974 Premananda Sahitya Sabha of Vadodara reprinted the 1874 edition of Narmagadya which was revised by Narmad. Thus all the three editions of the book, original edition (1865), revised edition (1874) and the government edition (1875) are available to the scholars to form an unbiased opinion about Narmad's prose writings and study the steady evolution of his thought and style.

Narmad while revising the book in the second edition

NAROTTAMDAS-NARRATIVE LITERATURE

excluded four essays from the first edition which are 'vyabhichar nishedhak' (Prohibiting adultery), 'vishayiguru' (Sex-hungry religious teacher), 'Guruni saita' (Power of religious teacher) and 'Bhakti' (Devotion) and added six essays which are 'Kelavani vishe' (About education), 'Udyog tatha urudhhi' (Industry and development), 'Sukh' (Happiness), 'Kulmotap' (Family pride), 'Stree kelvani' (Women's education), 'Gujarati onistiti' (The condition of Gujaratis). This he must have done thinking that the subjects had educative value. 'Kavichar-it' (Life sketches of poets) of the first edition was also thoroughly revised.

The essays of Narmagadya bear the special stamp of Narmad. As he was the first to introduce the essay form in Gujarati literature, not only the form, but some of the subjects of his essays were unfamiliar to Gujarati reading public, like 'Sixadeshibirian' (Nationalism). He had to coin a new phrase because the concept of nationalism was unknown. 'Mandali malavathi that labh' (Advantages of forming an association), propagating establishment of associations such as 'Kavi ane kavita' (Poet and poetry) are his important contributions. Narmad's hyper-sensitive nature is also reflected in his essays. He was bitter and harsh towards malpractices in the name of religion.

He has given abridged version of two epics, the Ramayana and the Mahabharata and one epic of the West, the Iliad, and history of mewa and Surat. His writings on Alexander, Plato, Aristotle, Socrates, Prophet Mohmad, George Washington show him as a well-read person with a wide range of interests.

NAROTTAMDAS (Hindi; 16th Century) was a significant poet of the early medieval age. Not much is known about the year of his birth or death except what Shiv Singh Saroj mentions while referring to him and that is 1545. He came of a Kanyakubja brahman family, and belonged to a village called Bari in district Sitapur (Uttar Pradesh). Amongst the books attributed to him are Sudamacharit, Dhruvcharit and Vicharmala, but it is only the first that is available and forms the basis of his popularity amongst the lovers of Brajbhasha poetry.

Sudamacharit narrates the poignant story of the poverty-stricken life of Sudama, a childhood brahman friend of Krishna in his guru Sandipan's hermitage, his wife's cajolements persuading him to go to Krishna for the alleviation of his miseries, the awe that grips Sudama when he reaches Dwarka, and the hearty welcome that Krishna and his queens extend to the indigent brahman, and his ultimate elevation to riches through Krishna's bountiful nature.

Sudamacharit is a short epical composition (Khand kavya), written in lucid, refined and rhythmic Braj Bhasha. The clarity of expression adds to the vividness of the account presented by the poet. The simplicity and spontaneity of language add to its emotional impact. Reading Sudamacharit is, indeed, an experience.

NARRATIVE LITERATURE (Prakrit). One of the earliest forms of narrative literature may be seen in folk tales, which centred round people and their habitat including birds, animals, trees, rivers, mountains, etc. In a well-known story of a housewife and a mongoose, the latter was taken as a murderer of her child, but really speaking it had saved the child from a poisonous snake. This tale is narrated in Panchtantra and the Avashyaka Nirvyukti of the Jains. In the story of a selfish sparrow and a houseless monkey, the former rebukes the monkey by calling him good-for-nothing. Enraged, the monkey destroys her nest. This story is narrated in Panchtantra, kutidusaka Jataka, Brihatkalpa-Bhasya-Vritti, and Avashyaka Churni.

As Prakrit narratives are mainly based on folk-tales, we find an enormous variety in them. These narratives were simple tales, originally free from moral tags, but they were conveniently used for conveying an ethical message by a religious teacher. They were thus easily transformed into tales of morality and played an important role in moulding the lives of the people. Ancient Jain literature is full of narratives in the form of fables, anecdotes, epigrams, parables, illustrations, riddles, questions and answers, etc., dealing with the life of common people, including traders, sea-faring merchants, artisans, menials, slaves, robbers, scoundrels, prostitutes, bawds and so on.

The Jain authors divided the stories into various categories, relating to 'dharma' (righteousness), 'artha' (wealth), and 'kama' (sexual enjoyment). The dharma-katha is divided into four types: pleasant or catching (akshepinī) unpleasant or distracting (vikshepinī), leading to knowledge or enlightenment (samvegajananaī) and leading to detachment or renunciation (nirvedajanani).

The arthakatha, pertaining to acquisition of wealth, was quite popular with the Jains, mostly a mercantile community. It was stressed by the Jain writers that without wealth one would not be able to lead a virtuous life, and without virtue there could be no happiness. Possession of wealth inculcated the spirit of independence and one could then lead an unobstructed, independent life without hanging on others. In the Prakrit Jain narratives we meet numerous young trading merchants, undertaking the most difficult and perilous sea-journey in order to acquire wealth. In one such narrative a young man arguing with his mother asserts that a man who did not earn money in his youth was useless like a fleshy nipple hanging down the body of a goat, and that a wise man should not depend on the earnings of his forefathers (Somaprabhasuri, Kumaravalapadiboha, 3.245).

The love stories (kamakatha) were equally popular with the Jain authors. If a story has to serve its true purpose, it ought to be made interesting, otherwise the readers might develop an irreverent attitude towards religious sermons. Dharmasenagani, the author of the unpublished Majjhimakhandā, has affirmed that people listening to popular love stories, such as those of Nahusa, Nala, Pururava, Rama, Ravana, Janmejaya, Naravahanadatta and others, take so much delight in them that they have no appetite for religious stories. Therefore, like a physician, who administers his medicine to an unwilling patient under the pretext of giving what the patient desires, the author proposes to narrate a virtuous story in the guise of a love story. Tarangavaikaha by Padaliptasuri (about 2nd or 3rd century A.D.), a court-poet of Hala and a contemporary of celebrated Gunadhya, seems to be the earliest love composition by the Jains. Later, after about 1000 years, Nemichandrahani composed Tarangalola, an abridged form of Tarangavaikaha. Among other erotic compositions mention may be made of Vasudevahindi by Sanghadasagani, Majjhimakhandā by Dharmasenagani Mahattara, Kuvalayamala by Udyotanasuri, Kaharayana-kosa by Jineshvara Suri. Naravahanadattakaha is counted among popular love stories, and Tarangavai, Malayavati and Magadhasundari among extraordinary (lokuttara) love stories. All of them are no more extant.

The Jains also composed narrative literature containing witty and humorous stories, and stories related to people, stupid and naive, knaves and scoundrels in order to expose them, and to guard the virtuous against victimisation at their hands. There are numerous stories of this kind, e.g., Simhasanadvatimsika (thirty-two throne stories), also called Vikram charit dating back approximately to 11th century A.D. It was a popular work, but today it is not available in the original. It was, however, enlarged by a Jain writer, Kshemankaragani, and is supposed to be its best preserved edition. Vetalapanchavimsatika (twenty-five stories of Vetala), said to be written by a Jain, Simhapramoda, is another well-known work. It was translated into several languages and is known as Baital Pachchisi in Hindi. Like, Panchatantra this work has also greatly contributed to the narrative literature of the world. Its original text is entirely lost, and it has come down to us only in later recensions. Shukasaptati (Seventy parrot stories) was equally popular with the Jains. Its original text is also lost, and the available Sanskrit version is of late origin. Ratnasundarasuri (A.D. 1581), a Jain writer, has been mentioned as author of Shukasaptatika or Shukadvasaptatika. Bharata dvatimsika (Thirty-two stories of Bharatakas, a class of begging monks) is one of the most amusing collections of stories about foolish and wicked persons, meant to ridicule the priestly order. It has been suggested that these stories were collected by a Jain to ridicule the Bharatakas. The Jains also made use of Gunadhya's well-known Brihatkatha in Vasudevahindi and the unpublished 'Majjhimakhandā' where the whole episode of Naravahanadatta is transferred to the hero Vasudeva, Krishna's father. The story of Vikramaditya too has been assimilated by the Jain authors, making him a devout Jain. Panchakhya or Panchakhyana of Purnabhadrasuri (A.D. 1199) is the revised edition of the well-known Panchatantra. Vinodakathasangraha, also known as Kathakosha by Maladhar Rajashekhara (middle of the 14th century A.D.) was influenced by Panchatantra in style and subject matter. Later, many of its stories gained popularity under the name of Akbar and Birbal. Ratnachudakatha by Jnanasagarasuri (second half of the 15th c. A.D.) may be mentioned as another popular Jain work. It contains the entertaining stories of the city of rogues where 'Unjust' is the king, 'Unwise' the prime minister, and 'Restless' the priest—a city where only thieves, rogues and cheats reside. The story of the clever Rohaka in this work may be compared with the story of Mahosadha Pandit in the Maha-Ummagga Jataka.

The Jain monks travelled from place to place in order to preach their religious sermons. Visiting far off places was considered an act of piety. The Jains developed thus a certain proficiency in different languages and dialects. Later, they composed their literature not only in Prakrit but also in Sanskrit, Apabhramsha, old Hindi, old Gujarati, Rajasthani, Kannada, and Tamil. We have palmleaf manuscripts in the Kannada script of Battisaputalikakatha and Bhetalapanchavimsati in the Jain Math (monastery) of Karkal, and a manuscript of Panchatantra in the same script in the Jain Siddhanta Bhavan Library, Arrah. The last mentioned work is said to be a version by Vasubhaga Bhatta, different from the popular version by Vishnusharma. Thus we see that a study of Prakrit narrative literature is significant not only from the point of view of the social and cultural history of India, but also for making a comparative study of the Indian languages and their development.

NARRINAI (Tamil). Traditionally speaking, Narrinai is the first anthology of 400 Akam poems under the general title of Ettuttogai or Eight Anthologies of Sangam period. Among the three anthologies of Akam poems compiled on the basis of number of lines contained in the poem, the poems of Narrinai are intermediate in length in between Kuruntogai, an anthology of 400 poems containing 8 lines or less and Netuntogai, commonly known as Akananuru, a collection of 400 poems in the range of 13 lines to 33 lines as the maximum. But the name Narrinai, assigned to the collection of 400 poems, is not on the basis of the number of poems contained in a collection but based on the quality of the poems. The word 'Narrinai' is the combination of two words: 'nal' and 'tinai'. Nal means 'good' and tinai may mean 'conduct' or five-fold division of the 'interior landscape' of human life. The title Narrinai clearly suggests that the poems of this collection are in praise of the good conduct of man and woman in their union of love. The poems of Narrinai are in the akaval metre. Out of 175 poets included in this collection, six poets are known to us by the beauty of their similes and epithets used in their poems. One of the authors of a poem (153) is known to us as Tanimakan by his portrayal of the agony of a lonely man in his poem. The poem (234) is missing and the poem (385) is in mutilated form. The name of the compiler is not known and the patron of the compilation work of this anthology is Pannatu Tanta Pandiyan Marran Valuthi. There is an invocatory verse in praise of Vishnu ascribed to Bharatam Patiya Peruntevanar. Among the works of Sangam period this is the only work now available without any commentary. In the beginning of this century, Pinnathur A. Narayanaswamy Aiyar wrote a commentary on Narrinai in the traditional format published after his death in 1914.

The importance of the poems of Narrinai lies not only in the depiction of the people in an idealised love setting, but also in its being a source of inspiration to the later day works as well as the documentary records of historical events of Sangam period. One can see that a number of similes and epithets used by the poets of Narrinai are found even in the works of Tirukkural and Silappadhikaram. In the same way one can also find a striking similarity in the story of a woman called Tirumavunni who tore off her breast as depicted in the poem of Narrinai (216) with the story of Kannagi of Ilangovalar's Silappadhikaram.

NARULA, SURINDER SINGH (Punjabi; b. 1917) is a technique-conscious novelist, whose Peo putar (Father and the son, 1946) gave a fresh thematic dimension to the Punjabi novel. He was born at Amritsar and after graduating from Khalsa College, Amritsar, with three medals to his credit, he joined the State Secretariat in 1938; but after doing his M.A. in English (1942), he joined as a Lecturer at the local Khalsa College. Afterwards, he was at Rawalpindi (Khalsa College) for a short period, and then after joining Government Service he was posted at different other colleges. He was the Head of the Department of English and also the Principal before his retirement. He was honoured as the best litterateur of the year by the Punjab Government Languages Department in 1981. His major works have been translated into Hindi, Bengali, Malayalam and Gujarati. Peo putar has been translated into Russian and a few other foreign languages as well. He stands second to Nanak Singh for the portrayal of the city life. His writings are said to be tinged with the leftist ideology.

His important works include: Novels: Rangmahal (Pleasure-palace, 1950); Jagbiti (The experiences, 1953); Silaluni (Unpleasant, 1962); Galan din rat dian (Life goes on, 1968); Rahe kurahe (On the track, off the track, 1980). short stories: Lok parlok (The world and thereafter, 1952); Rup de parchhven (Shadows of beauty, 1953); Janjal (The problem, 1962); Gali guandh (Neighbours, 1980). Criticism: Punjabi sahit di jan pachhan (An introduction to Punjabi literature, 1941); Punjabi novelkar (Punjabi novelists, 1951); Bhai Vir Singh (1952); Punjabi sahit da itihās (History of Punjabi literature, 1953); Alochna visthar (Criticism expansion, 1981); Mohan Singh, ik prichay (Mohan Singh, an introduction, 1981). History: Sada itihās (Our history, 1945).

S.S.So.

NASIKH, SHEIKH IMAM BAKHSH (Urdu; b. 1771, d. 1838), son of Khuda Bakhsh, who belonged to a family of tent makers, was born at Faizabad where he spent his early childhood. Later, he migrated to Lucknow where he studied Persian and Arabic at home and at the famous religious seminary of Firangi Mahal. Literary historians differ over his parentage and pedigree, but are agreed upon the fact that he had been adopted by a rich merchant. It was the timely bequest of his foster parents that enabled Nasikh to indulge in literary pursuits, without financial constraints and worries.

Nasikh earned a name for himself and became a force to reckon with in a very short period of time. Many a rich nobleman and courtier of Lucknow vied with one another to become his disciple. Nasikh never sought to affiliate himself with the court of Avadh. But living in Lucknow and amidst courtiers, his ego and sense of self-respect notwithstanding, he too became a victim of courtly intrigues and machinations. He had to flee Lucknow and take refuge in Allahabad, Faizabad, Banaras, and Kanpur but could never reconcile himself to writing an eulogy of the king.

Nasikh was a master of the ghazal form and on account of the style he formulated, he is considered unparalleled. But sincerity of emotion, warmth and passion are sadly absent from his ghazal. He was a great scholar of language and a grandmaster of the art of poetry, but his poetry is not inspired, rather belaboured versification abounding in the use of conceits and figures of speech. He can versify any idea in a most ostentatious, pompous and flowery language, but the end product was always devoid of any emotional fervour. It is for the lack of emotion and passion that his otherwise technically perfect couplets fail to move the reader's heart.

Nasikh's obsession with the purity of language had had a mixed effect on the course of Urdu poetry. On the one hand, his strict imposition of rules severely hampered the development of Urdu poetry. Instead of inspiration and imagination, poets started relying more on conceits and fancies; and on the other, these very prohibitive factors helped in setting standards as far as the language of poetry was concerned.

During the eighteenth century, many attempts were made by poets and scholars to purify Urdu by divesting it of foreign elements and evolving a code for its grammar and usage. Nasikh took upon himself the onus of accomplishing this formidable task. Prior to Nasikh, poets like Insha and Sauda, whose genius had flowered in Delhi, had settled down in Lucknow and given considerable thought to this matter. But generally speaking, the influence of Delhi held sway. After all, in spite of the apparent affluence and prosperity of Lucknow, it was an extension of the same degeneration which had brought Delhi to its deathbed. The value system was almost the same. Both Delhi and Lucknow shared the same historical, cultural and literary heritage. These factors alone could not have given rise to the creation of a new school of thought in Lucknow. But in many ways, Lucknow was different. The poets who were starving in Delhi, found generous patrons in Lucknow. There was security of life, property and honour in Lucknow. It was but natural that the poets who had come from Delhi soon became subsumed by the new wealth, prosperity and abundance of Lucknow. A substantive change came about in their point of view, howsoever superficial their point of view was. These factors did influence the literature of the age. Another important factor which needs to be mentioned is that unlike the rulers of Delhi, the nawabs and kings of Awadh were Shias. Their way of thinking was different. Their centres of faith were slightly different. Their love of the Prophet and his progeny was more intense. They mourned the martyrdom of Hussain for a number of months in a year. Recalling the sacrifices of the martyrs was a source of moral strength for them. Certain new forms of poetry like Marsia, Salam and Nauha developed because of this allegiance.

The softness and sweetness of Awadhi was dominant in the language prevalent in Lucknow. The language of Lucknow was generally speaking, more delicate and coy. Some words were pronounced differently, some genders were different, some metaphors were typically Lucknowite.

Beginning from these premises, Nasikh sought to standardise language, laying down elaborate rules with regard to usage, diction and grammar. Foreign and archaic words were avoided. Differences between the idiom of Delhi and Lucknow were recorded. Nasikh's efforts were carried forward by his pupils until bounds between the idiom of Lucknow and Delhi were clearly demarcated.

'NASIM', DAYASHANKAR (Urdu; b. 1811, d. 1844) was a poet who died young and wrote only one 'masnavi', but left an indelible mark on Urdu literature.

Nasim, according to all historians of Urdu literature, was born in a family of Kashmiri Kaul brahmins. The name of his father was Pandit Ganga Parshad Kaul. Nasim seemed to be a born poet. At the age of 20 he became a literary disciple of 'Atish', one of the two top poets of Lucknow. Atish could not have accepted Nasim as his disciple unless he had mastered Arabic prosody and had a sound knowledge of Urdu and Persian poetry.

Atish was known for a style totally different from that of his rival, 'Nasikh'. Nasikh was famous for using the most chaste form of Urdu. He had rid Urdu of all Hindi influence and was very fastidious about correct idioms and urbane usages. This emphasis on the beauty of diction rendered his poetry almost devoid of emotion and replete with jugglery of words. Atish did not mind using a rustic idiom here and there, but saw to it that his verses reflected the fire burning in his heart (his pen-name 'Atish' means 'fire').

Nasim was a faithful disciple of Atish, but he adopted the style of Nasikh rather than that of his preceptor. It does not mean that his poetry is totally devoid of emotion, but his attempt seems not to impress the reader by emotional gush. He makes him marvel at the cleverest possible use of words, flow of diction and a plethora of figures of speech.

Nasim is known to have written a few fine 'ghazals', but his major contribution is in the form of 'masnavi' contained in Gulzar-e-Nasim, written in 1838. It is the versification of a popular tale of love between a human prince and a fairy princess. Up to the first half of the 19th century only such fantastic events were popular as fiction. His incentive was Mir Hasan's masnavi, Sihrl-bayan, written about half a century earlier. The tale therein is a similar one, but Hasan used a simple and emotionally effective style.

It appears that the Lucknow litterateurs of the time felt called upon to match every simple and effective literary work of the Delhi School with a work of typically embellished style of their own School. In prose, Rajab Ali Beg 'Saroor' came out with Fasana-e-ajab as against Mir Amman's Bagh-o-bahar, and in poetry Nasim did the same in respect of Sihrl-bayan.

Nasim held a responsible post in the administration of Nawab Amjad Ali Shah. He was the 'bhakhshi' (wage distributor) in the royal army. His social and financial position was sound and he had an exuberant disposition which made him popular among the gentry of Lucknow.

NATA-NATASAMRAT

He was a man about town and had a fine sense of wit and humour.

Nasim's mastery over the art of poetry has been widely recognised. Quotations from his masnavi have provided scores of idioms widely used in Urdu. The most voluminous book in Urdu on the art of poetry, Bahrul-Fasahat, quotes Nasim more than any other poet for providing examples. Excerpts from the masnavi are given in books meant for children. Some of his ghazal couplets, like 'Kufr toota khuda khuda kar ke' are also used widely by writers as adage.

It is a pity that such a promising poet had such a short span of life and fell victim to an epidemic. Had he lived for another 30 or 40 years, he might have excelled all his contemporary Urdu poets.

NATA (Sanskrit) means an actor in Indian dramaturgy. In Natyashastra he is otherwise known as 'Bharata' or the chief actor. The other actors mentioned in the Natyashastra are Nata sutradhara, Vidushaka and Kushilava among others.

NATAKA (Sanskrit) is one of the ten varieties of drama discussed in the texts on Sanskrit dramaturgy. There are references to nataka in the texts like the Natyashastra and the Dasharupaka. In the Dasharupaka, all the varieties of drama are discussed in detail, but a pre-eminent place is given to nataka, because it is considered to be a typical variety of dramatic composition and the one which best exemplifies the rules laid down for such works. The other varieties of drama are briefly defined chiefly by the enumeration of their points of divergence from the nataka.

On the definition given in the Dasharupaka, a nataka deals with the lives of either gods or mortals and sometimes a mingling of the two. The hero is usually of the 'dhiroddhata' variety, with attractive and noble qualities. The principal rasa is either shringara or vira. In nataka, incidents like journey, murder, fighting, revolt, bathing, eating etc. should not be represented on the stage. The story has a neatly laid out structure, usually divided into five acts. However, if it is divided into ten acts, it is called a 'mahanataka'. The Dasharupaka mentions that Rajashekhar's Balaramayana is a mahanataka.

As instances of natakas, mention may be made of Kalidasa's Shakuntala, Bhasa's Swapnavasavadatta (though Bhasa seems to have consciously deviated from the norm and composed the play in six acts) and Shudraka's Mrichchhakatika.

NATASAMRAT (Marathi) is the most popular play by Vishnu Vaman Shirwadkar (Kusumagraj) published in 1971. It earned him the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1974 and the Maharashtra State award. Natasamrat is considered a great tragedy in Marathi after Ram Ganesh Gadkari's Ekach pyala. It is a tragedy of an old man, once a great actor, and his precarious position in this mundane and dwarfed world. Though inspired by Shakespeare's King Lear, it has established its marked originality. This is the most successful play by V.V. Shirwadkar both as a literary drama and a stage play. It is not only a tragedy of an individual in his old age, but it portrays the eternal conflict between a personality risen to great heights and the pigmies around him who fail to appreciate his greatness.

The genesis of Natsamrat is rather strange. The playwright himself has stated in his preface that he was thinking of the translation of King Lear, when all of a sudden an aged actor succeeded King Lear in his imagination, and Natsamrat was the offshoot. Naturally the shadows of King Lear are cast over the making of this play, and even if the ageing natsamrat (a king among actors) is cast in the mould of King Lear, the play is neither a translation nor an adaptation of the great Shakespearean tragedy. But in the rough outline of the plot and the structure of both plays, there is some remarkable resemblance. Both King Lear and the king among the actors are kings in their respective fields and both love their children to infatuated distraction. Both in a moment of unreasonable imbalance leave their material belongings to their children, and consequently their ingratitude brings about the ultimate fall and destruction of both the kings. In Natsamrat the actor is blessed with a loyal wife, and the conception of her noble character is Shirwadkar's unique contribution to the original play. He has also retained some of the bitter soliloquies from King Lear in his Marathi translation. But barring this likeness Natsamrat can very well be treated as an original play, loosely adapted from the Lear story.

Ganpatrao Belwalkar, now a septuagenarian, was acclaimed the greatest actor of his time. He and his wife Kaveri stay with their son Nanda. In his loneliness he is shown to be subjected to hallucinations which suggest his illustrious past life. He remembers the glorious ceremony in which he was felicitated by his fans, when he completed sixty years of age. In that function he was presented a purse of forty thousand rupees as a token of their love for him. He divides this money equally between his son Nanda and daughter Nalu and now he is living a satisfied retired life with his wife Kaveri in Nanda's home. Nanda is a Manager in a well-reputed company. He and his wife Sharada have a daughter Suhas alias Thami. The daughter of Ganpatrao alias Appasaheb, Nalu, is also married. Her husband Sudhakar is an Engineer working on the construction of a dam in Nasik. All these changes have occurred in the recent ten years. Nanda's wife Sharada could not put up with Ganpatrao's idiosyncracies. Provoked by his wife, Nanda also rebukes his father saying "I won't sacrifice my married life and Sharada for your sake." Nanda makes him aware of the fact that their worlds are poles apart. Kaveri and Ganpatrao leave Nanda's place and arrive at their daughter's. Here also they do not fit in. Ganpatrao's daughter Nalu treats her parents with a heavy hand. It breaks his heart. She accuses him of theft. Kaveri tries to reconcile, but being a sick woman, she dies broken-hearted, leaving behind her husband all alone in the world. Ganpatrao begins to behave like a maniac under the shadows of his solitude. The isolation of Ganpatrao is the representation of isolation which all great persons experience in this world. Now Ganpatrao starts off from Nalu's home. He is all by himself and wanders frantically. His soliloquies at this time are extremely poignant and poetic. Though under tension, he is conscious of the tragedy of life and makes an appeal in his soliloquy—"O! Beware! The brutes have become free. Let the temples fall, let the buildings be destroyed, let the cities collapse, let the gardens burn out. But a 'son of man' is lying on the heath O! Save that child!"

He intuitively comes in front of a theatre in Bombay and meets Raja. Raja passes his life on pavement and earns his bread by polishing shoes. Raja has got no false pretensions of status or of culture and has not turned his back on human values. He treats Ganpatrao with great care. There enters Vithoba, who worked as a servant at Nalu's home and is interested in theatre. Vithoba informs Nanda and Nalu about Ganpatrao; Nanda and Nalu ask Ganpatrao to return. The false and pretentious world is inviting Ganpatrao through its mask, but Ganpatrao is now free and refuses to return to these hypocrites and prefers to live in his own world. He passes his days in reminiscences, remembering all the roles he has acted in his life time.

The play, though mainly inspired by Shakespeare's King Lear has enriched the glorious tradition of Khadilkar and Gadkari.

NATHA LITERATURE (Hindi). The word Siddha generally means 'a man of perfection', but academicians ordinarily use the term in relation to the Buddhist tradition. Some scholars believe that the terms 'Nav-Natha' and 'eighty-four Siddha' indicate that the Nathas and 'Siddhas' belonged to two different religious orders.

Whatever be the position, there was certainly an interaction between them. Tantrism in general and Shaivism in particular are, in fact, older than Buddhism. All the Indian religions and philosophies assimilated Tantric elements. We may, therefore, conclude that the names of the Siddhas, presented by different sources (e.g. Sas-kyamonastery of Tibet, Varna-ratnakar and Hath-yogpradipika) do not belong to any particular sect or school. Each source enlists the recognised and honoured Siddhas without reference to their creed or sect. The Siddhas, however, based their tenets and experiences on the later phases of Mahayana Buddhism, while the Nathas, using some common yogic terminology, leaned towards Kashmir Shaivism. The Siddhas were traditionally atheists (Anatma-vadin) and antagonistic to the Vedas, while the Nathas were theistic (Atma-vadin). Both of them were contemporaneous and Tantrik elements were common to them. Contrasting conceptions regarding the nature of Shiva and Shakti separated them. The Nathas strictly followed celibacy; but the Siddhas did not, nor did they quote any commonly accepted scripture as their testimony. Modern researches, however, prove that two of the foremost Buddhist Kapaliks, Jalandharapa and Kanhupa, with their followers were included in the Natha fold.

Traditions differ about the names of the nine Nathas, but the following names are found in about all the lists—Adinath, Matsyendranath, Gorakhnath, Jalandhar-nath, Kanupanath, Charanginath, Bhartriharinath, Charpatinath and Gopichandranath. Adinath (Shiva) is accepted as the first and the divine promulgator of the order. Matsyendra and Gorakh are the two human pioneers of Nathism who wrote basic treatises for the order. Due to the venerable position of Gorakhnath, many books are attributed to him.

Some Sanskrit works are attributed to Matsyendra-nath, who is considered the propounder of the Siddha kaula sect of Kashmir Shaivism. Prabodhachandra Bagchi has edited and published Kaulajnana-nirnaya, comprising Kaulajnana-nirnaya, Akula-vira-tantra, Kulanandatantram and Jnanakarika. Bagchi and Hazariprasad Dwivedi have elaborately compared the practices and the technical terms of Matsyendranath with Tantric Buddhists showing their similarities and differences. In these works Tantric elements, and specially vamachar practices (left hand practices) are notable. Matsyendra's yoga-visaya is edited by Kalyani Mallika.

The list of Sanskrit works attributed to Gorakhnath is too long, and scholars are not unanimous about it. G.W. Briggs, dealing with the literature of the Kanaphata yogis, enumerates some 47 titles, but maintains that Goraksh-shatak is the fundamental text of the sect and fixes its time as the twelfth century. Hazariprasad Dwivedi in his book Natha sampraday ascribes 28 Sanskrit books to this great teacher.

NATHA LITERATURE-MARATHI-RAJASTHANI

The historians of Hindi literature recognise Gorakhnath as the first Hindi prose writer, but no authentic manuscript by him is available. Machhindra Gorakh-bodh, a semi-authentic text, may be accepted as an example of old Brajhasha. The first collection of Gorakh's writings, Gorakhbani, was edited by P.D. Barthwal in 1942. The editor considered the first fourteen compositions to be the older texts and the longest one, 'Sabadi', as the representative work of Gorakhnath. In the second part of this edition songs were compiled with indications of classical 'Ragas'. The language of both these parts is peculiar due to an intermixture of words from different modern Indian languages.

The second collection of the verses of Nathayogis was edited by Kalyani Mallika in Siddha-siddhanta paddhati in 1954, utilising the manuscripts, collected by P. Barthwal and preserved in the Nagari Pracharini Sabha of Varanasi and those collected by the editor herself. The main Nathayogis of this collection are Matsyendra, Bharthrihari, Gopichandra, Charpat and Jalandarnath. The third collection, Nath siddhon ki baniyan, was edited by Hazariprasad Dwivedi in 1957. Many of the yogis included in this collection are part of legend, and in a few of them, like Prithvinath, we find the element of Bhakti also. Some of the important Nathayogis included are Kaneri-pao, Gopichandra, Charpata, Chaurangi, Jalandhara, Nagarjuna, and Matsyendra. The traditional subject-matter includes short verses on yoga, jnana bhakti, description of microcosm, importance of celibacy and self-control. The language forms are fluid and textual authenticity is doubtful, but undoubtedly these 'Bani's' express the thinking and culture of a widely prevalent school of asceticism.

NATHA LITERATURE (Marathi) Natha sect is one of the oldest religious sects of India. In the beginning, it had its impact mainly on the North and saints like Kabir were influenced by the philosophy of this sect.

It is said that this sect existed in India since the first century A.D. But it was after the decline of Buddhism that it became really popular. In the tenth century, however, Buddhism accepted the Tantra-sadhana and this became the main cause of its decline. This sadhana was followed by the Shaktas and the Kapalikas. Yota, the base of the philosophy of Natha panth, was opposed to this Tantra sadhana.

Natha panth being oldest religious sect had a great impact on the medieval Maharashtra also. During the eleventh and twelfth centuries, it had its influence on the common man and the religious thinkers of Maharashtra. The Mahanubhavas and the Varkaris were also influenced by the philosophy of the Natha panth. Jnaneshwar has also acknowledged its influence on him in Jnaneshwari.

Natha panth is known by different names in different parts of India. They are: Gurumarg, Siddhamat, Avadhutamarg, Yogmarg and Gorakhmarg. In Maharashtra, it is also known as Kanphata. According to this sect, Shiva, i.e. Shankara, is the final truth and its Shakti is the world.

The disciples of this sect have produced rich literature in the Hindi and Marathi languages. The founders of the sect believed in the propagation of their philosophy in regional languages and local dialects, so the early literature in most of the Indian regional languages speaks of the influence of Natha panth on their devotional literature. Some scholarly books on this sect have been written in Sanskrit. Folk-tales and songs of different languages reflect the Natha thought. Most of the Natha literature is written in 'Shanta' or 'Abdhuta' Rasa. Some of the principles of this sect are found on the rock edits in the Himalayas.

It is believed that the philosophy of 'Natha panth' is based on the 'Shivasutras'. Some of the major works by Matsyendranath, one of the preachers of the sect, include Kauljnananiraya Akulavritanta, Kulananda, etc. Gorakhnath's Siddha siddhanta paddhati is regarded as the most significant work, a scholarly commentary on the principles of the sect, explaining the eightfold stages of yoga, namely 'Yama', 'Niyama', 'Asana', 'Pranayama', 'Pratyahara', 'Dharana', 'Dhyana' and 'Samadhi'. Besides this, Gorakhnath has written some 28 books. Some of them are Amanask, Amaraughashasan, Goraksha paddhati, Goraksha sanhita. Some 40 books in his name have been published in Hindi too, a compilation of which is titled Gorakhbani. Navanathbhaktisar is a biographical account of the prominent teachers of the sect.

The literature of the sect is marked by mysticism and obscurantism at some places. Its symbolism is interpreted in different ways. Hindi saint Kabir has also confessed his indebtedness to the works of Gorakhanath.

The sect came on the verge of decline after Gorakhnath, for want of effective leadership. It came under heavy criticism of some other saint poets, i.e. Tukaram, Eknath, Ramdas. Its overemphasis on Yoga is supposed to be one of the major causes of its extinction.

NATHA LITERATURE (Rajasthani). The 'Natha' sect has been a very widely prevalent religious sect in Rajasthan. It is pre-eminently a Shavite school of worship, holding Lord

NATHA LITERATURE-RAJASTHANI

Shiva as its first 'Natha' (Master). Since the central tenet of the sect is 'yogabhyas' (yog practice), it is also known as 'yog sampradaya'. The Natha yogis emphasize 'kaya sadhana', i.e., rigorous asceticism in personal life as a means to attaining liberation. These yogis were divided into numerous sub-sects, and Gorakhnath is said to have consolidated them into twelve broad groups, commonly known as 'Bara panths'. Several of these groups had their 'gaddi' (seats or centres) in Rajasthan, e.g., Jalore (Pavpanthi), Jhunjhunu (Man nathi), Ajmer (Vairagya panthi), Bhilwara (Rawal panthi), Pushkar (Satyanathi). There is an inscription in the Natha temple at Nohar (Sriganganagar), dated 26 September 1078, which tells us of the prevalence of Natha yogis in Rajasthan even in the eleventh century, but certainly they were more widespread and better organized in the 15th and 16th centuries.

It is difficult to take cognizance of the written or spoken words of all the yogis belonging to different schools of worship in Rajasthan, but some of them were very popular and deserve attention. The teachings of such yogis as Gorakhnath, Jalandhar, Gopichand, Charpat and Bhartarihari had a wide circulation. It is worth noting that the largest number of the compilations of Gorakhnath's teachings, as of other famous saints, have been found in Rajasthan. These compilations include Gorakbhani and Siddha siddhanta paddhati. Their language, though a blending of many dialects, shows a strong impact of Rajasthani. Since these compositions were in the nature of 'vanis' (spoken words) and had a mass circulation, there has been a lot of inter-mixture or interpolation in them. However, these 'vanis' are essentially religious verses with heavy emphasis on 'sadhana' and self-realization.

Besides Gorakhnath, two other Nathas, Jalandharnath and Charpat, deserve special mention. Jalandharnath is regarded as the originator of Pavpanth, a school of worship which was at some stage related to the Vajrayan branch of Buddhism. In some Rajasthani poems, such as the Ramayana of Mehoji and Ramrasau of Surjanji, we find traces of Vajrayani impact. Another famous yogi of the Pavpanth was Chidiyanath (15th century) who first lived at Chidiyatam and later moved to Palasani.

Charpat was a disciple of Gorakh. According to the saint-poet Rajjab (1567-1689) of Sangner (Jaipur), Charpat was the son of a Charan woman. His fifty-nine 'Shabdiyan' and five 'Shlokas' are still available. He is one of the earliest Natha yogis who taunted the ascetics who wore saffron clothes but indulged in sexual pleasures and other vices. His stress was on moral conduct, pursuit of Nathayog, and harmony between word and action. He had several followers. Jambhoji's (1451-1536) Sabadvani refers to many of them. They wrote many 'padas' and 'sabadis' which need to be properly edited.

One of the most celebrated Natha poets of the 15th and 16th centuries was Prithvinath. In his Bhaktamala, Radhoda of the Dadu sect mentions him along with other famous Nathas of the period. Till recently, only four of his works were known, namely, Sadh parikhya, Niranjan nirvan, Bhakti baikunth and Sabadi, but recent researches by the author have brought to light as many as twenty-six additional compositions by him. Some of these are: Pran pachchisi, Sish sambodh atmaparichay, Jnana pachchisi, Bharam vidhuns, Pratibodh jnana, Ajap Gayatri, Tat sangram, Bind siddhant, Mul padam mahajnana, Man thamb sareer sadhan, Brahma agni jog, Sandhya gayatri, Pran kundalni.

The works of Prithvinath expound the teachings of the Natha sect, such as pursuit of divine goals, philosophy, ethics, spiritual attainment, and have been composed in a language which is mainly Khadi boli, mixed with Rajasthani and occasionally Braj boli. It is especially worth noting that Prithvinath introduced the note of Bhakti also, which was later to be found in the works of Bananath and others. Prithvinath emphasized that life led by a person devoid of devotion is worthless (Sadh parikhya). This note of Bhakti is an outcome of the influence of the saints of those times, and it gave, indeed, a turning point to the Natha tradition.

Another saint-poet, Garibgiri, is famous for his Jog Pavadi which consists of 61 'chhandas'. Elsewhere, the poet is called Garibdas. This work has also been erroneously published in the name of Gorakhnath (See 'Saptasindhu', July 1968, Hindi Department, Patiala). In this work we find a lucid treatment of yoga in a colloquial version of Rajasthani.

Jalandhar's disciple Maharaja Mansingh (1782-1843) of Jodhpur was also a famous poet. A large number of works written in Rajsthani, Braj and Pingal have been attributed to him, but amongst them all his works in the Natha tradition are of the greatest importance. Thirty-one of them deal with the Natha sect, its saints, rituals, teachings and philosophy. Some of these works are in Rajasthani, e.g., Anubhav-manjari, Sarupan ro doha, Jalandhar, Jnana sagar. Others are in Rajasthani with a blend of Braj, e.g., Shri Jalandharnathji ro charit, Jalandhar chandrodaya, Natha-charit, Nath-vernani granth, Siddha sampradaya granth, Tejmanjari, Siddha muktaphal, Panchavali, Siddha Ganga, Nath stotra Jalandharnathji rinisani.

Mansingh has written a couple of books on love and nature also. His erotic works are, e.g. Duha sanjog Shringar, Duha viyog Shringar and Shringar pad while those dealing with nature are, Udyan Varnan, Sadritu varnan.

Bananath of Jodhpur was another accomplished Natha poet of the first half of the 19th century. He was a disciple of Jiyanath who himself belonged to the tradition of Chidiyanath (mentioned above). His poems may be sung in various 'ragas'. His seventy-two 'Padas' and Parvana (1851), consisting of fifty-three 'chhandas', are quite well-known. So is his Anubhav Prakash, consisting of songs to be sung in different musical notes. His 'padas' were very popular with the common people. His poems, in general, deal with Natha teachings, their practice of Yoga, mystic experience, knowledge of the self, moral exhortation, and so on. In the tradition of Bananath, there have been some good poet-preachers, like Navalnath, Uttamnath and Viveknath. Navalnath's 'padas' expound 'Niranjan mahima', i.e., the greatness of Niranjan. The fourteen or fifteen padas by Uttamnath (d. 1931), disciple of Navalnath, stress the importance of the Guru and of re-counting the name of God. The works of Viveknath (1898-1967), disciple of Uttamnath, are equally noteworthy. His available works are: over 75 'padas', three 'aratis', and some 120 scattered 'chhandas'. Besides these, he wrote in Hindi prose the 'Uttameshwari' gloss on Gita, Vivek sagar, Vivek chandrodaya, Vivek bhanu, Sri Gurumahima varnan and other doctrinal expositions and commentaries.

Apart from this literature, a large number of 'Sabdas' in the Natha style, written by many known and unknown poets, have also flourished in Rajasthan. These 'Sabdas' have played an important role in uplifting the morals of the people and giving them spiritual light. Siruvi, a disciple of Chidiyanath, and Bhaninath who belonged to the first half of the 16th century, tried to fill the minds of the people with lofty thoughts. Bhaninath's twenty-seven 'padas' are still current in Rajasthan as part of folklore, and have been published recently (See 'Shodha-patrika', June 1958, Udaipur). Concerted attempts are yet to be made to collect and edit Natha literature found in manuscripts far and wide in Rajasthan.

NATH, RADHAGOBINDA (Bengali; b. 1879, d. 1970), eminent Vaishnavite scholar, passed his M.A. examination in Mathematics from Calcutta University and taught at several places in East Bengal (now Bangladesh). He was honoured with the degree of D. Litt by the Vaishnava Theological University and the University of Calcutta for his profound scholarship in the Gaudiya school of Vaishnavism. His works include an edition in six volumes of Sri Sri Chaitanya-charitamrita of Krishnadas Kaviraj, a treatise in Gaudiya Vaishnava darshan in five volumes, Sri Sri Gauratattwa, Mahaprabhu Srigauranga and an edition of Vrindavanadas's Chaitanyabhagavata.

NATH, RAJMOHAN (Assamese; b. 1901, d. 1965), a scholar, who wrote in Assamese, Bengali and English, was the second son of Govinda Nath. He was educated at Hailakandi Government High School, Murarichand College, Sylhet (now in Bangladesh) and at Sibpur Engineering College, Howrah. After obtaining the B.E. degree he joined the Assam Engineering Service and served the department in various capacities till his retirement as Superintending Engineer in 1957.

Though he was a civil engineer by profession, he had the talent of a scholar, the inquisitiveness of an explorer and the analytic mind of a historian. While in service he unearthed ruins and sculptures, discovered many things which helped to bridge some of the missing links in the history of Assam. He published a good number of articles in different periodicals on the religion, history and culture of Assam.

He compiled and edited with notes and commentary the Bargitas, the devotional songs of Shankaradeva and Madhavadeva, and Shankaradeva's Kaliyadaman, a drama (the subjugation of the serpent Kali), with a long introduction and notes. He also published monographs on different aspects of the history of Assam and India. His approach to the subject is original and his interpretation of facts is objective and logical. His Bir Chilaray, though small in volume, bears testimony to his scholarship.

The Cultural Background of Assam which he wrote in English, with hundreds of photographs of art and architecture, sculpture and ruins of Assam, is a well-written document on the socio-cultural history of Assam.

He has made an attempt to decipher the script of the seals of the Indus Valley and has published articles and books giving interpretation of the motifs and signs. A Clue to the Indus Valley Civilisation is a note-worthy contribution in this regard. A Bengali version of the above work was also published.

He devoted his last years to the study of Tantric mysticism and the Vedas and published a translation of Atharva Veda.

His main interest was history and archeology but he had a poetic gift also. In Katha o kahini in Bengali in imitation of Rabindranath, he presented some historical events in charming poetry.

NATHAMADHAVA (Marathi; b. 1883, d. 1928), whose real name was D.M. Pitale, was a Marathi novelist, playwright, and short story writer. He discontinued his education after his failure at the Matriculation level in 1899 and took up a job in the Indian Army. Hunting was his favourite pastime. In one of the hunting expeditions, he fell from a steep rock and suffered all his life due to physical disability. He then turned to writing. Encouraged by K.N. Athalye, Editor, Keralakokila, he wrote many miscellaneous articles and stories. His first important novel Shri Shivaji Maharanche Aramara athava Savalya Tandela (Shri Shivaji's navy or Savalya Tandela, 1908) which dealt with a semi-historical theme established him as an important novelist in the post Haribhau Apte Era. Although he wrote on a variety of themes—social, political and historical—he could not attain the height of Haribhau Apte. Bangalyatila guptakata athava Hemachandra Rohini (Conspiracy in Bengal or Hemachandra Rohini, 1909) is probably the first political novel in Marathi. His social novels portray the middle and lower class life in the early part of this century and reflect the writer's deep concern for the social problems of his times. The plays Jativant Maratha vira (True Maratha hero, 1917) and Marathyacha atmayadnya (Self-sacrifice of the Marathas, 1917) had a special appeal to his contemporaries. His fame, however, chiefly rests on a series of seven historical novels which imaginatively recreate the glorious past in the Maratha history viz. the rise and foundation of the Maratha Empire.

NATI (Sanskrit) stands for an actress in Sanskrit dramaturgy. She is mentioned in connection with the preliminaries (purvaranga) of a play. The nati contributes to the preliminaries by singing songs, sometimes with dancing movements, on the stage. Sometimes the nati appears in the purvaranga in conversation with the stage-manager (sutradhara) thereby helping him to introduce the play, the playwright and the setting, as in Kalidasa's Shakuntala.

Su.G.

NATYA (Sanskrit) roughly corresponds to 'theatre' in Indian dramaturgy though the word is not limited to theatre alone. Apart from being a specific branch of knowledge, the concept of natya seems to contain multifarious levels of and perspectives on life. According to Indian dramaturgy, natya is a composite art intended to impart knowledge through the presentation of theatric action on the stage all directed towards the practice of 'dharma'.

Discussions on natya are found in Bharata's Natya shastra. In the chapter on 'Natyotpatti' (The origin of natya) Bharata dwells at length on the creation of natya, its content and manifestations. Bharata does not define natya in a single sentence; his discussion is a blend of inter-related ideas.

According to Bharata's definition, natya has an all-pervading significance. It is intended to convey sound advice (hitopadesha) through the presentation of events and actions. It should contain and deal with many, or all, the scriptures, art, sculpture, moral advice, right conduct, peace and war, love and murder, retribution, humour, fortitude for the valiant, knowledge for the ignorant, scholarship for scholars, sport for lords, the lives and actions of gods, humans and demons—in short, everything that exists in the 'three worlds'. Bharata elaborates this idea further in an aphoristic definition:

"Nanabhavopasampannam
Nanavasthantaratakmakam
Lokavrittanukaranam
Natyametanmaya kritam"

(This natya that I have created is enriched with different bhavas; it contains many situations, contexts and conditions; it is an artistic recreation of the affairs of the world)

The concept of natya as explained by Bharata has thus a cosmic significance. Theatre is not an ephemeral phenomenon, but it is lasting in its impact and vital in its existence as the universe itself. On the one hand, it is a recreational activity which also instructs and on the other hand it is the quintessence of life itself. The material of life becomes the material of theatre. Thus in the Natya shastra the concept of natya is an attempt to celebrate theatre as a way of life.

Su.G.

NATYA SHASTRA (Sanskrit) is the oldest and the most comprehensive work on Indian dramaturgy. The Natya shastra is a work ascribed to Bharata, though nothing definite is known about either the author or the date of the composition of the text. The Natya shastra deals primarily with 'natya' which is derived from the word 'nat', meaning to 'dance' or to 'act'. The Natya shastra has 36 chapters, dealing exhaustively with the different aspects of natya. The first twenty-seven chapters, except the fourth and the fifth, deal with drama, including acting and make-up. The six chapters from chapter 27 onwards deal with music and musical instruments. The next three chapters are again devoted to a discussion of drama. The last chapter is an appeal to the honest and diligent followers of the shastra to bless the work.

The work is conceived as a series of question and answer sessions between Bharata and the sages who come to visit him. There are chapters which deal exclusively with the different aspects of the dramatic art namely theatre-houses, preliminaries of the play, different postures and movements in dance, etc. At the very beginning Bharata mentions four components of natya, viz words, music, acting or abhinaya and rasa. After this introduction the sages question Bharata on five points; 1) What is rasa? ii) What is bhava? iii) What is samgraha? iv) What is karika? and v) What is nirukta? Bharata answers the last three since these are of general application. Enumeration (of all contents or components) is samgraha (lit. collection), karika is a brief definition and nirukta signifies etymological or other explanation of a term. The samgraha is of eleven topics: rasa, bhava, abhinaya, dharmi, vritti, pravritti, siddhi, swara, atodya, gana and ranga. The rasas are eight in number. The bhavas consist of eight sthayibhavas, 33 vyabhicharibhavas and eight sattvika, also called anubhavas. There are four kinds of abhinayas, two types of dharmi, four vrittis, six pravrittis, two kinds of siddhis, seven swaras each either vocal or instrumental, four kinds of atodya, five kinds of gana and three kinds of ranga (stage or theatre-houses).

The Natya shastra deals with the important topic of rasa in all its ramifications. The word is derived from 'ras', ie. to taste. Rasa is a harmonious combination (sthayibhava) of the involuntary (anubhava) and the voluntary (vyabhichari) reactions to a stimulus. These are eight, love (shringara), heroic (vira), pathos (karuna), wonder (adhbhuta), humour (hasya), frightful (bhayanaka), disgust (vibhatsa) and terror (raudra). Of these eight shringara, raudra, vira and vibhatsa are primary. Hasya, karuna, adbhuta and bhayanaka are derived respectively from the first four. The chapter ends with the elaboration of the anu, vyabhichari, and sthayi-bhavas of all the eight rasas.

Now the karika and nirukta of bhavas are taken up. From bhav (to react or to feel) the word bhava is derived. The reaction to a stimulus (vibhava) expressed involuntarily or voluntarily through words, gestures, etc. is a bhava. Similarly the nirukta, i.e. etymological and other explanations of vibhava and anubhava follows. The bhavas, sthayi, vyabhichari and sattvika are 49 (8+33+8) in all. These forty-nine are explained, defined (quoting earlier passages in the Arya metre by other writers) and illustrated.

Now the next, abhinaya is taken up. The word abhinaya is derived from 'ni' (to carry, to convey, to lead etc.), with the prefix 'abh' (towards), so abhinaya means that which carries or conveys the play to the audience. This abhinaya is of four kinds: angika—physical (gestures etc.) vachika—verbal (tone, accent, emphasis etc.), aharya costumes (in modern theatre includes sets, lighting, grouping etc.) and sattvika—impersonation.

Angika conveys the meaning, and movements. The parts of body are grouped as primary (anga) and secondary (upanga). Heads, hands, waist, chest, hips and feet are primary; eyes, eye-brows, nose, lips, cheeks and chin are secondary.

In the following two chapters, the abhinaya through the remaining five primary parts, viz, hands, waist, chest, hips and feet is explained. Details like using one hand or both, the mudras during dancing, etc. are described. Describing the abhinaya of pada (feet) leads to chaps. 9 and 10.

The next element in acting is called a chari. A 'chari' is not a movement, not a natural gesture as nodding the head, but a deliberate stance, a pose in which waist, hips, thighs and feet come in a line. 'Except through a chari there shall be no movement in play' (Chap. 11).

Then follows the description of a number of charis representing different kinds of actions like shooting an arrow or riding in a chariot etc. Charis are prescribed not only for actions on the ground but for those in the air (like jumping, riding in the sky, etc.).

When a number of charis are used to express movements (as in fights etc.) it is called a mandala (chap. 12).

The next topic should have been vachika abhinaya. But the author takes up pravritti and dharmi. The first half of the chapter describes what is called Kakshavibhaga, i.e. stage location. Then 'pravritti' is described as the 'regional' style, ie the costumes, the make-up, the language and accents; music and dance must be in accordance with those prevalent in the particular region in which the play is performed. Then dharmi is described as of two kinds, natyadharmi and lokadharmi, respectively stylised one and natural one (chap.14).

The next topic taken up is the second variety of abhinaya, viz. vachika i.e. verbal. The first thing about this abhinaya is articulation. There is a rhythm to a sentence in prose and in verse, metres with appropriate number of syllables. In all there is a caesura, so poetics and prosody are described in detail. Figures of speech are illustrated. Finally, languages have regional peculiarities, regional languages have also dialectical variations. These various kind of prakrits and their uses are described. Finally, tone and emphasis are described (Chap 15-19).

The pathya i.e. dramatic speech should be employed as above in all the ten forms of a play—i) Nataka ii) Prakarana iii) Samavakara, iv) Ihamriga v) Dima vi) Vyayoga vii) Utsrishtikanka viii) Prahasana ix) Bhana and x) Vithi. The reason for this classification lies in the differences between the vastu (plot), neta (hero) and rasa in them.

After describing the different types of plays, the Natya shastra explains that in spite of this difference, all plays are the same as far as their construction is concerned. Whatever the story, some point or stage is to be accepted as the starting point of the hero's position and his final objective to be fixed. Between these two ends, Bharata recognises different stages. The 'beginning' (arambha) is there. This is called 'bija' i.e. (lit. seed, that which helps the first sprout). External circumstances aiding or otherwise the hero's actions are called artha-prakriti; what the hero deliberately does to follow it up is called the avasthas. These latter are five, arambha (beginning), prayatna (effort), praptyasha (meeting the obstacle), niyatapti (removing the obstacles), and phalagama (denouement). Corresponding to these are five arthaprakritis, bija (seed), bindu (contributory incidents), pataka (major sub-plot), prakari (minor sub-plot) and karya (achievement). Each of the first five combining respectively with each of the next five is called a sandhi i.e. intersections. Thus we have five sandhis: mukha (arambha+bija), pratimukha (prayatna+bindu) garbha (praptyasha+pataka), savamarsa (niyatapti+prakari) and nirvahana (phalagama+karya) (chaps 20-21).

Vritti is another concept in the Natya shastra which stands for style in speech, movements, singing and dance. There are four vrittis; bharati (speech) sattvati (emotional action), kaisiki (music) and arabhati.

Aharya abhinaya connotes make-up, costumes, property, etc. These also help to communicate the play to the audience. Gods, demons, kings, queens, men, women, servants etc. all have been prescribed specific make-up, costumes, jewellery, weapons, etc. At the very sight of the character the audience would know, if he is a king or a God or a demon or a hero or a villain, etc. Similarly, each emotion or feeling is to be expressed, suiting the status of the character, in stylised tones and gestures. This is called sattvika abhinaya, and Bharata prescribes a number of details concerning this. Lastly, special directions are given regarding different kinds of loving or pining heroes and heroines and their messengers. (Sanskrit plays had mostly love as their theme). The description of abhinaya is concluded by rules about how times of the day or asides and sottovoce etc. are to be conveyed on the stage (Chaps. 23-26).

The Natya shastra recognises the audience as one of the important components of theatre. They can make or mar a play. So the book prescribes certain qualifications for members of the audience. They should be able to recognise a good point and show their appreciation by clapping or exclamations or laughter or smile as the occasion demands, and encourage the actors without disturbing the play. They should, in case of failure, be able to identify the reason for the failure, whether it is due to human or natural factor. Competitions must be organised in which Bharata wants not only sympathetic and qualified judges to participate but tells us how and at what distance they should be seated.

Music is to be considered under two heads, instrumental (atodya) and vocal (gana). Instruments are of four kinds, stringed, percussion, solid and hollow (i.e. wind instruments). In the 'stringed' variety, the orchestra consists of a singer (with his sathi) and players of vipanchi, vina and flute. The mridanga, panava and dardura are the percussion orchestra accompanying actors or artists according to their merit. Song, instrumental music and natya—these three must be used like a fire-brand moving in fast circles. There are seven swaras (notes) the sources of which are the human throat and the vina. Scale (grama), mode (murchhana), melody (jaiti), time measure (tala), ascension and descension, their application to the different rasas and then playing the instruments, the importance of pada (word), dhruvas of vocal music, the use of percussion instruments for accompaniment, rules for playing these instruments, the place where orchestra and singer are to be seated, all these points are described in detail. The orchestral part is called atodya and the vocal gana.

Finally, the different types of characters (i.e. hero, heroine) and their characteristics are described and guiding rules are given about choosing artists and distributing the roles (Chaps.34-35).

The author concludes his book by informing us how drama and dramaturgy were brought to the mortal world and their continuation by the successors of Bharata (Chap.36).

In the Natya shastra itself information about dancing is given to Bharata by Tandua. Similarly, among the names of the so called sons of Bharata, Dattila and Kohala are supposed to be earlier writers on dramaturgy and Bharata mentions the latter as a future author. Similarly, Nandin and Nandikeshwara have been mentioned by Abhinavagupta and his association with Tumburu suggests that Nandin wrote on music. Only we have no evidence to show whether he was earlier or later than the author of the Natya shastra.

The comprehensiveness of the book seems to have discouraged later writers from writing anything more than commentaries. Thus we have commentaries by Udbhata (7th century), Lollata (mid 8th century), Shankuka (early 9th century), Kirtidhara (9th or 10th century) and Abhinavagupta (11th century). But these writers either discuss the rasa theory more or find themselves unable to interpret correctly a number of passages.

The reason is obvious. Even by the 10th century, the book was found to be discursive. Dhananjaya who wrote only about the ten forms of drama (hence called Dasharupaka) says in verse five of his book:— The Natya shastra is so discursive that it would create confusion in the minds of ordinary people.

Like Dhananjaya, there were other later writers who wrote, on the authority of the Natya shastra, mostly on dramaturgy. Thus one, Sagarandandin, probably a contemporary of or a little senior to Dhananjaya wrote what he calls Nataka-lakshana-ratnakosha, and also mentions his respectful indebtedness to earlier writers like Matrigupta, Garga, Ashmakutta, Nakhakutta and Bharata. All except the last are only names to us. Similarly in the 12th century, two Jain authors wrote Nataka-darpana (Mirror of drama) in which they criticise Dhananjaya and quote Abhinavagupta. About the same time one Sharadatanaya wrote Bhava-prakashika in which, as the title suggests, rasa and bhava were emphasised. He also quotes earlier writers like Matrigupta, Kohala, Harsa, Subandhu etc. Later in the 13th and 14th centuries, two writers Vishwanatha and Vidyanaatha, in their works on rhetorics include chapters on drama, rasa etc. based on the Natya shastra. The two works are respectively known as Sahitya darpana and Pratapa rudriya.

NATYA SHASTRAM-NATYACHARYA, DEVAL

The Natya shastra, from the earliest days, has shaped Indian drama. Its rules were not only strictly followed by great dramatists of classical plays which were performed in palaces and temples, but were as strictly obeyed, respected and retained in the theatre of the common people.

Unfortunately, as time went on, the tradition was kept orally or from one enthusiast to another. The more the book was respected and its rules followed, the quicker was it lost. We knew of Bharata from works like the Dasha rupaka of Dhananjaya or some other later work as we came to know of a Natya shastra from similar sources. But Bharata was respected by later rhetoricians more for his rasa theory than for his elaborate study of the theatre. The theory of rasa became very important in the study of poetry and literature, though originally it was applied by Bharata only to drama.

Ad.R.

NATYA SHASTRAM (Malayalam). Bharata Muni who is said to have flourished between 200 BC and AD 200, is the most ancient authority on the norms regarding the performing arts, music and poetry. His Sanskrit Natya shastra deals with the basic principles of aesthetics which have influenced all major classical dance forms in India. Kathakali, the most developed dance of Kerala has also borrowed its 'satwikabhinaya' and 'rasanishpatti' from that work, but both kathakali and 'kuttayattam', the classical performance of Sanskrit drama, have discarded many of the 'lokadharmi' (realistic) norms of Bharata. The rejection of the realistic norms is most probably due to the accent on the 'natya dharmi' (stylization) norms, which enable the skilled artistes to produce rasas without resort to realistic aids. Nevertheless, both kathakali and kutiyattam have accepted the basic tenets enunciated by Bharata, namely the eight 'sthaiya bhavas' and thirty-three 'vyabhichari bhavas' and eight 'satwikabhavas' and also the concept that rasa is the ultimate aesthetic essence produced by the different bhavas. Likewise the nine rasas are also the same.

We thus find that the 'satwikabhinaya' emphasised in Natya shastra is put into practice and the externals such as stage-aids, make-up, etc. are changed. For example, the facial make-up is classified according to the intrinsic nature of the character represented.

Kutiyattam artistes, i.e. Chakyars, assiduously follow the repertoire preserved in their families in respect of each performance. Many a repertoire of this kind were presumably finalised during the reign of Kulashekhara (978-1036) who was himself an author of two Sanskrit dramas, Subhadradhananjaya and Tapatisamvarana. Each repertoire has two parts, one dealing with 'abhinaya', rhythm, music, explanatory miming, etc, called 'atta prakara' and the other dealing with make-up, rituals, story, etc, and called 'krama dipika'.

Besides the repertoire accompanying either of the above dramas, that in respect of each of the seven dramas, viz. Bhagavadajjuka, Pratima nataka, Matta vilasa, Abhisheka nataka, Nagananda, Torana yuddha and Subhadra dhananjaya is also available.

The gestures prescribed by Bharata are basically adopted in Kudiyaattam, but Kathakali follows a different source book, namely Hastalakshanadipika.

There are treatises dealing with other classical Indian dance forms also. The one most relevant in the present context is the Balaramabharata of Kartika Thirunala Rama Varma Maharaja, who ruled the erstwhile Travancore State from 1758 to 1798. It is an authoritative treatise on 'mohiniattam', an indigenous dance based on Bharata-natyam.

NATYACHARYA, DEVAL (Marathi) is a book written by Srinivas Banahatti on Natyacharya Govind Ballal Deval a renowned Marathi dramatist. The book considered, a scholarly treatise on Deval was subsidised by the 'Maharashtra Rajya Sahitya-sanskriti Mandal'. It was given the Sahitya Akademi award for the year 1969.

The book gives a comprehensive account of Deval's life and works with critical commentary. Most of Deval's plays were adaptations of western or Indian classics. This Vikramcervashiyam is a direct translation of the Sanskrit play, while Mrichchhakatik is an adaptation of Shudraka's play, originally in Sanskrit. His Zunzarao and San-shayakallol, based on Shakespeare's Othello and Arthur Murphy's All in the wrong, have been evaluated against their similarities and differences with the original. The book is divided into ten chapters studying the life, plays and craft of Deval as a dramatist exhaustively. His only original play Sangeet Sharada presents a dramatic revolt against the tradition of child marriage and its disastrous consequences. He wrote some seven plays between 1880-1915. Most of them have been musical plays which made him extremely popular. His Shapasambhrama is based on Banabhatta's Kadambari.

The book which exhaustively evaluates Deval's contribution to theatre and literature can be called an early experiment in criticism in comparative literature.

NAVALRAM

NAVALRAM (Gujarati; b. 1836, d. 1887) was a critic, dramatist, translator, poet, editor, etymologist, biographer and essayist. He was born in Surat. After having primary education in a Gujarati school, he got a scholarship and joined an English school. He was unable to get through the matriculation examination, but he was well equipped with a training to be a critic of high order. At the age of eighteen he joined the English school as a teacher, and after some years he became the Principal of a teacher's training college in Surat and afterwards he became the Principal of the Teacher's Training College at Ahmedabad. Then he joined as Principal of Burton Training College at Rajkot and retired from there.

He edited a monthly named Shalapatra (School magazine), and most of his writings in the field of education, general knowledge, literary criticism were the result of his regular contribution to that monthly. He wrote two plays Bhatnun Bhopalun (The fiasco of Bhatt) (1867); Virmati (1869); Meghdut (translation of Kalidas's famous poem, 1870); Mamgrun (editing a work of a mediaeval poet Promananda relating to an incident in Narsingh Mehta's life); Vyutpattipath (lessons in etymology, 1872); two collections of poems Ballagna Batrishi (32 poems regarding child marriage, 1876); Balgarbavals (songs on children, 1877); Akbar Birbal Kavya Tarang (the waves of poems regarding Akbar and Birbal, 1880); Nibandhruti (essays, 1880); Angrejloknoitihasa (history of English people, 1887) and Kavijnan (Life of a poet which is an biographical sketch of Narmad. His literary essays were compiled by Govardhan Ram in four volumes; and later them Harhari Parikh selected the essays and compiled them in one volume named as Navalgranthavali.

Navalram began his literary career when he was in his early twenties. The reformist movement in Gujarat had just taken its roots. Once he won a prize of Rs. 250/- for the best poem on social reform.

Navalram was the pioneer of Gujarati literary criticism and had an uphill task before him. Except poetry other forms of literature were on the stage of evolution; he had to explain and elucidate specialities of different literary genres, frame proper phrasology, and set the norms. He carried on his work confidently and in a scientific manner through his literary activities which were carried on through his monthly Shalapatra. While reviewing books, he first explained the peculiarities of the genre, gave brief summary of his book and then critically evaluated the book, suggesting the changes wherever necessary. His method was analytical. His reviews of books written by new writers were appreciative, as he wanted to encourage them, but he was more critical when he reviewed the books of well-known writers. His criticism was unbiased, scientific and sympathetic. While reviewing Karanghelo (mad karan) the first novel in Gujarati literature by Nand Shanker he was unsparing to the author, elaborately criticising the incongruities in plot construction; artificiality of the dialogues, and emphasised on writers being faithful to facts while writing historical fiction. While Narmad considered 'passion' the most important element in poetry, Navalram emphasised that passion alone could not be a scale for the judgement of poetry, and he gave equal importance to subject matter, propriety of the form of poetry chosen by the poet, the mode of expression, etc. While reviewing a dramatic work Subodhchintamani in which there was moral surmonising he said: The main object of drama is to give pleasure. 'The dramatist who diverges from this main object, goes astray, and completely loses the track'. Navalram has given a clear picture of the various forms of literature like lyric; the novel, biography, drama, translations. He has also discussed the problems of language, style, place of emotions and humour in different forms of literature. Thus Navalram put criticism in Gujarati on a firm footing and his contribution is regarded as significant.

Navalram's two plays Bhatnu Bhopalun (1867, Fiasco of Bhat) was an adaptation of Moliere's Mockdocter. The adaptation is so perfect, that, had he not mentioned that it was based on a French play, one could have easily accepted it as an original Gujarati play. It is one of the first humorous plays in Gujarati literature. The dialogues, humour, situations and the action are properly synchronised. The use of the regional dialect has helped in introducing a local touch. The play has been successful on the stage. The second play Virmati (1809) is a serious play. The plot is taken from the neo-historical folk tale, collected in Rasmala by Jamod Forbes. The dramatic technique is western and the element of conflict is well brought out. It is divided into five acts and twentythree scenes.

His two poetical works Ballagna batrishi (32 poems about child marriage 1876); and Balgarbavali (Song for the children, 1877) give a good account of his poetic ability. The former though written with the object of reforming the society is not didactic and the second is interesting because of the variety of subjects like Vasant varnan (Description of spring); Itihasniarsi (The mirror of history); Swadesh sotra (Hymn of the motherland). His classical and enchanting manner of presentation, and mastery over the language and metres, have earned him a reputation as a prominent poet, Narsingh Rao a renowned poet and critic says "He was at his best as a poet and scholar. He was a great critic because he was a poet and scholar".

Vyutpatipath (Lessons in etymology) is a first book in which an attempt is made to trace the origin of Gujarati words, and their process of formation from the original language. As the science of linguistics was not developed his work though not scientific was judged as an attempt in this direction.

Kavijiwan (Life of a poet) is a biography of Narmad, which ushered modern era in Gujarati literature. The biographer has given authentic information and analysed the factors responsible for the creative evolution of Narmad. The author has taken a broad perspective and has plunged deep into the psyche of the poet while analysing the working of the mind of Narmad.

Though Navalram has had a versatile pen, his everlasting and memorable contribution is in the field of literary criticism
